Mr. Moody. Mr. Chairman, as far as the welfare fund is concerned, I did not discuss that in my presentation. My personal feeling is that there are certain weaknesses in the present set-up, and I think you will remember—and if you do not I will just mention it—that in the negotiations last year which, of course, is a year after the Taft-Hartley Act went into effect, or approximately that, we went to a great deal of trouble to try to have some limitation on the use of the moneys in the fund, and we used the words "for distress or need derived directly from service in the industry." I think that that is a fair basis on which that fund should apply, but at the present time there is no limitation. The moneys can be spent at the individual discretion of the administrators, and can be spent for any purpose, and for anything under the shining sun that has nothing to do with the industry itself, and I do not believe you agree that the coal industry or any other industry can accept the full responsibility for all of the ills of man, regardless of their derivation.

I think this discussion that was on here before got a little bit at sea. The arguments last year, and the court case that was finally resolved by Justice Goldsborough, was all on a matter of determining a limitation, and a proper use and was not a matter of elimination. I would like to point that out to you very carefully, because I think it is important.

And so, we get to the point of how much money can the coal industry afford and still stay competitive in our field economy. I think that is the basic problem in any industry.

Would you agree with me, sir? I am not trying to ask you a question. Would you not agree the use of such funds should be limited to the need and distress derived from service in the industry, rather than the payment—and I am now using a hypothetical case, but suppose we take a woman who may very well need the money, but whose husband was killed by an automobile accident in 1932. That is the sort of thing that gets us distorted, and the Lord knows, as some of the members know, the attitude in the coal industry is complicated enough all by itself.

And then we get to the question of pensions. It is hard for me to determine in my own mind, after being in other industries and coming into the coal industry as I have, and having knocked my head on the contracts for the last 20 years, to understand why a coal miner in perfectly good health, 65 years old, or 62 years old, should receive $100 a month in addition to the social-security benefits he would normally receive. Why is it there should be a union membership group—and the money comes out of our economy; it cannot come from anywhere else—be approved and apply under those circumstances? I think if we take those facts into consideration in our approach to this, it becomes a little more clarified and a little more easy to approach. I am trying to be helpful.

Mr. LESINSKI. Is it not a fact where the northern operators have signed a contract, the southern operators have always balked at signing a contract?

Mr. MOODY. That is not so.

Mr. LESINSKI. That is not the way the newspapers have carried the story. Of course, we get all of our stories from the newspapers.

Mr. MOODY. I think I outlined a condition in 1947 or 1948 paralleling it by dates, and giving the attitudes in the ultimate arrival at the contract.

Mr. LESINSKI. Is it not a fact that your previous strikes all started over certain conditions in the mines? Most of the mine owners who are not unionized did not abide by either Government laws or State laws as far as safety devices are concerned, standards, and so on, which are necessary to operate a modern mine, and that was one of your troubles, and this is why that disaster resulted?

Mr. MOODY. I do not represent Illinois or Indiana, and I do not have anything to do with the Centralia area or the Oldenburg area, but down in our neck of the woods I think we do adhere to the safety code and safety practices as properly as we can. But if you have in mines——

Mr. LESINSKI. I only have one more question to ask.

Mr. KELLEY. You have only 1 minute.

Mr. LESINSKI. Does the gentleman agree to the matter read here by Mr. Bailey—Mr. Thurman's statement—that this committee has not been fair to the operators?

Mr. MOODY. I am not just sure how you are applying this. You are referring to a telegram that was sent to Mr. Bailey by our secretary?

Mr. LESINSKI. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOODY. I think he said there that he thought the refusal to have us appear was unfair and, of course, that has all gone, and is all washed out, as far as we are concerned, because we are here, and certainly the appearance before the committee and the courtesy that has been shown us has been anything but unfair; it certainly has my compliments.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. In connection with the very much discussed newspaper article there is some question there which has not been commented on, and that is that the committee had already made up its mind to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act. I think I can assure you they have made up their minds to repeal it.

You stated that an individual did not have any vested interest in this welfare fund; is that correct?

Mr. HALEY. That is correct.

Mr. SMITH. As to whether any study has been made, based upon the turn-over in the coal-mining industry, as to how much funds will develop in the turn-over, where a man will work, maybe, 2 years and then quit and go to some other occupation. I wonder if any study has been made in that field as to how much the turn-over will be in this fund by reason of that?

Mr. HALEY. If such studies have been made I have no knowledge of them. They may have been made by the trustees.

Mr. SMITH. What would be your idea about that? Would that grow into a very large fund just from that one factor alone?

Mr. HALEY. From what little I know about the cost of private pension plans and elementary acturial problems, I would say it would require quite a substantial fund; but as I say, I have very little knowledge or information on the subject.

Mr. SMITH. Now, I want to know this. Does the miner who is entitled to the benefits of this welfare plan also receive the benefits of workmen's compensation in addition thereto?

Mr. HALEY. Of course.

Mr. SMITH. Then in other words, this miner who gets into a mine and works in a mine will have the benefit of not only the State compensation laws, he will have the benefits of this old-age pension and social security, and in addition to that, he will have the wefare fund. In other words, here is a special class of citizens that are entitled to three benefits; is that correct?

Mr. HALEY. That is correct. This sets up union members in a special type of preferred class, from the standpoint of social security.

Mr. SMITH. What sort of arrangements do they have to determine the justice of these benefits?

Mr. HALEY. I do not know.

Mr. SMITH. Who is going to determine whether a man is rightly entitled to, we will say, full and complete disability by reason of his having been a miner and entitled to these welfare funds?

Mr. HALEY. The union, as a practical matter, determines that.

Mr. SMITH. Do you think that a union can determine those matters in view of the broad experience of workmen's compensation laws in one factor alone, that of malingering?

Mr. HALEY. I do not think so. I think the central union welfare fund is a very unwholesome thing from the standpoint of the Nation and the standpoint of the individual.

Mr. SMITH. Just from the standpoint of the malingering factor, that is one of the big problems in the administration of all the workmen's compensation funds, is it not?

Mr. HALEY. It is.

Mr. SMITH. Do you think that will come to be one of the big problems here in this fund?

Mr. HALEY. It no doubt will be, if it is not already.

Mr. SMITH. I have no further questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Haley, how many men are engaged in the mining of coal, in round numbers?

Mr. HALEY. Three hundred and fifty thousand to four hundred thousand.

Mr. WERDEL. And does that cover the whole industry or just that part that you are acquainted with?

Mr. HALEY. That covers the national coal industry, the whole industry.

Mr. WERDEL. And are all those men represented by the same bargaining agent in the coal industry?

Mr. HALEY. Not all of the men in the coal industry are represented by the same bargaining agent, but the very great majority of them are. There are some nonunion operations in the United States, and a number of mines in the State of Illinois, principally, are organized by the Progressive Miners of America, an A. F. of L. affiliate. But approximately 90 percent, I assume, are members of the United Mine Workers of America.

Mr. WERDEL. Suppose your country-wide bargaining agent represents the employees of your employers. Are they all dealt with on a Nation-wide basis? That is, do they bargain on an industry-wide scale?

Mr. HALEY. On behalf of the employees; yes.

Mr. WERDEL. And the wage rate is rather uniform, then, for all of those: is that correct?

Mr. HALEY. It is uniform according to a standard. That is, there is a certain standard rate, and all other rates are related to that, up or down. Of course, there are many different wage rates in the coal industry, but they all bear a direct relationship to each other in all of the mines operated by employers of employees who are members of the United Mine Workers of America.

Mr. WERDEL. Can you give us a rough idea of that wage scale in dollars and cents now?

Mr. HALEY. For the full contract day, today, I believe the rate is $14.05 per day for an 8-hour day, including travel time.

Mr. WERDEL. And that is the minimum wage or the average wage, or what?

Mr. HALEY. That is the minimum inside day rate, I believe it is called. There are many who make more than that, of course.

Mr. WERDEL. And do you have the welfare fund on top of that?

Mr. HALEY. That is correct.

Mr. WERDEL. Do you have any idea, if you leave out the value of coal in place in the ground, what percentage of the total cost of producing a ton of coal is the labor cost?

Mr. HALEY. Approximately two-thirds.

Mr. WERDEL. Approximately 66⅔ percent?

Mr. HALEY. That is correct.

Mr. WERDEL. What is the cost of a ton of coal today?

Mr. HALEY. I do not know.

Mr. WERDEL. The people you represent, I take it, are all covered in their contracts on an industry-wide basis, so far as the employees are concerned?

Mr. HALEY. No. I am general counsel of the National Coal Association, which has in its membership a few nonunion mines and some Progressive Mine Workers, but most of the mines owned by the employers I represent are operated by the United Mine Workers.

Mr. WERDEL. May I ask you, Mr. Moody, are all companies dealt with on an industry-wide basis when they enter into a contract?

Mr. MOODY. You see, we represent the southern section of the industry, which covers West Virginia, Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

Mr. WERDEL. I see.

Mr. MOODY. So that our group is covered by one contract.

Mr. WERDEL. I see.

Mr. MOODY. And that is 115,000 men. All of our members are under the contract and are union mines. Now, in the territory there are nonunion mines. Last year I think the Ohio Coal Association estimated that at one time 27 percent of the Ohio coal was nonunion, but that is not true in the southern area.

Mr. WERDEL. Do you have any knowledge as to whether or not industry-wide bargaining in the coal industry has a deterring effect on new men opening up coal mines and becoming competitive?

Mr. MOODY. It would be hard for me to answer your question the way you put it, because I do not happen to know of specific instances. But quite obviously, because of the character of the coal industry, there are major differences in different sections of the industry. So industry-wide bargaining does not take into consideration those differences, and it would be far better if the contracts could apply to these major sections. They would do a better job by applying to the conditions in those sections rather than on a Nation-wide basis, where you have to cover everything from a seam that is 40 feet thick in Wyoming to 32 inches in southern Kentucky, and there is just an entirely different geological nature, such as in your big strip mines, in some instances, against your underground mines, and all.

So there are differences within certain districts. The western Pennsylvania and Ohio district is fairly cohesive in itself. Then the southern group is another group. It is determined, too, by your markets, freight rates, and other things that tend to complicate that picture, and that is why I could not answer you directly on your question.

Mr. WERDEL. You do favor industry-wide bargaining?

Mr. MOODY. No. I favor the negotiation of contracts in accordance with regions, the regions that have some cohesiveness, and an interest within the group caused by various methods of mining, by freight rates, and markets and type of coal, and so forth.

Mr. WERDEL. Do you agree that in the event that we have industry-wide bargaining in the coal industry where you are producing from raw materials, it would tend, at least, to destroy competition and leave that field only to those men who are big enough to be in and stay in it?

Mr. MOODY. It tends to do that anywhere where you run into industry-wide bargaining, whether it be in the coal industry, automobile industry, steel industry, or anywhere else.

Mr. WERDEL. Were you gentlemen the ones who appeared before one of our House committees a while back to get some of the Marshall plan money earmarked for 100,000,000 tons of coal?

Mr. MOODY. No; I was not. I know that.

Mr. HALEY. I did not appear, but someone from our organization did appear, or someone representing the coal industry did appear, before one of the subcommittees of the House on that general subject, but certainly not in the way in which the Congressman indicated.

Mr. WERDEL. I did not want to indicate either way, because I was not there. I am wondering did you take the position that we should decide to help the coal industry with tax money because of the condition the industry is in at the present time. Is that the position that the industry took, do you know?

Mr. HALEY. No, sir. The industry does not take that position, and did not.

Mr. WERDEL. My time is running short.

Mr. KELLEY. You have 2 minutes, Mr. Werdel.

Mr. WERDEL. On page 12 of Mr. Moody's report, you make the statement:

> We do not take the position that the Taft-Hartley Act is perfect and we agree that as experience demonstrates the need for changes, they should be adopted.

You have been entering into more or less of a debate with the committee today, and you have not expressed what you believe are the desired changes, if you have made up your mind on the subject.

Mr. MOODY. I do not believe I can answer that in two minutes. I do not believe I can answer it in the order of one, two, three and four. I mentioned in there that there are minor changes that just have not worked out the way they were intended. As was indicated by another witness earlier, the matter of elections on the union shop turned out to be a help to the unions in organizing and establishing union shop provisions within a contract, rather than to do what it was supposed to do, to give an expression of will on the part of individuals, because the Taft-Hartley Act is primarily for the protection of the individual, and I think we forget that sometimes. We, as employers, tend to think we are given this and given that, and the unions the same thing. Well, actually, the thing was written to protect the individual union worker, and so far he has not had very much to say on that.

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Moody, my time is practically exhausted. We are interested in having your statement, though, if you desire to make one, as to what changes ought to be made in the Taft-Hartley Act. I would appreciate it if you would supply them for the record or for members of the committee.

Mr. MOODY. I would be very glad to.

Mr. WERDEL. Thank you.

Mr. MOODY. May I say just one thing?

Mr. KELLEY. Do you wish to do that?

Mr. MOODY. Why, certainly, if the gentleman asks me to.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Chairman, in my statement I took no position on changing the law except with respect to treatment of central union welfare funds. I think that should be repealed.

Mr. KELLEY. All time has expired.

Thank you very much.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, pardon me, sir. May I say just one sentence?

In the testimony which the southern coal producers gave before the Senate committee, a request was made through Senator Morse to John Gall, our counsel, to write up in detail the treatise on the use of injunctions in labor situations. I do not know whether it is of specific interest to you. Quite a few people think that it is. If the chairman would like, I would be glad to give a copy to you, and you may determine whether you want to put it in the record or not.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes. Without objection, you may.

Mr. MOODY. I can supply additional copies if you wish.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, we will accept it.

(The brief referred to was filed with the committee for reference.)

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you very much gentlemen.

Mr. HALEY. Thank you.

Mr. KELLEY. I have a request from the New Jersey State Board of Mediation to have a brief put in the record and, without objection, it will be so ordered.

(The brief referred to is as follows:)

BRIEF ON BEHALF OF STATES HAVING MEDIATION AND CONCILIATION SERVICES

It is not my intention to comment pro or con on the merits of the administration labor-relations bill introduced in the House by Congressman Lesinski except insofar as that bill affects the efficiency of this board and other States that have conciliation and mediation services. On January 21, 1949, those States having mediation and conciliation services met in Newark, N. J. under the auspices of the State of New Jersey. At this meeting, it was unanimously agreed that the efforts of the representatives of the States in urging Members of Congress to enact in the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, section 8 (d) (3) and section 203 (b) had contributed substantially to the effectiveness of the State services to labor, management, and the public.

Section 8 (d) (3) provides that a party desiring to terminate or modify a contract notify "* * * the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service within thirty days after such notice of the existence of a dispute, and simultaneously therewith notifies any State or Territorial agency established to mediate and conciliate disputes within the State or Territory where the dispute occurred, provided no agreement has been reached by that time; * * *" [italics supplied.]

Section 203 (b) provides that "The Service may proffer its services in any labor dispute in any industry affecting commerce, either upon its own motion or upon the request of one or more of the parties to the dispute, whenever in its judgment such dispute threatens to cause a substantial interruption of commerce. The Director and the Service are directed to avoid attempting to mediate disputes which would have only a minor effect on interstate commerce if State or other conciliation services are available to the parties. Whenever the Service does proffer its services in any dispute, it shall be the duty of the Service promptly to put itself in communication with the parties and to use its best efforts, by mediation and conciliation, to bring them to agreement."

Undoubtedly, the philosophy underlying the foregoing sections was the recognition that, so far as labor disputes are concerned, they are more likely to be amicably adjusted by local people than persons representing the Federal Government. The bill pending before your committee would reverse completely the wholesome trend expressed in these sections of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 providing for a duplicate notice to the State services and of reserving to the States the problems arising in all labor disputes except those having a major effect on commerce.

May I urge you that it is absolutely essential to State services, if they are to continue to give effective service at the State level, that the sections 8 (d) (3) and 203 (b) of the current law be preserved.

Respectfully submitted on behalf of the States having mediation and conciliation services.

WALTER P. MARGETTS, Jr.,
Chairman, New Jersey State Board of Mediation.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Reilly, you have two statements. Are you going to read both of them?

Mr. REILLY. No; I thought I would summarize them, sir. What has happened is this: The printing industry applied for time and the committee granted it. Subsequently the Inland Daily Press Association did so, and the schedule of witnesses have been pretty much made up by your office, sir, and Mr. Jarosz very kindly arranged for it.

Mr. KELLEY. Let me get this straight, Mr. Reilly. Then you are going to summarize a a statement? We have allotted time to the Inland Daily Press. That is the time that has been allotted to you, the Inland Daily Press.

Now, we could not very well accept the other one. The other one was the Printing Industry of America.

Mr. REILLY. Yes, the Printing Industry of America had applied for time and Mr. Henry, their president, had applied for time, and then the Inland Daily Press Association was not on the list because Mr. Jarosz said their application came too late.

Mr. KELLEY. Which one are you going to read, or which one are you going to summarize?

Mr. REILLY. I was going to read the statement on behalf of the Printing Industry of America, sir, because Mr. Henry could not come. He asked me if I would read his statement. I appeared as counsel in the printing industry litigation last year and also in the newspaper litigation.

Mr. KELLEY. Let us do this. You refer, then, to the Printing Industry of America and submit the statement from the Inland Daily Press for the record.

Mr. REILLY. Whatever is more agreeable to you, sir.

Here is the statement from the Inland Daily Press Association.

(The statement referred to is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF GERARD D. REILLY ON BEHALF OF THE INLAND DAILY PRESS ASSOCIATION

Mr. Chairman, my name is Gerard D. Reilly, and I am appearing before your committee on behalf of the Inland Daily Press Association, for which I am counsel. This association is composed of 422 daily newspapers published in 19 cities. Although 21 of the member papers have a daily circulation in excess of 100,000, the Inland is predominantly composed of small newspapers, 300 of its member papers having a daily circulation of 15,000 or less. At the conclusion of my remarks, I shall offer for the record a list of the American newspaper members of this association.

I am appearing before your committee pursuant to an authorizing resolution of the general membership of the Inland assembled in convention on February 15, 1949, which took note of the fact that "the action of many members of the Inland Daily Press Association has been assailed improperly and their position grossly misrepresented in testimony before the United States Senate committee considering" certain proposed legislation defining the legal rights and obligations of management and labor in their relationship with each other and with the public.

This reference is to the testimony of Mr. Woodruff Randolph, president of the International Typographical Union (referred to herein as the ITU) before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare on February 10, 1949.

Although the Inland has no disposition to transfer to this committee the extensive litigation before the National Labor Relations Board and the courts which has resulted from the so-called "collective-bargaining policies" adopted by the ITU at its annual convention in 1947, we believe that the record should not be permitted to stand uncorrected concerning the essential characteristics of the labor-management problems which exist in the newspaper-publishing business—and indeed all phases of the printing industry—as a result of the ITU's insistence upon the maintenance of practices which it deems vital to its continued existence.

These practices present classic illustrations of problems vital not merely to employers and employees, but to the whole public. We think this committee should have some understanding of the realities of these practices and their effects, if it is to attempt to legislate in the interests of all the public and not merely a special-interest group.

Despite the continued repetition of ancient cliches concerning the overwhelming economic power of employers, the hundreds of small newspaper publisher members of the Inland have first-hand knowledge of the inescapable fact that under its present leadership and policies, the ITU has established a virtual stranglehold on newspaper composing rooms in many cities, that it exercises uncontrolled power over the number of persons who may pursue the trade, and that employers and the public to a large extent are at the mercy of the ITU in its demands for the maintenance of the practices by which this excessive power was achieved and maintained.

Mr. Randolph has testified before the Senate committee of the "agonizing experience of the ITU under the Taft-Hartley Act." He has told that committee that the Taft-Hartley Act "makes impossible the attainment of [certain] objectives and thereby makes free trade-unionism impossible". The ITU objectives to which he refers are these:

(1) "An insistence upon respect for the rules laid down by our members concerning the conditions upon which they will sell their services, in order that each union member may democratically and directly participate in determining those conditions."

By this he means an insistence that all employers recognize and acquiesce in the ITU laws which govern a wide area of subjects relating to hours of work and working conditions which are the kind of subjects upon which the Wagner Act required employers to bargain in good faith with unions and upon which the Taft-Hartley Act requires both employers and unions to bargain instead of asserting demands on a take it or leave it basis.

(2) "The refusal to work with competing nonunion men whose willingness to work at lower wages and under substandard conditions threatens each member of our union."

This is a longer way of saying that the ITU insists on maintaining the closed shop. We are not opposing compulsory membership contracts as such, but as we will make clear later, our experience with the ITU demonstrates the need for some safeguards.

(3) "An insistence upon respect for our jurisdiction in order that craft standards may not be undermined by the assignment of work to lower-paid and inferior craftsmen."

This objective refers to the ITU's insistence on its own unilateral right to define its own jurisdiction, that is, its unrestricted right to dictate what work shall be performed only by ITU members on a closed shop basis. One of the ITU's recent exercises of this right was an action taken at its 1947 convention asserting jurisdiction over all operators of typewriters.

(4) "The refusal to work on struck or substandard goods produced under sweatshop conditions."

This refers to the ITU insistence upon its right to boycott the product of any employer who does not maintain an ITU closed shop.

According to Mr. Randolph, the Taft-Hartley law, by making impossible the attainment of these objectives, in effect "denies the right to strike whenever an object of a strike is to preserve the union." Of course, he does not attempt to indicate how it is that the four other printing-trades unions, one of which, the International Printing Pressmen, is actually larger than the ITU, have been able to comply with the statute without suffering any diminution in membership or prestige. Members of these unions emerged from the operations of the act thus far without strikes and with higher wage standards than they ever enjoyed before, unimpaired by defense assessments.

Mr. Randolph has also asserted that as a result of the Taft-Hartley law and its prohibition against the major cornerstones of ITU policy, thus arming employers with "various alternatives than an employer might use [to] destroy the craft" (Tr. 2983), the peace which reigned before and during the Wagner Act, has given way to a war in which the ITU has been compelled to spend over "$11,000,000 of members' hard-earned dues in support of strikes and other defense activities to preserve the union against the Taft-Hartley Act."

of peace has no basis in actual fact. It is Mr. Randolph's thesis that industrial peace prevailed among the mechanical trades in the printing and publishing industries until the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act. The truth of the matter is that the 20-year period preceding the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act was indeed one unmarred by any appreciable number of strikes or lockouts so far as most of the mechanical trades were concerned. This situation continued after the act but there was always one exception both before and after the act was passed. This was the ITU. With the ascendency of new leadership in 1944 the ITU precipitated warfare by insisting that important working conditions be established in accordance with its own laws and not by collective bargaining. The resistance of the publishing industry to a program so hostile to the spirit of the Wagner Act resulted in 40 ITU strikes between 1944 and 1947. After the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act ITU strikes continued. The issues were essentially the same, however. The only difference was that the new act for the first time gave employers some legal recourse.

In this connection, this committee should take note of the facts concerning the outstanding strike against all the principal daily newspapers published in Chicago. At one point in his testimony before the Senate committee Mr. Randolph frankly stated that the strike on the Chicago newspapers is "a strike against this law [the Taft-Hartley Act]." However, he quickly revised his testimony to state that "the strike in Chicago was for a wage rate only, and every day since that strike has been in effect the publishers have known that the members of that union would return to work if they paid a fair rate of wages, and no other conditions attached to that vote of wages."

Actually, of course, Mr. Randolph was right the first time. The trial examiner of the National Labor Relations Board who heard all the evidence concerning these strikes had this to say about the Chicago strike (intermediate report of Trial Examiner Arthur Leff, NLRB Case No. 13–CB–6, p. 8) :

"In this case, the union's good faith can be tested quite independently of the position taken by the publishers in the negotiations. The record is clear that [the ITU and its Chicago locals] refusal prior to October 21 to enter into any contract at all, and its alternate position thereafter for a contract terminable within the minimum period allowed by law, was neither provoked by nor related to the refusal of the publishers to discuss wages or to submit a complete counterproposal. It was traceable directly to the bargaining policy adopted at the 1947 ITU convention, as that policy was interpreted, construed and applied by the ITU executive council."

It is of great importance, we believe, to understand clearly what these 4 basic so-called rights are that the ITU claims to be absolutely necessary if it is to maintain its life. They are in effect (1) the right to exclude any nonmember of the ITU from the opportunity of pursuing the printing trade in the majority of printing and publishing establishments, (2) the right to exact submission to a wide range of working conditions without any collective bargaining at all, (3) the right by its own fiat to determine its jurisdiction, i. e., to determine when and where whole classes of workers (frequently represented by other unions of their choice) shall be dismissed to make room for ITU members, and (4) the right to force employers of ITU men to boycott the products of other employers who do not operate ITU closed shops.

This description of a completely uncontrolled monopoly is not the biased characterization of reactionary employers. It is the ITU president's own conception of the four principles upon which voluntary trade-unionism is necessarily based.

During the course of his testimony before the Senate committee Mr. Randolph undertook to explain at some length the background of the close-shop tradition in his union, the way it operates; and its salutary effects. He pointed out that the closed shop is a matter of almost religious principle, a matter of faith. He assured that committee, as he presumably will assure your committee, that the ITU version of the closed shop is necessary to maintain high standards of skill in the trade and that it has operated to keep available a supply of competent people available for hiring by employers. As for any problems concerning the restriction of opportunities available for men seeking to practice the trade who will not or cannot become a member of the ITU, Mr. Randolph brushed these aside, asserting that nonmembers of the ITU can always work in nonunion shops and that employers who feel they cannot submit to all the limitations imposed by the ITU law are entirely free to operate a nonunion shop.

We think this picture of conditions in the publishing and printing industries requires some examination.

The fact is, of course, that the great majority of the newspaper composing rooms of the country are operated by union men—ITU men—and that they could not be operated except by hiring ITU men. And it is no part of our purpose that they should not be manned by union men. But the ITU system, bulwarked by the four principles described by Mr. Randolph, is designed to operate and has operated to create an artificial and tightly controlled scarcity of compositors who are available to do the composing-room work required by the newspaper and commercial printing industries.

It is simply not the fact that, except for the war years, there is an ample supply of compositors available. Mr. Randolph's testimony before the Senate committee and before other bodies makes this abundantly clear. At a hearing before a trial examiner of the National Labor Relations Board in Baltimore last year, Randolph testified that the union consisted of 4,000 apprentices and 73,000 journeymen. More than 2,000 journeymen quit the trade each year because of death, retirment, or other causes. Under the ITU rules the period of apprenticeship has been extended from 4 to 6 years, which means that if the ITU were to be kept even at its present inadequate membership the number of apprentices should be tripled.

The insufficiency of the present membership of the ITU is shown by Randolph's testimony before the Senate committee to the effect that the ITU has not assumed to supply enough journeymen "to give a man adequate supply of printers that would prevent the working of overtime." Indeed, Mr. Randolph testified that it would be unreasonable to permit a sufficient supply of journeymen printers to perform the normal printing requirements of the country without regularly performing overtime work at overtime rates.

A moment's reflection on the official ITU position will reveal that the reason why its four basically monopolistic foundations are deemed so vital to its existence is that the artificial maintenance of a scarcity of printers is its basic objective. Mr. Randolph refers to the almost religious aversion of union men to working alongside nonunion men. Yet he spurns the use of the union-shop provisions of the present Taft-Hartley Act which in almost every case would make it unnecessary for an ITU man to work alongside a non-ITU man. But the union-shop provision of the present act would not make it possible for the ITU to perpetuate its essentially "closed union" which is the weapon by which artificial scarcity is maintained.

We believe that the maintenance of such artificial scarcity by the closed shop and boycott are unhealthy monopoly practices when practiced by aggregations of union power. They are just as harmful to the public interest as artificial shortages created by monopolistic aggregations of corporate power. It is for this reason that we urge this committee not to take a step backward by abandoning all control of the closed shop and the closed union.

The methods by which artificial scarcity is maintained by the ITU system is further illuminated by reference to Mr. Randolph's assurance to the Senate committee that it need have no fear of abuse of the great economic powers concentrated in ITU hands. To employees seeking to practice the printing trade who cannot or may not wish to become members of the ITU, and to employers who cannot or do not wish to submit to the requirements of ITU laws which prescribe the number of printers, overtime rates, hours of work, and the like which he must maintain if he is to get printing done, Mr. Randolph says, in effect, these people are free to get employment in and to operate nonunion shops. He offers, of course, a Hobson's choice, because by the ITU's basic principle of wielding the secondary boycott and strike, the lot of non-ITU employees and employers is economic warfare. The ITU insists on maintaining its right to put such employers out of business and such employees out of work by forcing ITU employers to refuse to do business with non-ITU shops or even ITU shops which do not submit to ITU demands.

The ITU insistence upon the right to refuse to work on unfair goods in practice is nothing more than the insistence on the right, by secondary boycott, to maintain its own monopoly control of the supply of available printers.

The economic power which the ITU is able to wield as a result of the artificial scarcity created by the weapons of the closed shop, closed union, secondary boycott and definition of its own jurisdiction, displays all the characteristics of monopoly power wherever exercised and by whomever exercised.

The power thus achieved is used, for example, to require regular payments of wages at overtime rates to employees already enjoying the highest basic wage rates. It is used to exact submission to the utmost uneconomic and foolish of featherbedding practices. The institution of bogus in the printing field, and particularly at a time when it is impossible to obtain sufficient printers to turn out production work, is so obviously a product of monopoly control in its worst form that we need do no more than mention it.

Much of the advertising matter used in newspapers is not set up in the composing room of the newspaper. Instead it is frequently set in the composing rooms of commercial printing shops after which mats are made and these mats may be furnished to several newspapers for use. For many years the ITU has required that advertising material carried in a newspaper, even though set elsewhere and printed from a mat, must be reset in the composing room of the newspapers. This requirement is equally applicable whether the original composition from which the mat was made was set by ITU printers or not. The resetting in the newspaper composing room almost always occurs long after the advertisement has appeared in the newspaper and been forgotten. Nevertheless, the ITU requires that this material be reset by newspaper compositors, not infrequently at overtime rates. Proofs of the composition are drawn, proofread, corrected, and consigned to the wastebasket. The type is consigned to the hellbox. This wasteful, useless, and foolish process is appropriately known to printers and employers alike as bogus.

Our purpose in commenting on Mr. Randolph's testimony and seeking to correct and give some suggestions of the realities of life in the newspaper-publishing field are prompted by no desire to wreck the ITU or any other union. But the structure of the ITU is one which, we believe, testifies eloquently to grave abuses harmful to the public and to basic national policies relating to labor-management relations and to the fundamental conditions within which our economic life is to be carried on.

We do not believe that the life or even the health of free, voluntary trade-unionism depends in any measure upon the right to exercise the weapons which the ITU deems vital. These are the weapons of monopoly, not the weapons of free trade-unionism. In our judgment the present draft of H. R. 2032, by abandoning all effective curbs on monopoly practices of this character would, if enacted, be a disservice to free trade-unionism, to individual workers, to employers, and to the whole public. We therefore urge that any bill reported by this committee should contain the following points:

(1) A duty to bargain both on the part of management and labor unions so that powerful unions can no longer by threatening to withhold the services of their members compel employers to abide by union rules on working conditions which have been unilaterally promulgated.

(2) Access to the courts either by the Government or by the parties aggrieved for expeditious relief against threatened economic damage by reason of such union practices as the secondary boycott, the jurisdictional strike, or work stoppages to impose illegal conditions.

(3) A prohibition against insistence upon such wasteful make-work practices as the reproduction of unnecessary type.

(4) A prohibition against union coercion of employees in the freedom of choice and organizational matters guaranteed by the act and coercion of management in the selection of its supervisory and bargaining representatives.

(5) Protection against the abuse of the closed shop to create artificial scarcities of labor by denying qualified workers an opportunity to work at their trade.

(6) A definition of the term "employee" which would make it clear that newspapers do not have to deal collectively with retailers and distributors who are in fact independent contractors and not subject to the normal incidents of control which are characteristic of a true employer-employee relationship.

Mr. REILLY. May I also submit, Mr. Chairman, a list of the newspapers which belong to the Inland Daily Press Association?

Mr. KELLEY. The list will be received and filed for reference.

Are you going to read the statement for the printing industry or summarize it?

Mr. REILLY. I shall summarize parts of it.

TESTIMONY OF GERARD D. REILLY, SPECIAL COUNSEL, PRINTING INDUSTRY OF AMERICA, INC.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, my name is Gerard D. Reilly, and I appear before the committee on behalf of the Printing Industry of America, Inc., the national trade association of the commercial printing industry. This association is to the best of our knowledge the largest group of small manufacturers in the country. Among our 3,600 members are companies producing a substantial percentage of the more than $2,000,000,000 annual volume of commercial printing and employing about 300,000 workers. Commercial printing includes books, magazines, pamphlets, letterheads, and literally hundred of thousands of advertising and utility items. The commercial printing industry deals with some of the oldest and most thoroughly entrenched trade-unions in the United States and a good portion of the industry has engaged in collective bargaining for 50 years or more.

When most persons, and I include Members of Congress in that group, think of collective bargaining, they think in terms of the labor relations of the very largest corporations employing thousands of workers. They, therefore, may tend to lose sight of the position of the smaller businesses or of the industries made up of smaller units. The average commercial printing plant in the United States employes fewer than 25 workers and has an annual volume of between 150 to 250 thousand dollars. It has limited assets and cannot withstand excessive pressure from the unions. On the other hand, the unions with which it deals are international unions, having many thousands of members and substantial treasuries. The problem of the small-businessman in printing, therefore, is how to maintain some semblance of equality unless the law imposes corresponding duties and obligations upon both employers and labor organizations alike.

Printing has often been pointed to as an example of an industry, which before the Taft-Hartley law, got along ideally with its unions. This impression is entitled to some correction. Actually, if the printing industry seemed to get along ideally with its unions in many instances it was because it did not have the bargaining strength to resist exorbitant demands and the imposition of uneconomic practices. It is worth noting that following the war, when there was a severe shortage of manpower, the unions forced upon the industry the acceptance of the 37½, the 36¼ and in some cases even the 35-hour week. Since it was impossible to expand the working force, all that this meant was that the same men who had been working 40 hours at straight time, worked 36¼ hours at straight time and were paid for the balance of the 40 hours at overtime wages. This, in the face of the fact that our employees have traditionally received among the highest annual earnings of workers in any industry.

Frankly, gentlemen, it is impossible for small business faced by big unions to effectively resist uneconomic demands. Bargaining in the printing industry is not conducted on an industry-wide basis but rather on a single plant or local area basis. Normally, all union plants in a city negotiate through a local employer association. And when we join with other employers into collective bargaining groups we are frequently faced with the union strategy of "divide and conquer." If the negotiation committee does not yield to some demand, the union affected may put pressure on individual plants to repudiate their bargaining agent.

Moreover, the growing trend toward centralization in the printing unions indicates that the main provisions of many contracts are not arrived at by collective bargaining but by rules imposed on the local by the international. Consequently, this trend, together with the fact that the Wagner Act imposed a duty to bargain only upon one side, placed the employers in our industry at a serious disadvantage.

Of course, prior to the Wagner Act it might have been contended that since Federal law placed no employer under an obligation to bargain, the unions were also justified in their policy. Even after that Act became law, however, some of these unions still reserved the right to impose working conditions unilaterally. For example, the general laws of the International Typographical Union fix the ratio of apprentices to journeymen, set overtime rates, lay down rigid rules for hiring and discharging, provide for a closed shop, define standards with respect to seniority and establish rules of conduct for the foreman, who must be a member of the union. Although all of these matters are of vital importance to us, none of them are bargainable or even subject to arbitration. Section 2, article III, of these ITU general laws reads:

> No local union shall sign a contract guaranteeing its members to work for any proprietor, firm, or corporation, unless such contract is in accordance with international law and approved by the international president.

In other words, such union laws have been constantly narrowing the area of bargaining by preventing employers and locals in their negotiations from arriving at any agreement unless the employer is willing to agree to all the "must" rules of the international.

True collective bargaining can exist only when there is relative equality at the bargaining table. We do not ask that any special preference be given to the employers. We do ask that in any labor legislation that is written, the obligations, responsibilities and rights of the parties be the same.

Our industry proposes that any Federal labor relations act which the Congress may adopt should incorporate five basic requirements which are vital to the protection of our industry. These protections would be equally helpful in other industries where the same conditions may exist. None of these protections would be afforded by the bill, H. R. 2032, introduced by the chairman.

The basic protective features which we believe should be incorporated in legislation are:

(1) A mutual obligation of employer and union to bargain collectively in good faith;

(2) The right of employers and unions to the exercise of free speech in labor relations matters should be expressly recognized by law;

(3) Effective prohibition against jurisdictional dispute strikes;

(4) A requirement that unions permit qualified workers to be employed; and

(5) Effective prohibition against secondary boycott.

I shall comment briefly on each of these essential features.

With respect to the mutual obligation of the unions and employers to bargain collectively, in our judgment, the pending bill is strongly defective in omitting from the list of unfair practices by unions a refusal on the part of the employee representative to bargain collectively in good faith with an employer. Bargaining requires the participation of both parties to the agreement. The employer alone cannot bargain nor can he alone prevent labor strife. We have seen in our industry the disastrous consequences of the employer trying to bargain with a union which refused. We ask that you place in this bill specific language to insure that both parties have a legal duty to bargain collectively.

So far as we know no responsible person has offered any reason why good faith collective bargaining should not be an obligation enjoined upon employers and unions alike. Indeed since our national labor relations policy for 14 years has been to rely upon the process of collective bargaining to achieve industrial peace and the uninterrupted flow of goods and services, it is unthinkable that anyone could seriously resist the idea that the obligation to bargain in good faith should be imposed on both sides of the bargaining table. The only defense of the provisions of the present bill and of the Wagner Act, which impose an obligation to bargain collectively only on employers, is the argument advanced by the Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in support of the provisions of S. 249 which correspond to the provisions of the bill now before this committee. During the course of his testimony, Mr. Herzog was asked whether he saw any reason why a union should not be compelled to bargain collectively just like an employer. He replied:

> No very basic fundamental reason, Senator. We have had rather few cases involving that. * * * It was thought by him that a provision of that kind was partly surplusage because of the fact that labor organizations, unlike employers, are created for the very purpose of bargaining, so that in most cases they would.

Unfortunately, the melancholy labor relations history of our industry in recent years demonstrates that no matter for what purposes unions were originally organized, some unions today are perfectly willing to repudiate the collective bargaining process when they feel that they can more easily accomplish their objectives by economic force. We do not believe that Mr. Herzog would have said this were he familiar with the details of the ITU cases which are now pending before the Board. It should not be forgotten that there has been pending before this Board since the summer of 1948 five cases involving the refusal of the International Typographical Union to bargain collectively, including one in which that union among other things is charged and found guilty by the Board's trial examiner, of refusing to bargain collectively with the members of the printing industry in the six major printing centers of the country.

At its 1947 annual convention this union formally adopted a policy, binding upon all its local unions, of refusing to enter into contracts with employers in the printing industry and as a consequence collective bargaining in this industry completely disappeared for many, many months. As President Randolph of the ITU pointed out on many occasions both during and after the 1947 ITU convention, he felt that since the union could not preserve by legal collective-bargaining contracts the restrictive practices by which it has retained a monopolistic control over the supply of compositors in the United States, it was necessary to repudiate the process of collective bargaining and, instead, by economic force impose upon employers conditions of employment under which ITU members shall work. And if employers resisted this unilateral imposition of conditions of employment they were confronted with the alternative of crippling strikes. In our judgment the only solution to this problem is a mutual obligation on all parties to bargain in good faith.

and the right to present to their employees, who may or may not be members of a union, economic facts, arguments, and opinions to counter such economic data or arguments as the union may be advancing. While there is no specific prohibition against such free speech in the bill before this committee, the fact that such a right is guaranteed by existing law its omission in a new law might lead the Board to conclude that this bill intends to limit it.

Now, I notice in some of the hearings that Congressman Jacobs has asked some very penetrating questions on the free-speech issue. I do not think his assumptions are altogether correct on this matter. It is true, as he pointed out, that the Wagner Act did not expressly deny to employers the right to express their views, but for many years the Board itself treated the expression of any arguments used by an employer as an unfair labor practice.

The theory was apparently explained in one of the early cases, the Ford case, which was this, that an employer's position that he held was so dominant, as the Board said, the power of economic life or death over his employees, that it gave a great deal of force to his statement. This view was generally upheld by the circuit courts of appeals for many years, but it was not until the American Tube Bending Co. case in 1941, which followed the Supreme Court in the Virginia Electric & Power Co. case, that the Board held that any speech of the employer was not coercion per se.

As a result of that decision, the Board did change its practices, but it ended to hold that any other practice which an employer committed that was unlawful, no matter how remote it was, or how severable, was always an unfair labor practice and therefore made the speech an unfair labor practice. Then the speech was also used in reverse, even though the speech itself was all right, to prove that some action standing alone, which was not an unfair labor practice or would not appear to have been a discriminatory act, that it must have indicated an illegal intent, and therefore amounted to an unfair labor practice.

So I do feel that the retention of a provision somewhat similar, at least, to that in the present act is most desirable if there is to be this freedom of expression in employer-employee relations.

I have spoken of the industry's feeling that there should be some effective decision against jurisdictional disputes and jurisdictional strikes. In the printing trades, where there are six craft unions, the jurisdiction of these unions technically overlaps. Some unions, like the ITU, for example, have a provision in their laws that the union has a right to claim its jurisdiction, that is, to define it unilaterally, and then jurisdictional disputes arise in the development of new processes, particularly in the pressrooms, where both the pressmen and the Amalgamated Photographers claim jurisdiction over offset presses.

Now, I am aware, as Congressman Bailey pointed out, that there is a provision in the pending bill with respect to jurisdictional strikes. To my mind, it is a very ineffective one, for this reason. The jurisdictional strike itself is not prohibited by the pending bill. When such a strike occurs, arbitration can be invoked.

It is not until one of the parties defies the arbitrator's award that it becomes an unfair labor practice. The arbitrator's award also does not become enforcible by injunction, or a right to file for damages. The employer is then entitled to file an unfair-labor-practice charge, have a complaint issued, and then have it processed by the Board.

And then, of course, if one union remain defiant, it is not until the circuit court of appeals enforces the Board's order that there is any effective relief.

Consequently, a jurisdictional dispute under the provisions of this proposed bill might go on for a year and a half.

Under this present act, a jurisdictional strike itself is an unfair labor practice. It is discretionary with the general counsel as to whether he will apply for an injunction or not. It also gives a right to an action for damages. In any event, there are two fairly effective methods of obtaining relief against jurisdictional strikes.

The first jurisdictional-strike section of the present act has been assailed by unions as being unfair. But I think that the argument it used will show that the fear that it is unfair is not justified. For example, the counsel and Mr. Randolph himself have contended before various committees of the House and Senate this section 8 (b) (4) (D) permits an employer, if he is so minded, to dilute the craft by assigning the work either to nonunion, or assigning the less skilled part to persons outside the craft.

What they overlook when they advance that argument are two things. One is that section 8 (a) (3) of the present law, which was taken over from the Wagner Act, makes it an unfair labor practice to discriminate. But even more, section 8 (b) (4) (D) itself has one exception. It makes the jurisdictional strike lawful if the employer assigns the disputed work in violation of a forged certification or order, so that all that any union needs to do to protect itself from the possibility of either assignment of work to nonunion men, or to dilution of the craft through assignment to some semiskilled or unskilled group, is to file a petition for certification and election in advance of there being any trouble. And since the act tends to encourage the Board to find craft units appropriate, a craft should not have any difficulty in obtaining such certification.

With respect to the issue of compulsory union membership, our not inconsiderable experience has sharply emphasized the evils of permitting strongly entrenched unions to determine who may and who may not obtain jobs in an entire industry. By the closed shop plus the closed union, supported by the weapon of the secondary boycott and the assertion of power to determine by its own fiat what work shall be performed exclusively by its own members, the International Typographical Union has been able to achieve virtual monopoly control over the pursuit of the typesetting trade in this country. And true to the pattern of monopolies everywhere, its monopoly power has been used to create artificial shortages in the supply of compositors and accompanying artificially high costs, wasteful featherbedding practices, and the like.

An example of the kind of featherbedding practice which goes on within the industry, for example, is one of the rules which is in the ITU contract, and has to be accepted by every employer who has a contract with an ITU local, and that is the right of the employees in the composing room to reset any mat which comes in, even though the type has been set in another shop, and even in another union shop.

The pending bill proposes to remove all compulsory membership restrictions now contained in the Taft-Hartley law. We do not oppose the elimination from the present law of the union-shop referendum. The experience of our industry has been, since we deal with six of the printing trades unions, that if five unions comply with the law, it is largely a formality, since all of our members, generally speaking, or a substantial majority of them, are union men.

For more than a year our industry has been working under the union-shop provision of the act. To our knowledge no harm has come to any of the unions with which we deal who have entered into this type of union security. It has largely eliminated the closed union without lessening the unions' strength in the plants. Based upon our experience, our industry recommends, with the exception of the section 9 (e) election, that the provisions in the present law relating to union membership as a condition of continued employment remain unchanged.

In passing, I should like to take note of an untenable argument which has been advanced by the opponents of the present provisions of law which prohibit the maintenance of the unrestricted closed shop and closed union.

We have been told by counsel for the ITU, in the course of extensive litigation in the past year, and also in his capacity as a private citizen testifying before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, that labor's objection to the provisions of the present law is that it makes it possible for an employer to fire union men and replace them with nonunion men. The Taft-Hartley Act, of course, authorizes no such conduct. Any employer who undertakes, under the Taft-Hartley Act, to discriminate in matters of hiring or firing against union members, is guilty of an unfair labor practice. What the Taft-Hartley Act does do is to make it illegal for an employer to discriminate in any way, for or against union members, except under union shop contracts, and to make it equally an unfair labor practice for a union to force an employer to discriminate illegally. As I have already pointed out, the union-shop provisions of the act give full freedom to the maintenance of the strength of genuinely open unions. Furthermore, in our industry, the seniority clause contained in all of our contracts effectively prevents any such alleged substitution of employees.

With regard to the secondary boycott, here again there must be some protection for small business against the economic power of a large union. The secondary boycott is used primarily as a substitute for legitimate organization effort by trade unions. If the unions are engaged in a traditional form of trade-unionism, they can organize the unorganized workers and apply for certification as their bargaining agent, under the present act.

Instead, the union says to a union employer, "You may not send or take work from a nonunion shop under threat of a strike or disruption of your plant." This means that the unions penalize those companies with which they have contractual relations as a means of enforcing their will on those companies with which they have no contractual relations. The secondary boycott must be outlawed as most unfair to those very companies which have legitimately engaged in collective bargaining and reached agreements with trade-unions. But, more important, in order to avoid irreparable damage, here again the injured party must have the right to immediate relief.

The secondary boycott provisions of the bill before your committee do not in our view approach a solution of the problems involved. Under the pending bill, for example, employers have a duty to recognize and deal with any union selected by a majority of the employees. Employers, moreover, are forbidden from interfering with or coercing their employees in the exercise of this free choice. Yet the proposed secondary boycott section is so drawn that it could force employers who are faced with a boycott to coerce their employees into joining a union.

What I mean is this. The only kind of secondary boycott which the pending bill forbids is the secondary boycott which it attempted for the purpose of making the other employer refuse to recognize the certified union or refuse to recognize the union with which that employer is under contract. It contains no protection with respect to the boycott against an employer whose employees are unorganized and presumably do not wish to belong to a union. In our industry the secondary boycott is a powerful weapon which could thus be employed as it was before the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act to coerce small employers into signing up with unions which do not represent their employees. Accordingly, we recommend that the more inclusive language in section 8 (b) (4) (A) of the present statute be incorporated into the committee bill.

In conclusion, the Printing Industry of America, Inc., representing one of the 10 largest industries in the country, made up of thousands of individual printing plants, urges upon this committee the consideration of these fundamental, fair, and equitable provisions that are so vital to the very existence of the industry itself.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY (presiding). Mr. Reilly, you were at one time the solicitor for the Labor Department, I believe.

Mr. REILLY. That is correct, Congressman Bailey.

Mr. BAILEY. Will you please state for what period of time?

Mr. REILLY. Yes. From 1937 to 1941.

Mr. BAILEY. Where were you next employed?

Mr. REILLY. I was then a member of the National Labor Relations Board, from 1941 to 1946.

Mr. BAILEY. And after that what was your employment?

Mr. REILLY. I was in private practice for a few months, and then I was retained by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare as special counsel to assist in the drafting of the labor legislation in the Eightieth Congress. Then I resumed private practice and about 6 or 7 months ago I went into partnership with some contemporaries, Mr. Rhetts and Mr. Ruckelshaus.

Mr. BAILEY. Did you, while you were employed by the majority members of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, assist and advise the members in the preparation of the Taft-Hartley bill?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, I did, sir. That was why I was primarily retained.

Mr. BAILEY. And you also assisted in the preparation of amendments that were offered to the bill on the floor?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. And later on, the compromise that was reached between the Senate conferees and the House conferees?

Mr. REILLY. Yes. In the conference, Mr. Shroyer and I were with the Senate conferees—he was a member, too,—and Mr. Morgan was counsel for the House conferees.

Mr. BAILEY. During the time you were consultant to the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, were you retained by any employees covered by the Wagner Act or the proposed Taft-Hartley bill?

Mr. REILLY. No, I was not, sir. As soon as I was employed, I did not take any cases or any retainers that were concerned with any labor matters.

Mr. BAILEY. You were not receiving any retainers?

Mr. REILLY. Not from any clients that were interested in labor matters, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. At what time were you retained by employers such as the Printing Industry?

Mr. REILLY. After the passage of the act, sir, and after I left my employment with the Senate Labor Committee. In fact, I was not even acquainted with any members of the trade association until——

Mr. BAILEY. I believe, Mr. Reilly, that you are registered as a lobbyist for the General Motors Corp., are you not?

Mr. REILLY. That is correct, Congressman.

Mr. BAILEY. About how much salary do you receive in that connection?

Mr. REILLY. $3,000 a month.

Mr. BAILEY. If you do not care to state it——

Mr. REILLY. No; I stated it, sir. My retainer is $3,000 a month.

Mr. BAILEY. And expenses?

Mr. REILLY. No.

Mr. BAILEY. No expenses. What other corporations are you registered as a lobbyist for?

Mr. REILLY. I am registered for General Electric. I am registered for a coal company, Pond Creek Pocahontas, and I am registered for the Printing Industry of America. Now, not all those retainers are purely for legislative work. I do quite a bit of trial work for the printing industry, and I do some consultative work with the trade and these other companies.

Mr. BAILEY. And I believe you get retainers from those corporations; is that true?

Mr. REILLY. That is correct, sir, yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to call your attention, Mr. Reilly, to the question of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, section 202 (a):

> Professional staff members to such committees shall not engage in any work other than committee business and no other duties may be assigned to them while serving on the staff.

Were you engaged in representing any other corporation at the time you served as consultant with that committee?

Mr. REILLY. No, I was not, sir. I did keep my office open, but I did not——

Mr. BAILEY. Or you did not withdraw your registration as a lobbyist at that period? Or did you leave your registration in force?

Mr. REILLY. I had not been doing any legislative work at that period, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. You had not registered as a lobbyist at that time?

Mr. REILLY. There was no occasion for me to do so, sir. I was not representing any clients at that time, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe that is all.

Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield my time to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. IRVING. I have just one question, and then I want to yield the balance of my time to Congressman Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you want to ask your question first?

Mr. IRVING. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Go ahead.

Mr. IRVING. I cannot recall how you stated just how a jurisdictional dispute could be handled by the members of the union. Do you remember that?

Mr. REILLY. You mean, under the present act, sir?

Mr. IRVING. Under the Taft-Hartley Act. I believe there is a certain procedure.

Mr. REILLY. This is the issue which has come up under it. Let us say, for example, an industry like the printing industry, where there are a number of craft unions having separate contracts which sometimes overlap, as an illustration I gave on the offset presses.

Mr. IRVING. I mean, when it came to an impasse and the one union would not give in on something, and they said that they could ask for a vote or an election.

Mr. REILLY. Yes. Well, let us assume that this is one of those contract cases.

Mr. IRVING. Let me finish, because I want to yield my time.

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. IRVING. You said that was possible?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. IRVING. Do you think that is practicable in the building and construction trades? You know, if you are familiar with those trades, jurisdictional disputes come up in a matter of minutes or seconds. Do you think that is practicable?

Mr. REILLY. I always felt——

Mr. IRVING. Just answer yes or no, because I want to yield my time.

Mr. REILLY. I would say it is very difficult to have the Labor Board machinery, which is rather lengthy, apply to casual employment like the building trades.

Mr. IRVING. And I understand that Senator Taft made the statement that the law in his opinion was not written to apply to building trades, and that since the "affecting commerce" language is in there, the general counsel, Mr. Denham, stretched it all over the country, so that it did apply to the building trades. Under his reasoning I suppose it would apply to my wife if she was using in Missouri an eggbeater that was made in Ohio.

Mr. REILLY. Of course, Mr. Denham and the courts under the Wage-Hour Act have gone much farther under the notion of what was commerce than in the case 10 years ago. When I was on the Labor Board, we did not take any building trades cases. We disclaimed jurisdiction, not on grounds that it was necessarily beyond the scope of commerce, but on policy grounds. However, even though that was the view of Mr. Taft—and I was inclined to hold that view, too, as counsel—there was some debate and some references in the history of the bill to jurisditional disputes in the building trades, so that a great many Congressmen and Senators, I think, did assume that the bill did apply to jurisdictional issues in the building trades.

Mr. IRVING. I think generally we realize that the Eightieth Congress had a general philosophy, and a different policy, and no doubt it may be possible to stretch that.

I understand, though, from my work on another committee dealing with the Fair Labor Standards Act, that this "affecting commerce" language was very definitely not wanted by employers and their lawyers. However, they did not object, I guess, to it being in the previous laws.

That is all, thank you. I will yield the balance of my time to Congressman Jacobs.

Mr. BAILEY. There as 5 minutes of your time remaining. Are you yielding that to Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. IRVING. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Reilly, the last time you and I met officially, I believe you were sitting up here like this and I was down at the table.

Mr. REILLY. Yes. You made a very able argument, too, as I remember it, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. And I believe there was a question involved in the last case I argued before your Board concerning which you mentioned in your testimony, and that is the question of free speceh, or do you recall the case?

Mr. REILLY. I regret to say, I do not recall that particular one.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, let us take it up in this way. Do you recall that it was the case in which there had been some conversation between a supervisor of the Union City School Bus Co. and a man who had been fired a day or two later as the result of something? And the question was whether he was fired because of union activities. Do you remember it now?

Mr. REILLY. Yes; that kind of comes back now, Congressman.

Mr. JACOBS. To refresh your recollection further, I will say that you remember I cited a decision of the Supreme Court of North Carolina in the case of Senator Luke Lea, of Tennessee.

Mr. REILLY. Oh, yes; that was the Securities case.

Mr. JACOBS. That was where the court, in deciding Senator Lea's guilt, made the statement that if four men should come together from four different points of the compass and meet upon a desert and each of them had a board that was so sawed and mortised that they would fit together in a perfect square, it would be almost conclusive evidence that they had been together before; is that right?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. I believe you agreed with me in that case, as I recall.

Mr. REILLY. Yes, I think I did, Congressman.

Mr. JACOBS. I do not know how far I will be able to reciprocate.

Now, let us take this free-speech clause. That is 8 (c). I think as a matter of evidence we can all agree that the statement of an employer which contains no threat or promise would not, standing alone, constitute an unfair labor practice. I think you and I, as lawyers, can agree on that, can we not?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. But can we agree, not as advocates but as lawyers, that the words in section 8 (c) which say that anything an employer may say shall not be evidence of an unfair labor practice?

Mr. REILLY. I do not think the section says that, Congressman.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, let us read it and see.

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Here it is:

The expressing of any views, argument, or opinion, or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic, or visual form, shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice under any of the provisions of this Act, if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, you agree, do you, that the word "or" is, of course, a disjunctive word, is it not?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Then when you say "shall not constitute or be evidence of," it means that it not only will not constitute an unfair labor practice, but it is not under the law evidence of an unfair labor practice. Do you agree with me on that?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, I agree with you, Congressman. I think where we possibly differ is here. I would construe the words "views, argument, or opinion" as meaning a kind of argumentative utterance. I would apply the rule of ejusdem generis to it. And so in the union case, as I recall it, that was a private conversation that occurred in the bus. As far as I think, that view in the setting, against the light of committee reports and against cases which disapproved of that, this language would necessarily mean an argument that an employer makes to his employees, or an argument that a union organizer makes to employees, for joining or not joining—well, it might not be unions; it might be on anything.

Mr. JACOBS. We would agree, of course, that it would have to be germane to the subject, would we not? Whatever is said has to be germane to the subject or it would be immaterial as evidence .

Mr. REILLY. I will agree with you on one point which you made, and that is that it is an exclusionary rule of——

Mr. JACOBS. Evidence.

Mr. REILLY. Of evidence: yes.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Thank you very much. That is what I wanted.

And do you not know, as a matter of fact, that it has been applied to exclude evidence of statements made by the employer immediately before men have been fired when unfair labor practice charges were being presented? Do you know that or not?

Mr. REILLY. I know that has been applied to exclude arguments on the evidence of an election, or something of that nature.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, wait a minute. You informed me last night that you had read the letter I wrote to Mr. Wilson of General Motors, did you not?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. You remember the case I cited in that?

Mr. REILLY. You cited the Greensboro case.

Mr. JACOBS. The Coca-Cola case.

Mr. REILLY. The Coca-Cola case. I regret to say I could not find the full text of that intermediate report. I just saw the excerpt there. And that, of course, is not a Board decision. It is a trial examiner's view.

Mr. JACOBS. I understand. But it was so applied in that intermediate report, was it not?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, it was.

Mr. JACOBS. And you know of no upset by the Board of that application of the rule?

Mr. REILLY. It seems to me that the Board has found——

Mr. JACOBS. Well, do you or do you not?

Mr. REILLY. Take these cases where employees have asked employees whether they belong to unions or have joined unions: the Board has not held those interrogations, even though not accompanied by any threats or promise of benefit, the Board has admitted that evidence and considered it.

Mr. JACOBS. As a matter of fact, they admitted it and considered it as to whether or not it is evidence of the employer's not having committed an unfair labor practice?

Mr. REILLY. No. In either case, they threw it out, because the employer was interrogating these people on the union membership.

Mr. JACOBS. And that was under the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. REILLY. That was under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. JACOBS. Have they done that in the Greensboro case?

Mr. REILLY. I do not think the Greensboro case has ever been decided by the Board.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, let me ask you this: You are employed by the General Electric Co. And you, I take it, are an adviser on labor legislation to General Electric.

Mr. REILLY. Yes, Congressman.

Mr. JACOBS. Did you help to frame the 18 questions in this document?

Mr. REILLY. No. That was prepared before I had any connection with the company, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. I rather thought so, because I have a mighty high regard for your ability as a lawyer.

You have read that, though?

Mr. REILLY. I have read them, yes, sir; and your comments are interesting.

Mr. JACOBS. Section No. 7 deals with the subject that you and I have been talking about here, does it not?

Mr. REILLY. The free speech one?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. And you have had good legal training and you are a good lawyer.

Mr. REILLY. Thank you, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. You will agree, will you not, that the question involved in section 8 (c) is a highly technical, legal question, will you not?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, I will.

Mr. JACOBS. It is a matter involving a technical interpretation of the law of evidence; is that not right?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. And concerning which you can find many, many pages, probably, written that would have a bearing upon the subject in our legal textbooks?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, indeed.

Mr. JACOBS. And probably it would not be hard to get a wagon bed full of books or full of material which has been printed in the reported decisions in our Supreme Court bearing upon this question, No. 7 here; is that not right?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Then let me ask you this as a lawyer and one who has formerly occupied judicial positions. Do you think that it is fair to send question No. 7 out to the average layman and ask him to cross that question off with a straight "Yes" or "No" answer, without being advised of what is involved in it?

Mr. REILLY. Well, I talked——

Mr. JACOBS. Now, wait a minute. Your client wants a "Yes" or "No" answer. Would you give me a "Yes" or "No" answer to that question?

Mr. REILLY. I think I could answer the question on the questionnaire "Yes" or "No." And let me say this. I think that your assumption is that the questions on that questionnaire meant that the company was describing in popular words a provision which is necessarily in the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. JACOBS. A provision, sir? I did not hear that.

Mr. REILLY. A provision which was necessarily in the Taft-Hartley Act. I understand from the people that drew it that what they were describing were issues which they thought should be in a labor law, and it was not necessarily an attempt to depict what was in the Taft-Hartley Act. For example, take that question there to the Communist affidavits. You notice that that suggests that a law ought to have that requirement made on both management and unions. So you can conclude that that was not any attempt to describe it in the present law.

Mr. JACOBS. What do you think your clients meant when they said, "How would you revise our labor laws?"

Now, I want you to answer that not as a partisan, and not as an advocate.

Mr. REILLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. But cast yourself back to the position you once occupied of a judicial character. Do you not honestly think that anyone would interpret that they were trying to uphold the law as it now exists, in view of the publicity and the newspaper stories and the commentators' reports on the law? Would you not agree with me that the average person would accept it as that?

Mr. REILLY. I think that many people would——

Mr. JACOBS. Most people would.

Mr. REILLY. But I think that you and I as lawyers looking at it, especially if you looked at the statute which spoke of Communist affidavits, realized that the company was not describing the present law, but was describing what would be a desirable labor law.

Mr. JACOBS. I think that is well enough publicized so that the average person would realize that that is a concession away from the present law. I think you are right about that. I agree with you. But as to question No. 7, there is nothing there so to disclose, is there?

Mr. REILLY. No. But there is nothing in the other questions so to disclose, either.

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. REILLY. But to go back, if I might, to the point I was making, you, I think, in placing such a broad interpretation upon section 8 (c)——

Mr. JACOBS. Now, wait just a moment.

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Pardon me. I do not like to interrupt you. But I want to direct your remarks and attention to this. In what way did you say it was a broad interpretation? The word "shall" is a common word. I knew what it was before I got out of grade school. "Not"; I know what that word means; "be"; I know what that word means. And "evidence." You and I both know what that means. Does not that just simply mean that whatever the man says shall not be evidence, and therefore, it shall not be used to characterize anything that he did or to throw light upon his motive? Could it mean anything else?

Mr. REILLY. Well——

Mr. JACOBS. Just tell me whether you think it does mean anything else.

Mr. REILLY. Yes, I do, Congressman, because that point was raised in the debate in the conference report by Senator Pepper.

Mr. JACOBS. Senator Morse talked about it, too, did he not?

Mr. REILLY. He may have. The more pointed exchange, though, was between Senator Taft and Senator Pepper on the point. And Senator Taft inserted in the records of the legislative history, before the veto was acted upon, this, that—substantially what I said—it was supposed to be an argumentative speech which was privileged, and not an instruction or a remark. And he put this situation. He said that the critics of this section are saying that everything a defendant says in a criminal case is admissible and he gave his illustration to show that that was not so. He said, supposing a man was being tried for selling liquor illegally; it would not be deemed competent evidence to show that he had made a speech opposing the Volstead Act. And then he spoke of a murder case, and said it would not be competent evidence to show that the victim belonged to a different political party from the murderer.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman has 2½ minutes of total time.

Mr. BURKE. I yield my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JACOBS. Thank you.

All right. At any rate, I think you and I have put on a pretty graphic illustration here that question 7 is not a very fair question to ask the average layman to check off "Yes" or "No" on.

Mr. REILLY. I would say that the inference is that that is so if that was an exact description of what is in the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. JACOBS. And you have already said that you think the average person would construe most questions to be such. I think we have agreed on that already.

Mr. REILLY. I think with many of the questions that would be true. I do not think they would construe them all to be such.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, may I ask you just one more question on that point?

Would you, as legislative counsel for General Motors and General Electric and these other people, be willing to agree that the words "or be evidence of" be stricken from that section, or do you want to think about that?

Mr. REILLY. Well, I have thought about it before quite a bit. It was a very bothersome section to draft in conference.

Mr. JACOBS. Just whether you would or would not agree as a representative of these people you have named to strike out those four words, "or be evidence of"?

Mr. REILLY. I would be inclined to think that it is a bit too broad as it is written now, in view of that Labor Board decision that came down the other day in which the members were divided in their opinion. I think that the section should be redrafted, sir; yes.

Mr. JACOBS. I do not want to be discourteous with you, Mr. Reilly. I think you know I have always tried to be courteous.

Mr. REILLY. I know you have.

Mr. JACOBS. I had to, of course, when I was down there.

But specifically, the question is in reference to four words. Would you be willing to agree as the legislative counsel of those people that you represent, that those four words "or be evidence of," be stricken out?

Mr. REILLY. I would, Congressman, provided there was some substitute language added.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you have the substitute language in mind at this time?

Mr. REILLY. Not at this time, Congressman. I would be glad to submit it to you, though.

Mr. JACOBS. You will submit it later?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Thank you.

Now, let us pass on to another point. I was rather impressed with one of the statements you made, because, you see, it would naturally have to disclose someone who had a keen and rather analytical mind.

I read from page 2 of your statement that you made as special counsel for the Printing Industry of America, Inc.:

> Normally, all union plants in a city negotiate through a local employer association. And when we join with other employers into collective bargaining groups, we are frequently faced with the union strategy of "divide and conquer."

As a matter of fact, that strategy is pretty generally practiced at the bargaining table, is it not?

Mr. REILLY. Of course, it is unfair labor practice for an employer to practice it since the Wagner Act has been in effect. For example, if he goes over the union's head and goes with some minority faction to the bargaining unit, and makes a deal with them.

Mr. JACOBS. It is not necessarily, now, if I can sort of do it under the table. Take, for instance, under section 9 (a); you are familiar with that, are you not?

Mr. REILLY. Certainly the Labor Board nowadays could detect the under-the-table deals.

Mr. JACOBS. I mean the employer can sort of generate another little group who wants to come up and talk the thing over, under 9 (a)?

Mr. REILLY. That is on grievances, but not on collective bargaining.

Mr. JACOBS. At any rate, it starts the breaking-down process; is that not right?

Mr. REILLY. I do not see that it changes the original act as written, today, because if you will remember the original act allowed individual handling of grievances, too, and the new act, in fact, went a little bit further in protecting the union, in providing the union had to be present.

Mr. JACOBS. At any rate, you and I will agree if you can divide the other fellow you are going to do it?

Mr. REILLY. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. So, what you lay down on page 2 is normal attack that is made in competition, is it not?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. But your folks are organized on a city-wide basis, and I take it from the heading on your paper that you are organized on a Nation-wide basis, even though you may not bargain that way; is that not correct?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, sir. The national association.

Mr. JACOBS. But I suppose you do exchange trade information, and probably have a trade magazine?

Mr. REILLY. Yes; the present marketing information.

Mr. JACOBS. I want to now get down to this next point on the closed shop, where you speak of the closed shop. If you represent a corporation——

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman has just exactly 5 minutes remaining in his total time.

Mr. JACOBS. Thank you.

If you represent a corporation and the stockholders elect the directors—that is correct—and the directors elect the executive officers, and the executive officers proceed to the bargaining table to negotiate a contract with labor—up to that point we are agreed, are we not?

The stockholder does not have any right whatever to come in and try to make any kind of a different deal with any part of the labor force, or to veto what the directors and executive officers might do; is that not correct?

Mr. REILLY. That is right; yes.

Mr. JACOBS. They have no right whatever. In other words, in the management of their investment they surrender that management absolutely to the directing officers of the corporation; is that right?

Mr. REILLY. Yes; but of course there are certain legal remedies for mismanagement.

Mr. JACOBS. Yes; and I believe labor unions have that, too, under the common law.

Mr. REILLY. It would depend a good deal upon the constitution, and also upon whether there was a breach of trust.

Mr. JACOBS. Yes; but as long as you cannot show mismanagement—and by that is meant malpractice in mismanagement, and not just merely poor judgment—it must rise almost to the dignity of malpractice, must it not?

Mr. REILLY. It depends a good deal upon how the debenture of trust is drafted.

Mr. JACOBS. That is true, usually, though, is it not?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Then, that means this: I think we can agree that management comes to the bargaining table with a unified front, does it not?

Mr. REILLY. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. And labor, of course, naturally strives to come to the bargaining table with a like unified front; is that not right?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. We have already agreed it is a technique of competitors to try to divide——

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. So, if there may be any technique by which the employer can divide the employees he is fairly well on his road to conquer, is he not?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, but he is forbidden by law to do so.

Mr. JACOBS. We will get to that.

The workers are denied by law the right to have a closed shop; that is right, is it not, under the Taft-Hartley Law?

Mr. REILLY. Yes; although they can have a shop which compels everybody to join within a certain period.

Mr. JACOBS. We will get to that. I do not aim to leave any straggling threads here.

But the one form of absolute unity that the worker may have to meet the absolute unity the employer has, is denied the worker under the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. REILLY. I disagree with you.

Mr. JACOBS. I say, this one form of closed shop.

Mr. REILLY. One form; yes. Let me point out, though, that I think the most important form is the one which was in the Railway Act where there was no compulsory law at all, and in the Wagner Act, which makes the majority representative the exclusive representative, that is what gives the workers real unity, but not, to my mind, the closed shop.

Mr. BAILEY. You have one minute.

Mr. JACOBS. Then, if you go to the union shop, then we find, do we not, that when you hold the election every man who does vote has his vote cast against the union shop; is that correct?

Mr. REILLY. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. That is the effect of it, is it not?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. So that we finally get down, then, to section 9 (a) and we have still got the employer sitting over here with his absolute unity and we finally get down to section 9 (a) on the grievances, and we find there is still a provision there where the employer is required to deal with smaller groups of the working force; is that right?

Mr. REILLY. On the grievances, yes; but that is not in the printing industry that the grievances are handled with the individual proprietors; it is only with the contractors and is handled by the city-wide bargaining association.

Mr. JACOBS. The law requires the employer deal in some manner with segments of the working force if they ask for it; is that correct?

Mr. REILLY. Yes; but just on grievances.

Mr. KELLEY. Your time is up.

Mr. WIER. I will yield my time.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Reilly, the only remedy that an investor has, if he does not like the way management of a corporation goes, is to sell his stock: is that not right?

Mr. REILLY. Yes; theoretically; but of course he should attend the stockholders' meetings—

Mr. JACOBS. And try to elect somebody else?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. And of course the heads of some of your clients would say "Just try to do it," do you not imagine?

Mr. REILLY. It would be just the same as a group going into a large union and trying elections of someone else.

Mr. JACOBS. You are right on that.

Let us go to this question of economic strength: First, I would like to ask you about the jurisdictional strike. I believe that in response to Mr. Irving you say that you do not believe the rule forbidding the jurisdictional strike would be very applicable; that is, on a just basis, in the building construction industry?

Mr. REILLY. The trouble there is they are casual employees, and they are generally not employed until the work is to be performed.

Mr. JACOBS. Where it comes up, unless there is some way to decide it by competent authority, it is not fair for the Government to go and hold Jones and Smith by the hand, and say "Boys, you cannot strike," and let the employer make the decision, and make them bid against each other; do you agree to that?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. What the administration bill we are considering actually does is forbid the jurisdictional strike where there are permanent employees, and where there is an election to determine the appropriate unit for bargaining, and electing the representative.

Mr. REILLY. No; I think the administration bill is very badly drawn in that respect.

Mr. JACOBS. It does not do that?

Mr. REILLY. With respect to permanent employees?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. REILLY. It simply, in a jurisdictional strike, permits somebody to invoke the arbitration machinery and get an award, which, as I have indicated, is a very slow process.

Mr. JACOBS. It would amount to about the same thing, would it not, if you award a bargaining unit by decision, and assert it by a bargaining agent in that unit——

Mr. REILLY. You are introducing a notion that is foreign to the whole history of the Wagner Act.

Mr. JACOBS. I am talking about the administration bill here, in regard to jurisdictional strikes; not the Wagner Act.

Mr. REILLY. Your administration bill might conceivably permit an award to go to a union which represented no employees. With respect to the building trades, that may be all right; but as far as dealing with permanent employees, which is about 90 percent of the jurisdiction that will come up——

Mr. JACOBS. Permanent employees?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, and you will agree about 90 percent of the industry is covered by permanent employees.

Mr. JACOBS. Maybe you and I are not in disagreement. You think where there are permanent employees and a unit can be described and a bargaining agent certified, that is where the jurisdictional strike should be forbidden?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. But you also agree that with intermittent workers such a thing would not be practicable?

Mr. REILLY. Yes; I agree with you on that.

Mr. JACOBS. On the question of secondary boycott, I want to ask you about that, because I think it definitely affects the industry you represent.

Is it your purpose to try to have the law so written that struck work is protected?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, I do not see any reason why struck work should not be protected. I may have put myself in reverse. I see no reason why a struck-work clause in the contract should not be deemed void, in view of the fact that the whole philosophy of the Wagner Act is to encourage direct dealings between employer and employees, and not between the employees of another employer and the principal employer.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us take this sort of case, Mr. Reilly:

Here you have one of the members of your association that you represent who has a labor dispute, and the employees are out on strike for higher wages, so he says, "All right, go out and pound the sidewalk." And then he takes a mat and sends it over to another printer, and tells the printer to mold a plate, or whatever they do on that thing, and do this printing. There is a combination there between this first employer and this second employer, where this second employer is taking over the work to produce it while the men are out on strike. That is right; is it not? Do you agree with that?

Mr. REILLY. If the only combination is the purchase and sale of that mat——

Mr. JACOBS. Let us take the case I am stating to you.

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. I just want to set up this case. There is a combination between those two employers, is there not, in that case?

Mr. REILLY. No; I would not say so. I would say there was a combination in a case that has come up that was very close to yours, and that was the T. E. Basco Service case in New York, where the company which farmed out the work had ascertained in advance of the strike that the company could do that, so there was a kind of pre-existing arrangement; but in the case you report, where he could not get the work out, I would not say there was any combination.

Mr. JACOBS. At any rate, there is an agreement; is there not?

Mr. REILLY. A contract to have the mat set; yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think the law should tell the printers over here who are working for this employer they cannot contract for the struck work of other printers who are out on strike over here?

Mr. REILLY. It would seem to me as long as the wages and working conditions in their shop were satisfactory that that should not be their concern.

Mr. JACOBS. But maybe they are not satisfied; at least, maybe they do not think the wages are high enough to justify their new struck work, and to undercut the other fellow. Do you think they should not have the right to contract to refuse to do that work?

Mr. REILLY. It is contrary to the whole theory of having separate bargaining units in the whole act.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think actually that the employer in the provisions that he is trying to sustain in this law, he is trying to get the Government to come and sit down at the bargaining table with him?

Mr. REILLY. No.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, let us see. You have a law saying that the worker cannot enter into a closed-shop contract. You are familiar, of course, with the Biblical expression that no man shall serve two masters. Do you not think the employers should organize their side and let the employees organize their side?

Mr. REILLY. As I pointed out, if you have a statutory right to represent everybody, you do not need the closed shop then.

Mr. JACOBS. You realize, do you not, that the argument is—and if you will take your client's questionnaire, General Electric's questionnaire—the question is asked time after time whether or not the employee or the union should be allowed to force the employer to do thus and so; is that right?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. What do you think about the employer forcing the printer to do the work that some of the other printers over here in the other shop would be doing except for the fact they are out on strike, and forcing them to do it by law, and not by his economic power, but by the law itself; what do you think about that?

Mr. REILLY. For example, suppose an employer refused to take work from another company just because it was a union company. That would be coercive, too; would it not?

Mr. JACOBS. I suppose there is a certain amount of coercion in every bargaining and negotiating session that ever occurred.

Mr. REILLY. Yes; even though they are friendly enough at the table, there are economic factors on both sides.

Mr. JACOBS. Incidentally, speaking of economic power, let us take your client, General Electric. Do you know how much the assets of General Electric are?

Mr. REILLY. I really do not.

Mr. JACOBS. According to my record, $1,026,864,963.

Do you know what the assets of General Motors are?

Mr. REILLY. I imagine it would be as much as that, and possibly more.

Mr. JACOBS. $2,472,969,238.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman's time is up.

Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Reilly, getting away from trying to define the niceties of what words mean, do you think the General Electric questionnaire is a fair presentation for the reading public of the main terms of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. REILLY. So far as putting it into language that a layman can understand, I would say so, although the questionnaire does not precisely try, as has been assumed, to sustain every feature of the act, or to depict exactly what is in the act, but certainly if any lawyer or a layman had it described in a few words, as to what is in the act, I think the questionnaire would be a fairly lucid summary of what is in the act.

Mr. SMITH. In other words, they were trying to form a general picture of what the provisions of the act contained?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. And you and I might have different ideas as to whether we should use this word or that word, but its purpose is to show the public the main provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act; is that right, sir?

Mr. REILLY. That is correct, sir.

Mr. SMITH. I have no further questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. WERDEL. When you went to work for General Electric, did you know they were worth $1,000,000,000?

Mr. REILLY. I did not, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. Maybe you should get a raise.

As to the voting public generally, do you have an opinion from your experience, based upon your experience in the last 2 years in handling this subject, do you know whether or not the American public has a feeling that is changing, or is presently stationary in regard to the labor problem?

Mr. REILLY. I did not quite get that, Congressman, I am sorry.

Mr. WERDEL. Do you believe that the American public has a feeling they desire to express, about labor laws?

Mr. REILLY. Yes; my feeling is that the public would like to have a balanced labor act; and, I think, that to the extent there seems to be a feeling among the workers that the Taft-Hartley Act was unjust is because the act was misrepresented so much by union literature and by union newspapers.

Mr. WERDEL. I think we are all agreed that the public is conscious of a problem in regulating labor and the organization of labor?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. WERDEL. I believe that the public generally believe that organized labor is necessary; do you agree with that?

Mr. REILLY. Yes, I do, Congressman.

Mr. WERDEL. If that is all true, then do you believe that the administration bill in its present form will satisfy the public, or do you think it will stimulate more prejudices in the immediate future, if we pass it in its present form?

Mr. REILLY. I think it would be very unfortunate if it were passed in its present form, and that the public would feel they had been let down and had been returned to a one-sided condition.

Mr. WERDEL. And those reasons are stated in your statement?

Mr. REILLY. That is correct.

Mr. WERDEL. I have no further questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Kelley?

Mr. KELLEY. I was a member of the Eightieth Congress, and also a member of the joint committee——

Mr. REILLY. Yes; I remember, Congressman.

Mr. KELLEY. And I heard it rumored—and I am not going to ask you to name any names—that someone, or some members, had said that the enforcement of the Taft-Hartley Act or the Hartley Act of 1947 would not be carried out explicitly until after the election; did you ever hear that rumor?

Mr. REILLY. No; I did not, Congressman; but it seems to me that they kept going ahead, so far as the general counsel's office was concerned.

Mr. KELLEY. You did not hear anything of that sort?

Mr. REILLY. No; I did not, Congressman.

Mr. KELLEY. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you, Mr. Reilly.

Mr. REILLY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. At this time the committee will be glad to hear Mr. James O. Monroe, publisher of the Collinsville Herald.

Mr. JACOBS. I should like to ask permission at this time to place in the record an article from the June 1943 issue of Reader's Digest, in regard to the operations of the typographical union, and I have copies for all the members.

Mr. BAILEY. I hear no objection, and the material will be inserted in the record.

(The article referred to is as follows:)

THE TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION—MODEL FOR ALL

(By William Hard, staff writer for Reader's Digest)

[Reprinted from the Reader's Digest of June 1943]

In previous articles I have urged that all unions be required by law to hold regular elections, to make regular financial reports, to get a majority vote of rank-and-file members before striking or picketing, and—in short—to operate democratically.

It has been alleged that such laws would cripple the unions. So now I write about the Typographical Union—the printers' union.

The Typographical Union is the oldest union in America. Its local branch in Washington, D. C., was founded in 1815. Its local in New York City was founded in 1850 by Horace Greeley. In 1852 these and other locals merged to make the national union, which now has its headquarters in Indianapolis. Today this union has almost 900 locals and more than 80,000 members. In towns of 7,000 people and above, it sets the type for over 85 percent of all newspaper and printing establishments.

Clearly it has been successful for itself. It has also been successful for its members.

Print shops used to be dark and dirty; the air in them was foul; the workday was 12 hours; tuberculosis was an accepted printer's ailment; the average age of printers at death was 28.

The union made up its mind to lift that age. All locals of the union formed "Committees of Sanitation" which pleaded with employers and health authorities, and pushed print shops into the forefront of early industrial sanitary progress. Then, in 1892, the union established the Union Printers' Home at Colorado Springs—a sanatorium for tuberculous members and a place of retirement for aged ones. The union has spent more than $9,000,000 on it.

Above all, the union has reduced the workday. Work in a modern composing room is fast, intense, exhausting. The union has gradually brought the worktime of its members down from 12 hours a day to a maximum of 40 hours a week—except for war needs and other emergencies.

The consequence to the lives of its members cannot be a mere coincidence. Their average age at death has been lifted from 28 to the following levels:

By 1900, to 41; by 1910, to 46; by 1920, to 53; by 1930, to 59; by 1942, to 64.

This union has served life. Its success is unquestionable. So, next: Has it won this success by dictatorship over its members and class war against its employers

It has not. Among its 900 locals there have been plenty of instances of hotheadedness and unreasonableness. The main point nevertheless remains that the Typographical Union, so old, so successful, is utterly antidictatorship and utterly anti-class war. Let us look at its methods from the bottom up.

You start toward being a member of the Typographical Union by becoming an apprentice. You can become an apprentice at 16. Then for six years you study your trade by practice in the shop and by taking 149 printed lessons sent to you by the union's Bureau of Education. These lessons are so complete that they have been adopted by many school systems as official textbooks.

A special set of lessons tells you about unionism. You are taught to remember the 19 London Times printers who in the early nineteenth century were sent to jail for trying to have a union. You are taught that union men must sacrifice for each other in order to continue to have a union. You are taught that it will be your duty to attend union meetings and to vote on all union problems.

But you are also taught about employers. You are taught that "labor should not be unfriendly to capital"; that "capital and labor both are essential to efficient and economical production"; that the union should "insure high-class workmanship"; that it should strive to "reduce unit costs"; that the employers of the Typographical Union have virtually never broken a contract with the union, and that no local should ever break a contract with any employer; that every local should regard itself as a "partner" with the employer in the production process; that every preacher of class war, every Communist, every Fascist, every Nazi, is an enemy to the union and should be eliminated from the whole American labor movement.

On all these lessons the apprentice must pass examinations. Then he is a journeyman and a full member of the union and starts voting. He spends lots of his time voting.

The Typographical Union insists that its locals shall manage their own local affairs. Some unions get themselves centralized into their national headquarters. Their national officers become national despots. They found dynasties. The Typographical Union nourishes democracy's taproot: local self-government.

Every Typographical Union local must hold a regular monthly meeting on a regular stated day. It must elect an auditing committee or employ a certified public accountant to examine the books of its officers every three months. It must vote on every contract with an employer; and the contract binds every member. It must conduct a referendum of all its members and get a majority before it can raise its dues. It must vote on any proposed strike and get a three-quarters majority before striking.

In these circumstances no "one-man rule" is possible. And if this union can prevent the birth of "labor bosses," all unions can.

Unions normally choose their national officers in a convention of elected delegates. That's democratic enough for most of us. But the members of the Typographical Union nominate and elect their national officers themselves in a nation-wide referendum. It happens every two years. It is one of the most instructive events under the American democratic sky.

Members who aspire to be candidates must announce themselves in four lines of six-point type, one column wide, in the December and January issues of the Typographical Journal, the union's paper mailed to every member. The Journal has to print the announcements of all aspirants to national offices whether the existing officers like them or not. They often do not.

The union, being American and democratic, just naturally has the two-party system. One party is called the "Independents," the other the "Progressives." Each gets its issues by watching the other and pouncing upon it for the general welfare, just like "Republicans" and "Democrats." And, just as there are men known as national Democratic or Republican leaders, so there are union-wide Progressive and Independent leaders.

In February the locals nominate. Each may name one man for each national office. A local with a majority of Independents will vote for a nationally known Independent. Another local will vote for a Progressive leader. In the case of each national office, the five men nominated by the largest number of locals become the nation-wide candidates. Often, however, it turns out that all the Progressive locals have voted for one man, and all the Independent locals for another, so that only two men run in the final election.

The names of the nominees are printed in the Journal in April. Each nominee may state his qualifications in the Journal—up to 200 words' worth of them.

On the third Wednesday in May the locals vote by secret ballot. The sealed ballots are forwarded to Indianapolis, where, on May 31, while watchers from both parties watch, they are opened and totaled; and the victors are proclaimed. The process has taken six months; but it is absolutely stealproof.

And if this union can operate stealproof elections, all unions can. The coercion and fraud that so often occur in union elections are not necessary to a strong and energetic labor movement.

Now let us look at some more referendum democracy in the Typographical Union. In 1937 Mr. William Green, President of the American Federation of Labor, sent the union a letter. It said that an AFL convention had ordered the union to pay to the AFL a new assessment of one cent per member per month. The Typographical Union was shocked to its foundations.

The union has an annual convention of its own. This convention does a lot of important enacting of "general laws" and "bylaws" for the whole union. But there are two things it cannot do. It cannot by itself amend the union's constitution. And it cannot by itself levy a new tax upon the members. Both those things have to go to a referendum vote of the entire membership.

When the members of the Typographical Union thought of an AFL convention trying to do to them in taxation what not even their own convention could do, they went white hot. They yelled, "Dictatorship" and they rushed to a referendum. They voted four to one to decline to pay the new AFL assessment.

The Typographical Union in the early 1880's was the main force in the founding of the AFL. Now it is "independent," belonging neither to the AFL nor to the CIO. At its 1942 convention it adopted a resolution saying that it would like to unite itself with a reunited American labor movement—but only on one condition, namely: "The establishment of democratic procedures in all affiliated unions."

And it came near adding another condition, namely: "The elimination of gangsterism and the barring from office of all associates of underworld characters in all affiliated unions."

I ask: Is the Typographical Union antiunion because it charges that undemocratic procedures exist in unions?

I suggest that this country is equally tired of business leaders who cry "antibusiness" to stop business reforms and of union leaders who cry "antiunion" to stop union reforms.

Now let us look at the Typographical Union's funds. On this point our unions are often unfairly attacked. People say:

"Look at all their money, taken off poor working people."

It is a foolish remark till we know what the money was spent for.

The national organization of the Typographical Union, in its last fiscal year, collected more than $4,000,000 from its members, which is about $1 a week per member. It's a lot. But the union spent more than $400,000 on the Union Printers' Home, and almost $3,000,000 on pensions for old members. It spent $500,000 on funeral benefits and continued to be able to say, "No union printer ever filled a pauper's grave." It spent $100,000 on the Typographical Journal. Its expenses for all its elected officers and employed organizers, for all their traveling expenses and for all other services, and they were many, amounted to less than $200,000. It works out to less than five cents per member per week. No corporation does a tighter job of economy.

Claude Baker, president, and Woodruff Randolph, secretary-treasurer, get $7,500 a year. How many businesses with an annual turn-over of more than $4,000,000 pay less to their top men?

But how do I know that the union accounts are straight? Because they are checked twice a year by a committee of three auditors elected by the total membership of the union; and because they are additionally checked twice a year by certified public accountants; and because they are printed every month in page after page of the Typographical Journal.

Many other unions come equally clean. Therefore all can and should and must.

A democratic union has two advantages for the country. The first is that it tends toward relations with employers that are more human and intelligent and stable. But the second is even more important.

The whole democratic world, in order to meet the competition of the totalitarian world, has to perfect its own democratic institutions. It has to democratize its daily business life and its daily labor life. You cannot live an undemocratic life 364 days in the year and then achieve democracy by going to a political polling place on the 365th.

If you visit a union composing room, you may see the compositors, in a lull of work, gathered into a quick huddle. They are holding a meeting of their "chapel"—a subdivision of their local. They are rapidly settling, among themselves, some point of shop technique or shop discipline.

These little cells represent daily, hourly practice in democratic living. They represent participation in economic government. They represent economic government by consent. They train men to detest autocracy and to desire democracy in all things.

Freedom needs such men. Free democratic business must learn that in order to survive against the totalitarian state it has to have such men. The final merit of the Typographical Union is that its institutions are organized to produce such men.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Monroe.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES O. MONROE, PUBLISHER, THE COLLINSVILLE HERALD, COLLINSVILLE, ILL.

Mr. MONROE. I first want to say in response to the apropos questions that were asked here, that I received one of the questionnaires, and in my judgment it was not so misrepresentative of the Taft-Hartley law, but it was extremely unfair in that it presumed to go on the idea that laymen, such as I am, small-business men, could categorically answer questions which were involved in there, implications, as they were, and I wrote about four essays on the things before I sent it back.

It is not fair to expect laymen to answer questions concerning matters as involved as that, which required interpretation and the expenditure of a million dollars of attorneys fees.

I would also like to say, outside my formal statement, that I am in a business which is akin to that which was represented by the last gentleman who testified.

I am James O. Monroe, of Collinsville, Ill. I am a member of the Typographical Union, and also a member of the Graphic Arts Association of Illinois, an organization of employing printers, which association is made up mainly of the big printers, and my observation over 39 years in business has been that the unions did not need the Wagner Act; at least, the Typographical Union and the Employing Printers Association did not need the Taft-Hartley Law, and I do not think either one of them has done a great deal of benefit. You probably are aware, as readers of newspapers, that the president of the Typographical Union entered upon and induced his union to follow what I thought was an extremely idiotic notion, that he could evade and avoid the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Law, by simply saying, "We will not sign a contract." I do not know how you can avoid a law by that simple device. It evoked a lot of trouble, although I and all the other commercial printers said, "It does not make any difference whether we sign a contract, so long as we agree on wages and working conditions," which brings up the fact which has been strong in my mind, that most of the labor difficulties come from the hard-headedness which was manifest in Chicago by the publishers, and not by the commercial printers in Chicago, because they have been under verbal agreement, but they were not hard-headed enough to involve themselves and their employees in a prolonged strike such as the publishers have done, lasting about 17 months, now, and they are no closer to a settlement than they were then, and it demonstrates to me that amity and decent relationship is worth more than law, and I wish we could get away from the whole business, but we have to talk about it.

I am here to say a few things about it more in a philosophical vein.

I am sole owner of a printing plant in which I publish a weekly newspaper and do commercial printing, employing about 20 persons, most of them members of unions. I myself have carried a card in the International Typographical Union for 39 years, and when I feel like it I work with the men in my shop. Our grievances have been trifling, and we always have been able to make contract agreements without a strike. I also am a member of the Graphic Arts Association of Illinois, an organization of employing printers, and of the Collinsville Chamber of Commerce, whose interests are indicated by the name. I have served 10 years in the Illinois General Assembly, an arena in which labor questions are as abundant and as difficult as they are here, and while I am not now a member of that body, I may, if my good health continues, run for the senate again next year.

The area where I live and the district which I represented in the legislature is peopled predominantly by men and women who are employed workers, mostly unionized, so that it might be thought that I may be inclined for political purposes to favor labor. I acknowledge the fact that I am a friend of organized labor and the further fact that I am recognized as such by the labor groups. But I have spoken out vigorously against labor abuses, particularly the jurisdictional strike, and I have championed the rights of capital and of business management on many occasions. I hold firmly to the proposition that capital is equally essential with labor in our economy, and that management, as well as enterprise and inventive genius, are best provided by the profit motive.

I mention all this to show that I do not appear here as one aggrieved by labor disputes nor as a special pleader for either one of the two opposed groups—labor and management—which have mostly appeared, and that my status and connections may make me capable of viewing both sides of the current questions, not only with better understanding, but also with less of personal interest, with less emotion, and consequently with less bias than some others.

I think it is fundamental that psychologists are the foundation of economic and political philosophies. And I am convinced that men and women join and adhere to labor unions because they consider the union a means to economic betterment. I joined the typographical union when I was 21 years of age, in my fifth year of scraping my way through college by working in a printshop so small that it employed no other man, in a village where there never has been another union man. I did this because at that time I had no visions of ever owning a printing plant, but rather of pursuing a journeyman's vocation, and hence could foresee, without any urging much less coercion, that my future interests would be fostered and protected by affiliation with other men like situated. I had no understanding of such strong complex questions as the closed shop, union security, and jurisdictional strikes; but, looking back, I imagine that if those questions had been presented to me then I would have formed about the same judgments upon them as I hold now.

To conclude the preliminary observations, let me say that I think the greatest error on the part of those who framed the Taft-Hartley law was that they acted as if they regarded the union and its officers as being the controlling agents over the union members, a doctrine specifically stated by Judge Goldsborough, saying "as long as a union is functioning as a union, it must be held responsible for the mass action of its members."

With all respect for the learned justice, I cannot accept his doctrine. While the members are in a large sense responsible for the union, I cannot see wherein it is responsible for them, at least in matters where they determine its action, as in strikes which they have voted.

Relation of union and its officers to members: Union officials are regarded by the members as leaders and not as dictators nor as being empowered to determine policies and to bind the men to them. In the typographical union to which I belong, no action can be taken, including the election of officers, without a referendum of the membership, both in the locals and in the international and strikes are entered upon only by a vote of the membership affected. I understand that this is true in the mine workers, who are the largest industrial group in my city, and in most other unions. Labor unions are not corporations which elect directors and officers who manage the business for a year or some other stated period and who during that period can commit the stockholders to policies and obligations. "Labor czars" are no more potent than "political bosses."

This fallacious thinking, which Judge Goldsborough first baldly expressed, is at the bottom, so it seems to me, of the provisions in the present law which seek to prevent strikes by court injunctions against only the union and its officials, and which seek to direct union activity by requiring officials to take a non-Communist oath. And this thinking, and the legislation which it fostered, leads inevitably to the practical difficulties of establishing industrial peace by them, which I shall discuss more fully later. For men who recognize their officials as leaders, and not as dictators, cannot be expected to respect and accept and follow a law first, which affronts their instincts, second, which thwarts established practices in the settling of disputes with management, and third and most important, which lays its impact solely on the union and its officials and which suggests no coercion and imposes no penalties upon the men themselves, either as individual citizens in the Commonwealth nor as members of the union.

With that said, let me comment on certain provisions of the present law and of the pending bill.

Penalize jurisdictional strikers: Before going into the provisions which I disapprove, let me say that I approve heartily of the effort to curb jurisdictional strikes, though I do not approve the injunction method set-up. I shall state my objections to injunctions more fully later.

Without going into the nature of jurisdictional strikes, which is generally known, I maintain that they are the most unconscionable, not to say the most stupid, feature of union activity. I can understand why two groups of men would undertake to preserve their right to a piece of work by engaging in a rough-and-tumble bout, but I cannot imagine anything more foolish than for both to walk off the job. And I feel so strongly on the subject that I would favor imposing a fine on any and all of the men who do desert a job without a grievance against the employer. And, loathing the injunctive process, I would suggest to the Congress the fixing of an amount of the fine rather than leaving it to some judge of a court, and I'd make the fine heavy enough to be altogether discouraging. Many times I have urged, unavailingly, that labor organizations establish a formula and a mechanism for disposing of these disputes between unions without a strike, and they have been too slothful to do it. I think the imposition of some fines upon the men would shortly spur them to effective action in this direction, action more appropriate in every way than having the Labor Relations Board arbitrate the disputes or dispose of them otherwise.

On the kindred question of boycotts I have nothing to say, simply because I have not been able to think the question through to an answer satisfactory to myself, much less anyone else.

Most of the other principal provisions of the Taft-Hartley law I oppose, and I shall tell you why.

First the provisions against the closed shop.

Apropos of the question raised by the Congressman with regard to struck work, I agree that when an employer is forced to suspend operations because of a strike, and he undertakes to continue operations in part or in whole by sending some of his work out, that that should be considered unfair practice and the other man should not be required to do that work.

I think as an economic condition, that is sound.

The closed shop is, in the thinking of union men, the basis of their union. Unions never have been strong except where the closed shop is the rule. And, however strong they become, they never have been able to win in a battle to the death with stubborn management, because hunger, their hunger, always is on the side of the employer, and the odds are 10 to 1 that he can "outstarve" them.

It is abhorrent to any union man that he should be required to work and pay out of his earnings to maintain the union while alongside him works another man who refuses to work and pay for the upkeep of the union. If the nonunion man gets the same wage as he gets, he chafes at the inequity. It the nonunion man works for less, that stands as a constant threat of a lowering of the union wage, and weakens the security which he expects the union to afford him.

The closed shop, moreover, is not merely a symbol, but a practicality, and union men and unions are usually ready to admit nonunion men to membership whenever there is room in the employment for their services. Mr. Frank Beatty, secretary of the Graphic Arts Association of Illinois, to which I belong, told me recently that approximately half of the typo members in Chicago had learned their trade in nonunion shops, I suppose mainly in smaller cities. My own local grants cards to qualified union men acceptable to the employer, not only in my shop but in others in the jurisdiction. That is true of other unions in my area, making them, in one sense, what is called union shops rather than closed shops. The resistance to this policy, when it appears, usually has been where employment is sparse and employed men are subject to possible lay-offs. And the animus of most union men against the so-called union shop is that it allows the employment of nonunion men against the wish of the union, and they fear that this privilege will be overused to the detriment of the present members, by overcrowding the union rolls, requiring a division of time and lessening their security.

On the other side of the question, much is made of the right of nonunion men to work—and you have heard that phrase a lot of times, that every man has a right to work whether he has a card or not—which is quickly distorted into the proposition that they have a right to work alongside union men. This is based on a premise which I do not accept. While I agree that every man has a right to work at whatever he can find to do, I do not agree that it is the duty of any other man to employ him, or that he has any right to demand employment, much less to coerce the conditions of his employment as against the interests of others who may be employed; particularly would I resist the idea that a nonunion man has the right to force himself into the bettered conditions which I think it may be assumed the union has provided without any effort of his. Employment is essentially a matter of agreement. Any man has a right to hire union men or to hire nonunion men, as he prefers. And men have a right to seek employment as union men or as nonunion men. And any employer and any group of workers have, or should have, the right to fix by agreement the conditions of the employment. Any departure from that proposition, it seems to me, leads to endless confusion.

Moreover, it is wrong to assume that unions and union men have exclusive control of employment in America. Nonunion men are free to seek employment under nonunion conditions wherever they may find them. Of course, in some areas such conditions are limited, not because of a dearth of men who would be willing to start and operate nonunion establishments, but because community sentiment is so strong against them that entrepreneurs will not brook it, and hence only union plants exist.

But that condition is far from universal. Lately it has been brought dramatically to public attention by some Supreme Court cases that there are a considerable number of States which have laws forbidding the closed shop. And even in States where such laws do not exist the open shop is common. In my country there is a city as highly industrialized as mine where only the brewery workers and the building trades are organized. In northern Illinois there is a very large and very fine printing plant doing business of millions of dollars a year, which is entirely nonunion. And it may surprise you to know that my friend Beatty of the Graphic Arts Association, whom I previously quoted, wrote me recently—and I have his letter here if you want it for the record—as follows:

> You ask if there are any nonunion shops in Chicago. From a numerical standpoint there are about 2,000 established ones, of which about 500 have contractual relations with one or more unions. About 250 have the union label.

My own observations have been that most of the nonunion printing plants in Chicago are small ones. But the R. R. Donnelly Co., the biggest commercial printing plant in the world, is an open shop. Quoting again from Mr. Beatty's letter:

> In the case of the Donnelly Co., the plant is still running as an open shop, but has contractual relations with two unions—and I think you heard the other gentleman say there were usually about six crafts involved in the operation of a printing plant—> namely the Amalgamated Lithographers, Local No. 4, and unit No. 1 of the Pressmen's Union.

For the same reasons that I oppose a ban on the closed shop, I oppose the provision in the administration bill to override the power of the States to legislate on the question of the closed shop. Experience has shown that it is wise to recognize prevailing sentiment and practices as they have grown up in various parts of the country, and the Supreme Court has practically written that principle into the law by rulings on State legislation. The State legislatures are apt laboratories for experimentation and development of law relating to human relations, and I would leave them free to experiment in this field, following developing public sentiment, for the benefit of their own people and as an example to others.

Moreover, it must be said that so long as sentiment and practice varies throughout the country, economic forces discourage extreme practices on the part of both unions and employers, just as any extremity in other fields defeats itself. Citing a case in the printing field, the recent disturbed conditions in printing in Chicago, due to the foolish policy of the president of the ITU, have driven a great deal of printing away from Chicago. A legislator with whom I formerly served told me last month that the plant where he is employed has lost 30 percent of its business to other shops outside of Chicago, some of it to nonunion shops. And quoting again from Mr. Beatty:

> Nobody knows exactly how much work has left Chicago, but there has been enough to cause trouble.

So, I approve neither the anti-closed-shop provision of the Taft-Hartley law nor the proposal to forbid the States to legislate on the subject. Extreme sumptuary legislation has proved itself bad in other fields, and local option has been found to be the best means of dealing with one of our worst vexatious problems of human conduct. I would apply it to labor relations, and I hope the Congress omits from its present program any reference to the closed shop.

The non-Communist oath: The other day a Mr. Howard Young, of St. Louis, appeared before the Senate Labor Committee, speaking mainly on the non-Communist-oath provision of the present law. He urged that the law be "strengthened," though he did not suggest how. It has bedeviled him and his men, because the officers of the union in his plant, which is near Collinsville, had refused to sign the oath, and he has refused on that account to negotiate with it, provoking a strike which has lasted for months. It was a piece of hard-headedness on both sides, but that is not the question here. Neither is Mr. Young's plea for a strengthening of the provision, that being only some sort of confession that the law is no good.

To me this is the silliest thing I ever read in a statute. For it imputes to Communists who are officers of a union a probity beyond that which obtains among other men. I have little respect for the value of oaths generally, less and less as I grow older and see more of men. The Chicago Crime Commission recently published as its opinion that 65 percent of witnesses in criminal trials perjure themselves whenever occasion suggests, and when they do so their statements are subject to disproof and they then are liable for prosecution for perjury. In Illinois the law requires the members of the general assembly to take an oath that they have not accepted and will not accept any money or other consideration for their action upon legislation; this swearing of 204 men is often referred to among the members themselves as the greatest demonstration of mass perjury in the State. The fact is, as I have had ample opportunity to observe, that many men will accept consideration for their votes, while there are many other honorable men who will not. But the honorable men are deterred by their honor and not by their oath.

And so it seems to me to be assinine for anyone to imagine that a Communist, who is apprehended, to be capable for seditious effort to revolution would balk at a little perjury, which other men supposed honorable will swallow without gulping. Hence, I would say that since this law cannot be remedied, it should be abandoned. For if a union is not dominated by Communists it will be smart enough to elect officers who either are not Communists or, being Communists, will not hestitae to take the oath and then violate it. Either way the oath is futile and it is an insult to honest American patriots who fill most of the union offices.

The injunction against strikes: Waiving other and lesser questionable features of the present law, I think the one deserving most consideration is the injunction provision. That seems to me to be undemocratic, lacking in legislative quality, and in improper employment of the judiciary.

Let me say first that I do not accept the proposition of the President that he has some "inherent" power to call for an injunction to prevent a strike. I am not at all persuaded by the statement of the Attorney General that such power resides in the Executive, and I do not think he can document it in a brief based upon the Constitution. So I shall treat it as a subject of legislation.

The law purports to reach the matter of preventing strikes which jeopardize the national welfare, and it is founded on the principle, not expressed specifically in the law, but stated by Judge Goldsborough in his ruling last April in the Mine Workers case, that "as long as a union is functioning as a union it must be held responsible for the mass action of its members." I think that what has been said about the relation of union members to their officers is relevant here: that members are responsible for the acts of the officers, but that it does not follow that the officers are responsible for the acts of the members.

The more practical question, it seems to me, is, regardless of the theoretical responsibility, and therefore will, respect the orders of the union, particularly when the union orders are in contravention of the union's policy and are, moreover, delivered under duress of a court order. Neither the union laws nor the statute, nor the court order suggest any such eventuality. So far as I can discern any inhibition in the law, the men can strike as quickly and as long as they please. And, again being practical, no matter how crippling a court order may be to the union nothing is achieved for industrial resumption unless the men go to work. One may say that the men have some responsibility to obey the orders of the officers, but the law does not say so, and Judge Goldsborough did not say so, and even if both did there is no penalty on the men if they refuse, which makes the law well-nigh a nullity.

Aside from that, what disturbs me is the employment of court discretion, rather than legislative determination of the penalties which are to be applied in the strikebreaking formula, either against union officials who fail to order their men back to work or, when it comes to that, to the men who may refuse to follow the union order. I consider it the most abject abnegation of legislative responsibility for this Congress to shunt to the courts the duty of determining in a contempt proceeding the guilt and fixing the penalty whenever a paralyzing strike occurs, whether it be by the stubbornness of union officials or of the men who refuse to follow them. When Judge Goldsborough found the miners' officials in contempt he could, for anything in the law to the contrary, have fined John L. Lewis 5 cents or every dollar he possessed or ever expected to possess; or he could have lodged Lewis in jail for whatever time he thought necessary to purge John L.'s contempt. And he could have fined the union 5 cents or every dollar in its treasury. That procedure I submit, gentlemen, does not grow out of sound legislation. That, I submit, is not the acceptance on the part of the Congress, or of individual Congressmen, of a proper legislative responsibility to determine what are illegal acts and to fix and declare the penalties for such acts. I regard it as plain cowardice, wholly unbefitting a proper concept of legislative duty and judgment. Is there any reason why you should not fix penalties in this matter as you do in all others? If you wish to blame only the unions and the union officials for strikes, can you not contrive some formula for determining the extent of their guilt which ensues and fixing the penalty for it? Nothing, I repeat, except cowardice. And that being so, it is hardly necessary to suggest that this cowardice doubtless prevented you from placing any guilt on the men and fixing a penalty for that.

As yet there has been no real test of the capacity of the injunction against unions to stop a paralyzing strike. I know that it will be said at once that John L. Lewis called off the miners' strike last April. But it must be remembered also that at the same time he got what he wanted in the welfare fund which was at issue. The longshoremen's strike last November on the two coasts was not ended by the order to the men to work but by the settlement while they were still idle of the disputed matters. I do not want to be taken as an inciter to strikes or to defiance of the Government by workers, but I predict that under the present law there will be strikes where the men will not follow the orders of the officials who give them under injunction. And I suggest to you that in such event you will have left the Nation helpless by not providing any penalty upon the men who strike.

No one can except to the waiting periods before strikes, which are all the law seeks through the injunctions. But they are not enough. They inflame passions and make negotiation of the disputes more difficult, and of themselves they never can prevent a strike. A program of coercion ought to go all the way along the road it travels, or those who engineer it should turn back. Halfway measures are but a Tantalus.

If you should be so enamored of the waiting-period idea, and whether you enforce it by injunction or by explicit statute, this suggestion comes to me as being worth tendering to you. It would be extremely soothing to men who have to work under threat of a penalty for refusing, if you would provide that whatever benefits they may secure through the negotiations which ensue during the waiting period should be retroactive to the date on which the coerced period began. That matter of simple justice would appeal to the men, would allay their feeling of injustice and would, I think, facilitate settlement of disputes.

Strike problem not settled: In conclusion, let me say that in my judgment the Congress has not faced the problem of paralyzing strikes with anything like the courage which would measure up to its expressions of the gravity of the problem. It has provided only for cooling-off periods, with no answer to the question as to what follows if no agreement is reached during such periods. And for all its bravado it has not showed enough courage to fix penalties on the unions which do not respect the waiting period, rather shifting this duty to the court where, without any mandate of statute, either judicial judgment or cruel capriciousness may prevail. And of course it completely ignores the fundamental fact that it is workers, and not unions, who either do the Nation's work or refuse to do it—and in the end, I insist, it is they who must be dealt with. Manifestly there has been no disposition to adopt summary measures. The law amounts to intimidation: not compulsion.

All this leads up to the conclusion that the Taft-Hartley law was aimed at preventing strikes only incidentally, and that the real object was to break the unions, as the representatives of big business enterprises frankly demand when they ask for a ban on the closed shop.

And it leads to the conviction that even the loudest prophets of the peril which lurks in impending paralyzing strikes may be overstating their case.

Personally, I am not persuaded that the state of our industrial relations yet demands summary measures, though I am contemptuous of anything else. I think there is still time and still field for the trial of amicable negotiations. The present law has harmed, rather than helped, peaceful settlement of disputes. Hence it should be repealed. It may be that it can be judged to have served a good purpose in showing to extreme elements in labor that the country is cognizant of the public interest in industrial production and will not endure privation while stubborn management and stubborn labor battle to the death. It may be that labor and management both will discern that if and when such stubbornness becomes so fixed a pattern as to portend industrial paralysis, the people, through their representatives, will face the problem with the courage it demands and will adopt summary measures—direct penalties, compulsory arbitration, public ownership or whatever they may be, but certainly not any more of the present cringing type now in the law.

Finally, I would say that for the present if you would repeal the Taft-Hartley provisions of the labor law and write a strong section against jurisdictional strikes, you can then go home feeling that you have done a good day's work. Effective compulsion, penalties, and forced labor can await a day when our dangers are more apparent than they are now.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you, Mr. Monroe, for a forthright statement.

Do you have any question, Mr. Kelley?

Mr. KELLEY. I was interested in the gentleman's statement. I like your approach, and I think you have analyzed it better than anyone we have heard yet.

Mr. MONROE. Thank you very much. I appreciate that.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. I have no questions, but I should like to make arrangements to get copies of that statement.

Mr. MONROE. I sent 75 copies to the secretary, and being a printer, I set it up on my own linotype machine, and I can print you a million of them if you want them.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. I have just one question, in regard to the waiting period.

You know it has been referred to many times as the cooling-off period. As a member of the public press, do you not think that is a bad and rather unfortunate and ridiculous sort of thing, because most workers feel that if it is referred to as a cooling-off period, they must be heated up about something that they were wrong about in the first place?

Mr. MONROE. When anyone goes into court to stop someone from doing something; that would be regarded as enjoining a man from not doing something. And when anybody goes into court and gets a mandamus it is not going to cool me off by a damned sight.

Mr. WIER. Very few issues have been settled by mandamus in labor disputes?

Mr. MONROE. No. There was a lot of propaganda going around about how 65 percent of the unions had accepted this, and you would have thought Mr. Taft would have been the proper candidate for President, but even the members of his party did not think so, and the election results did not show it by any means.

Mr. KELLEY. We will now hear from Mr. Copeland.

STATEMENT OF GEORGE W. COPELAND, PERSONNEL DIRECTOR, HART & COOLEY MANUFACTURING CO., HOLLAND, MICH.

Mr. COPELAND. My name is George W. Copeland, and I am employed by Hart & Cooley Manufacturing Co. located in Holland, Mich. I serve this company as their personnel director and in so doing have daily relationships with the other employees of the company and with the bargaining representatives of those classified in the bargaining unit. Holland is a town of about 15,000 and our factory employs about 330 people in the bargaining unit.

I definitely am not and do not profess to be a skilled person, expert, or attorney on labor law but rather come before you as one who works with organized employees in a relatively small plant in a small town, so I will not take up too much of your time with the few observations I have to make. However, I do want to tell you gentlemen that I appreciate very much the opportunity you have given me to testify before you on H. R. 2032.

As I understand it this bill proposes to reenact the Wagner Act which would again put into effect the rules under which labor relations were conducted prior to June 23, 1947. My experience during the latter part of that period has convinced me that those old rules did not provide an adequate foundation for the growth of sound relationships and confidence between the employer, the employee and the bargaining agent which is essential to industrial peace and prosperity.

During this early period we had our first and only strike—that was in 1945. And many other plants with which I had personal contact had like experiences. According to national strike figures put out by the Bureau of Labor Statistics strikes have declined from a peak of 4,985 in 1946 to 3,300 in 1948. It is interesting to note that from 1921 through 1935 strikes averaged 1,150 per year, whereas the 1935–42 period averaged 3,000 per year, which was during the first 7 years under the Wagner Act. In short, that act did not reduce industrial strife.

During this earlier period, in my opinion, employees didn't seem to realize their responsibilities under a collective-bargaining agreement. I remember an instance when about a dozen men refused to work at their machines in direct violation of contract and complete refusal to recognize grievance procedure. Their union officers' attitude was "So what? The boys won't work until you meet these demands. What can I do about it?" When similar cases of irresponsibility involve all the employees of an employer it becomes serious. Since 1947 employees have realized that it is to their own advantage to live up to their contract responsibilities. I do not believe this type of understanding was fostered or encouraged under the rules of the Wagner Act.

One way to gage attitudes of employees is by an analysis of the grievances filed. When both parties worked under the old rules we averaged many more grievances than has been the case since that time. Where it was common practice to receive one grievance a week it is now unusual to receive one a month. A more mature attitude toward the employee-employer relationship exists now than formerly.

I will always remember the bargaining experience I had in a small plant of approximately 60 employees. The bargaining representative of these employees was one of the large international labor organizations. My associates and myself arrived on time for our first meeting. We waited 3 hours before the labor representatives appeared. When the meeting did get under way it only lasted a short time because we were served with a virtual ultimatum, accompanied by abuse and invective. I don't believe the representatives of the employer, of which I was one, were free to act in that manner but rather under the law that was in effect then and according to present law the employer was and is required to bargain in good faith. Perhaps that deliberate conduct by a labor organization was intended to intimidate us and was one of the tricks of the game, but in my estimation it was not bargaining in good faith. Without question this experience created or widened a split in the employer-employee relationship and by driving them farther apart made the understanding by each of the other problems more difficult.

The inequality of bargaining power existing when a small plant of 60 employees or less is dealing with a large international labor organization is worthy of notice. The bargaining agent, in the event of a strike, can afford to compensate strikers for picket duty while some and usually most obtain employment elsewhere. The small employer stands to lose his customers; any surplus he may have is drained in trying to keep his supervisory or office force together and if the strike continues he goes out of business. Although such was not the result in the case I just mentioned nevertheless the eventuality had to be considered.

As I see it, management has the responsibility of operating its business efficiently in all phases such as sales, purchases, finance, and, most important, in the direction of the people whom it employs. As a business develops, the operating head must delegate to others some of the duties he used to perform himself when the business was small. If he can no longer supervise his work force personally he appoints a supervisor to handle this function for him. The supervisor so appointed then becomes a manager of a part of the business and gradually through this process a management organization is built up.

When supervisors are encouraged to organize, which was the result during Wagner Act days, a wedge is driven into the management organization and management is split into two parts. The impairment of management's efficiency is the inevitable result. One quick way for employees to lose respect and confidence in their management is to cause this inefficiency to develop. Employees and their representatives are the first to criticize. In such cases their critical position is sound because any way you look at it, it is to the advantage of both the employer and the employee that business continues to prosper and grow. To return to the old rules of the Wagner Act in my opinion would bring about management inefficiencies.

Much is written nowadays in the newspapers about Communists and often when I read these articles I am reminded of the Communist affidavits which the officers of the local with which we deal, filled out and signed. They happened to sign them before me because I am a notary public as a matter of convenience of our employees. I think their slant on this requirement was that they should not be singled out as a group separate from others with whom they deal. It was a matter of pride and I think their point was well taken. They brought to my attention that their international representative or business agent was not required to file such a statement. Certainly among those who are required to sign but do not, there are those that must follow this same reasoning, whereas undobutedly others are members of the Communist Party.

It seems obvious the solution is to require management and labor who do plant-level bargaining to include such a provision. Then the Communists in both groups will stick out like sore thumbs. To revert back to the Wagner Act is closing one's eyes to the proposition that the conditions in existence in 1935 were different from those existing now. This is true of our whole economy and clearly true in respect to Communist activity.

I cannot help but feel that America is a society of salesmen. Right now, for example, I am trying to sell you something and since I am not a salesman I am probably not doing such a good job of it. You can accept or reject my opinions as you see fit. Both management and labor organizations to be successful must sell. I can remember a situation which occurred in our plant which I think shows the need for a selling philosophy. We were operating under a union-shop agreement at that time and one ardent union member approached a new employee in an antagonistic and belligerent attitude. An argument ensued. The newcomer became stubborn and would not join whether or not his job depended on it. Because it did, he lost his job. I know this former employee could have been sold on becoming a member and if done properly might have developed into an enthusiastic salesmen for this labor organization. This occurred under the old rules of the Wagner Act when the big-stick attitude was prevalent. During the past 2 years when salesmanship has been at work, no incidents like that have occurred and I dare say that more members are in our bargaining unit now without an agreement calling for compulsory membership than there were then. Accurate figures are not available to me but I believe this comparison is correct.

As an employer it has been our policy to maintain strict neutrality so that our employees would have freedom of choice. To give you a better idea of what I mean, I quote from a statement made by the company at a National Labor Relations Board hearing held September 10, 1946:

I have no objection, Mr. Examiner, to restating the position of the company. We favor neither one or the other, the petitioner nor the intervenor. We do desire only that out of these proceedings it be determined who is the rightful bargaining agent, if either of them, for the employees. And the company is prepared to recognize whomever the Board certifies. We have only one desire in this matter and that is that the matter be treated fairly, and if an election follows that all employees have the free and proper opportunity to declare their beliefs. That is the position of the company, and it is the position we have attempted to adhere to throughout these proceedings, continuing as has been testified to recognize the present certified union, the intervenor, only for the purposes that have been testified—to process grievances and the like. But we are holding off further negotiations with respect to a contract or from holding the discussion of a contract pending determination of these proceedings.

With respect to the question of whether or not the petitioner has a right to an election, we take no position whatsoever. That is a matter for proof to the Board, and whatever the Board determines, from the findings, the company will comply with. The same with the position of the intervenor, the company takes no position with respect to their rights, but again will comply and abide by whatever determination is made by the board. I think that states our position rather clearly. Just merely repeating one more thing, we understand if an election follows that whatever labor organization appears on the ballots, there will also appear an opportunity for the employees to indicate their desire of having either union, or neither union, or no union.

However, the employer must at times also be sales-minded and nowadays practically all of the time in matters other than labor relations. Many times misunderstanding arise in the best of homes and when applied to industrial relations it is essential that employees be aware of all facts so that they may clearly weigh their position. Under the old rules of the Wagner Act an employer in submitting facts did so at his own peril. The effectiveness of his salesmanship was very restricted and I don't mean by salesmanship the wielding of the big stick of threats and promises.

Let me summarize: I have attempted to explain to you how going back to the Wagner Act will affect adversely the following:

(1) Industrial disputes.
(2) Contract responsibility and grievances.
(3) Duty to bargain.
(4) Bargaining equality.
(5) Supervision and management efficiency.
(6) Knowledge of Communist operations.
(7) Freedom of the employee from coercion.
(8) Freedom of speech.

In conclusion I would like to say that my experience with these matters, over the last 2 years, convinces me that the present rules under which industrial relations are conducted are far better for the general welfare of all groups in our society than will be a return to the old rules of the Wagner Act. If it's a fair deal the people of this country desire it cannot be accomplished by granting privileges to one select group without consideration for the rights and privileges of the other groups in our country. The slogan "Fair Deal" is, to say the least, misleading when applied to bill H. R. 2032.

I want to thank you gentlemen very much for letting me testify here.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you very much.

Mr. COPELAND. You are very welcome, sir. Thank you for staying late for me.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Dunn?

TESTIMONY OF STEPHEN F. DUNN, ATTORNEY, GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I likewise shall be very brief in my statement.

My name is Stephen F. Dunn. I am an attorney. I have devoted most of my time to industrial labor relations law since 1939. I am familiar mostly with the problems of smaller employers. I have also represented employees in legal problems. I have served on the War

Labor Board and also on the War Manpower Commission and have done some lecturing and teaching on the subject of labor relations.

I would like to submit to you, gentlemen, that the subject of labor relations actually should be viewed historically. It is not simply the Taft-Hartley law standing by itself as a monument or any other statute. It seems to be the trend which is important. Now, I have separated the law affecting labor relations into four separate stages. The first stage, which I believe is the most unfortunate stage, might be called a suppression stage, as represented by the decisions of the English courts and the early American courts, where it was held that unions were contrary to public policy.

The second stage, a toleration stage, under which the unions were not declared illegal, but the Government did not actively try to promote them.

Then the third stage, which I refer to in my brief as the union promotional stage, climaxed by the Wagner Act in 1935, where not only were unions recognized, but aggressively promoted by governmental agencies under a theory that only the employer could be wrong and that the public had no interest in labor disputes.

I submit to you that the first or suppression stage, very wrongfully said that only the union could be wrong, and that the third, or promotional stage, just as fantastically said that only the employer could be wrong.

I think that the Taft-Hartley law represented a fourth stage, a stage where the Government recognized by statute that the public has a vital interest in labor disputes and that the rules must be fairly drawn for both unions and managements, with responsibilities commensurate with the rights granted or protected by the Government. In other words, the Taft-Hartley law is a recognition that unions have come of full age and are a part of our economy.

The question which is now before your committee, gentlemen, I think, is whether you are going to recommend by your action that Government return to the third, or union promotional stage, in which Government places its weight against management, in favor of unions and therefore creates class warfare. I submit also that the Taft-Hartley law actually was passed because public opinion demanded it, after lengthy and full hearings.

There were many items in the trend which created that. Changes in the Wagner Act to bring about equality between unions and management at the bargaining table had been advocated ever since the act was passed in 1935. A number of factors caused this. One was the attitude of the original members of the National Labor Relations Board, plus the Communist infiltration both in unions and in the ranks of some Board agents.

Then we had the sit-down strikes of 1937; then the reports of the Smith committee of the House of Representatives. Then we had the work stoppages and jurisdictional strikes during World War II; then the failure of the President's Labor-Management Conference in 1945, and then the terrible catastrophe, the Nation-wide strikes of 1946.

Disputes over legislation, failure to agree with these important matters, as well as disputes over the bargaining table, altogether too often result from insistence on international union policies at an international level instead of bargaining at the local plant level under existing facts.

Why does every union leader agree that the Wagner Act should be reinstated without change? Why did every union leader in 1947 say, "The Wagner Act is a must"? That has never been the attitude of any business representatives or of the public. Business representatives, in fact, have recommended certain changes in this Taft-Hartley law. I think that business today, and most people who have given this subject thought over a long-term period of time, believe that changes should be made which are in the public interest instead of in any special interest, whether it be employer, employee, or union.

Now, actually, the Taft-Hartley law retains all of the obligations on the employer that the Wagner Act has, and all of the rights of the employee and the union which the Wagner Act has. However, there are at least 16 new rights which are placed in the individual employee under the Taft-Hartley law, which were not in the Wagner Act. Therefore, altogether too often, the fact is overlooked that the Taft-Hartley law actually is a statute for the benefit of the American worker, individually.

For instance, these 16 rights are as follows:

(1) The right to know how his union is run and how the union spends its money.

(2) The right to know which of the unions' officers are Communists.

(3) The right to hold his job as long as he is willing to pay union dues and the right to protection against arbitrary union bylaws.

(4) The right to hear the employer's side of disagreements under the free-speech clause.

(5) The right to permit pay-check deductions through check-off only on voluntary consent.

(6) The right to go directly to supervision with a grievance.

(7) The right not to pay excessive union dues.

(8) The right to be protected against pay-off deals, as union representatives cannot be paid for services not rendered.

(9) The right not to work with featherbedders.

(10) The right to stay at work regardless of jurisdictional disputes or secondary boycotts which do not concern him.

(11) The right to have his welfare funds properly treated as trust funds.

(12) The right not to be thrown out of work by national strikes.

(13) The statutory right to refrain from joining, as well as the right to join, a union.

(14) The right to vote on the question whether his union should ask for union security, and the right to work without being hired from the union hiring hall.

(15) The right to an election to get rid of a union he no longer wants.

(16) The right to file unfair labor practice charges and petition for elections.

Do we want workers to have these rights? And what evidence actually has been submitted against the Taft-Hartley law to show that it is in any way contrary to the best interests of American workers?

Now, the purpose and goal of the Wagner Act admittedly was to promote union development. Do unions need more promoting or governmental protection? Evidences of unions' power are too apparent to require repeating, but I do refer to the hearings before the committees in 1947, and we need recall only the events of 1946 to know that the unions today can stop the entire economic life of the country.

And what about the union's financial strength? The results of a survey published in the May 31, 1948, issue of Life magazine show 32 unions which disclosed in their treasury assets a combined wealth of $224,000,000 available for any emergency. Unions have actually grown to such a size and financial power that small- and medium-sized employers, such as those in our area, are quite helpless to withstand pressure exerted by them. For example, every year in the negotiations, employers are faced with bargaining plans developed not by the local unions but by the international union located in some large city elsewhere. Each item of the contract must meet the requirements of the international union's pattern and the wage demands are uniform. Either they are met or the small employer is faced with a very serious strike backed by finances of these great unions in case he fails to comply.

This has been going on in Michigan since 1947, when the whole State suffered a flurry of sit-down strikes. Many plants were permanently put out of business and workers permanently deprived of employment there through those strikes.

In 1946, Grand Rapids was faced with a long jurisdictional dispute. The sole cause of it was that the CIO leaders sold out to the AFL and then tried to sell out to the employers, to sell out both unions, and the people he represented. So don't unions require some kind of regulation? All other economic groups are regulated. We have many instances in our area—I wish I had time to go into them—where individual employees have been deprived of the right to work, through no fault of their own, by union pressure and without the consent of the employees. Some of them are referred to in my brief. I would be pleased to submit additional evidence to the committee.

So to say that the unions are weak and defenseless and that the employer is rich and overbearing flies in the face of the facts. And furthermore, if small employers are put out of business through the pressure of the patterns, it makes a mockery of the attempts of government to avoid the concentration of business in large concerns.

Now, gentlemen, the sincerity of the union leaders' objections to the Taft-Hartley law must be questioned when we analyze the arguments of the unions against employers, together with the actions of the unions toward their own employees. This subject has been treated. One observer said—

> In dealing with its working personnel, labor as an employer does not have the exemplary record which might be expected from such a vociferous advocate of social improvement.

I cannot take the time now to go through the rest of that analysis. But it points out this. It is now the time to take a tantalizing look at a curious minority. It is doubtful whether as many as 20,000 of the 110,000 people who work for the unions are protected by collective bargaining and enjoy the benefits which organized labor demands that we establish for our employees.

So, gentlemen, this makes it appear that perhaps the union which really is needed most of all is a union to organize the organizers.

It does not take a soothsayer to predict what might happen if we return to the Wagner Act. Do not forget the strikes of 1946, and the Coca-Cola episode in Detroit on D-day, the invasion of Europe, when two big unions struck war plants to determine which one would deliver Coca-Cola to the plants, and the sit-down strikes, which put many an employer out of business.

Can we ever hope to be united in this country under the Wagner Act, which pits class against class? Do we want to be ripe for fifth columns or invasions? Of course not. We want unity. And the Wagner Act is based on many false assumptions.

In the first place, it seems to assume that all labor is exploited by all management. This is as silly as saying that unions are out to break companies. There are good unions and there are good managements, good employers. That will be seen by the fact that many employers today, smaller employers who are unorganized, do as much or more for their employees as any unionized plants. We also have evidence of the many employers who themselves adopted collective bargaining before there ever was a Wagner Act.

Another false assumption is that employees and employers seem to be foes. Actually, they must be allies. They are independent; they are serving the public as fellow-employees. Is it not time to abandon catch-word phrases and emotional assumptions? As the late Will Rogers once said, the only exercise some people get is jumping at conclusions.

The self-styled liberal says, "I am for labor every time." Who is not? But is there not a vast difference between the employee, or group of employees, and the professional union representative?

I submit that the fundamental purpose of our labor statutes should be to give the maximum opportunity to individual employees to act in accordance with their own wishes. The Wagner Act does not do that. Instead of making it easy for employees to have or not have unions, the Wagner Act actually assisted the professional labor organizer to gain control over the economic security of the individual employee, so that instead of the union being the agent of the employee, the employee has become the servant of the union.

I have many case histories which I wish I had the time to go into now.

A third fallacy upon which the Wagner Act is based is the claim that special interests instead of the public interest need protection, and that people can somehow or other be herded into one economic group. But isn't today every act of an American in some way a part of all economic groups? If he works for a living, he is labor. When he buys things, he is a consumer, and he is also an investor. John Smith is a machine in factory "X." From 7 a. m. to 3 p. m., he is a laborer, and asking for higher wages. But from 3 p. m. to 4 p. m., he goes shopping with his wife and immediately becomes a consumer interested in lower prices. When he goes to call on his insurance agent to collect his dividend check, he becomes an investor, or a capitalist, vitally interested in obtaining a higher return on his investment.

The attempt of the Wagner Act to protect professional unions as a segment of the public or a special interest against other segments must be wrong, because each of us participates in each element in our society, depending on what activity we are carrying on at the moment; and any policy setting one economic group in this country against the other is bad for all groups.

As to the Taft-Hartley law contrasted with the Wagner Act, it is to be noted that most of the provisions of the Wagner Act are actually incorporated in the Taft-Hartley law. However, the Taft-Hartley law did do the thing that has caused most of the objections and the complaints from the professional union leaders, although not from the workers themselves as to those separate and distinct provisions. As a matter of fact, the Taft-Hartley law only gives employers as such four new privileges, and they likewise are in the public interest. He has a statutory right to speak freely in union matters, the same as unions. He has the right to complain of unfair labor practices by unions. He has the right to ask for bargaining elections, the same as employee or unions, and the right to sue unions the same as any other parties for breach of contract.

Otherwise, the employer has absolutely no additional rights.

It was contended that the Taft-Hartley law would do a number of things. I submit that not one of these points made by those opposing the act has ever come true. For instance, it was said that it would increase the number of strikes. However, the figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics for the first 16 months under the Taft-Hartley law and the last 16 months under the old Wagner Act provide statistical proof against this, set forth in my brief at page 17, and showing a percentage reduction in strikes of 38 percent.

Now, let us take Michigan, the State where I come from. The period from January 1, 1946, to July 1, 1947, under the Wagner Act, 482 strikes; the period from July 1, 1947, to March 1, 1948, 214 strikes; the reduction under the Taft-Hartley law, 268; the percentage reduction, 55.6 percent.

These figures speak for themselves, gentlemen.

The act has, according to the official Government statistics, reduced jurisdictional strikes from five per month to three per month. The act shows that foremen and supervisory strikes, far from being increased, have been eliminated, but the act has resulted in additional benefits for supervisors. The facts of Government statistics show that the economic power of organized labor has vastly increased, and that the average wage of the American worker has increased over 13 cents per hour in 1 year, more than any other comparable period.

The A. F. of L. had according to the published Government statistics, 6,977,716 members when the Taft-Hartley law went into effect in 1947. One year later, it had 7,220,530 members. The CIO, likewise, has reported that its membership has been climbing steadily. In the last year under the Taft-Hartley law, it not only recouped losses which occurred in the immediate postwar conversion period under the Wagner Act, but has reached a new all-time peak in its membership.

So far as economic power is concerned—and this is particularly significant—in the final 16 months under the Wagner Act, average hourly earnings in industry rose 18.4 percent, while the cost of living index rose 20.8 percent; for the purchasing power of an hour's work fell slightly, and labor actually lost ground. But in the first 16 months under the Taft-Hartley law, earnings rose 12 percent and living costs went up only 8.2 percent. So labor was able to recover all it had lost in the closing months of the Wagner Act, and more.

I have various other points in my brief, from pages 18 to 20, showing that the various predictions against the Taft-Hartley law have simply not been borne out, and that on the contrary the law has actually proven its stated objective in the public interest of helping promote labor-management peace.

I think that all that management and the public are seeking, gentlemen, is a law with equal rights and equal duties on both unions and management, on the theory that they are not foes. Management has never taken the position, as have the unions, that there should be no changes.

Just a word about the closed shop. Some discussion has been had this afternoon while I have been listening. I myself cannot in any way understand how it can be argued that the closed shop should be legal and the yellow-dog contract should be illegal, and I for one think that the yellow-dog contract definitely should be illegal, and I hope it always will be, because it destroys the freedom of the individual to work. It says that the employee cannot work if he belongs to a union. The closed shop says a man cannot work unless he already is a member of that union before he is hired. So the degree of compulsion is exactly the same.

Suppose it is an A. F. of L. shop and the man happens to be a member of the CIO. He would have to change his union affiliation or lose his work opportunity and the opportunity to support his family.

In conclusion, I wish to congratulate this committee on holding these public hearings. I realize that these same unions which seek a return to the strife-producing Wagner Act wanted no hearings whatever. I submit that the only way a good labor bill can be written in the public interest is in committee, and experience has shown it cannot possibly hope to result from amendments simply tacked on on the floor.

In view of the fact that I received very short notice of my appearance, due to your crowded docket, and prepared my statement very hurriedly, and my appearance is short, as I believe, the last witness, I wish to file a copy of my statement and have it as part of the record.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be inserted in the record.

Mr. DUNN. Thank you. Shall I file it right here?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNN. Thank you very much.

(The statement is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF STEPHEN F. DUNN, ATTORNEY, GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., IN OPPOSITION TO CERTAIN PROVISIONS OF H. R. 2032

My name is Stephen F. Dunn. I am presently practing in Grand Rapids, Mich., as a partner in the firm of McCobb, Heaney & Dunn. I was graduated from Cornell University in 1930 and received my LL. B. degree from the University of Michigan in 1933. Since 1939 I have devoted most of my time and attention to various phases of industrial and corporate practice, including labor relations. During World War II, I served for 3 years as an industry member of the War Labor Board, region 11, at Detroit and as an industry member of the War Manpower Commission's Management-Labor Committee for region 5. Following the end of the war, I returned to general practice. I have continued my close contacts with the problems of industrial relations, through teaching and speaking activities and general practice. I am the author of Management Rights in Labor Relations, a book dealing with problems in this field faced by industrial management.

I represent employees, as well as employers, in their legal problems.

I should like to begin by referring to what I call the four stages of development in this country of the law affecting labor relations. The first stage might be called the "suppression stage" under which the English and early American court decisions for some time declared unions were illegal in themselves. The second policy stage is sometimes referred to as the "toleration stage" under which unions, were not declared illegal in themselves as against public policy, but they were not in any way supported by the Government. During this second stage, unions made some progress. The third stage is regarded as the "union promotional and coddling" stage during which we had first the railway labor legislation, then the Norris-LaGuardia Act, then section 7 (a) of the National Industrial Recovery Act and, finally in 1935 the original National Labor Relations Act. During this period unions were not only recognized but were aggressively promoted by governmental agencies under the lopsided Wagner Act. The fourth stage is represented by the Taft-Hartley law. In this stage government for the first time has recognized that the public has a vital interest in labor disputes and that rules must be fairly drawn for both unions and management, with responsibilities commensurate with the rights granted or protected by the Government. The Taft-Hartley law is a recognition that unions have come of full age. The question which is now before this committee is whether or not government, by its action, should return to the third or union-coddling stage in which government places its weight against management and in favor of labor unions.

I submit that the Taft-Hartley law is simply an item in the trend which has been developing in this country. It should be viewed historically and objectively as a part of that trend with sufficient investigation of the history and background to determine its proper position. It would be a tragic mistake—and one which I sincerely hope will not be made by this committee or by Congress—to view the basic law of labor-management relationships as a political football to be kicked back and forth every 2 or 4 years.

The Taft-Hartley law itself was passed as a result of the urgent demands of public opinion that something be done to more fairly regulate union and management relationships in the public interest. Changes in the Wagner Act to bring about equality between unions and management have been advocated ever since the act itself was passed in 1935. The impetus for these proposals was caused by quite a few different circumstances. One of the most important initially was the prolabor and completely biased attitude of the original members of the National Labor Relations Board plus the Communist infiltration, both in unions and in the ranks of the Boards' agents. The sit-down strikes of 1937 which had their focal point in Michigan, contributed to the public interest in a more equitable labor-management statute. Then, too, the reports of the Smith committee of the House of Representatives pointing out the inequitable actions on the part of the Board and the various unfair practices which were being utilized by the unions brought forth, year after year, repeated proposals to amend the statute, all of which were buried in committee. During World War II the numerous work stoppages and jurisdictional strikes brought the attention of the public directly to the danger of aribtrary control in the hands of a few labor leaders, rendering management and the Government completely helpless. I will cite examples of these wartime work stoppages and disputes later in my brief.

The "public be damned" attitude of union leaders (a very few men when compared with rank and file workers, or the public as a whole) had not changed at the time of the President's labor-management conference in 1945. The failure of this conference can be attributed solely to the unwillingness of the leaders of labor unions to sit down with management representatives and work out, on a mutual give-and-take basis, policies which would aid in solving the serious problems which were then arising.

This same situation causes so many disputes at the bargaining table, where insistence on unilateral union policies prevail, instead of bargaining at the local plant level, under existing facts. The union leaders' attitude continued on into the Nation-wide strikes of 1946. I believe that no little part of the present inflation can be attributed to the lack of production which resulted from the tremendous man-hour loss during these Nation-wide strikes. Finally, in 1947, the Congress took up the question of remedial legislation which would solve, in the public interest and on a basis of equality, some of the problems of union-management relationships. Labor leaders, at that time, merely appeared before Congress and objected to any changes whatever in the Wagner Act, which had clearly proved itself to be a failure. Now, after 2 years of living under the Taft-Hartley law, we find that union leadership is maintaining the same position and is insisting upon a return to the old Wagner Act itself and, thus, a return to all of the evils and abuses from which the general public suffered for 12 years under that statute. This insistence has been accompanied by a demand that this Congress eliminate any hearings. In other words, these few leaders—these special pleaders for special interests—say that the facts as to the Taft-Hartley law and the public interest are unimportant. The union spokesmen want to go back to the Wagner Act, at which time union leaders could function as complete dictators, without any tempering regulations by Government.

The attitude of union leaders—these continued attempted to "freeze out" the public—have outraged the American sense of fair play and equality of participation in Government—not only in 1947 and prior years, but also during well-known episodes in the hearings before the Senate committee.

Why does every union leader agree that the Wagner Act should be reinstated without change? For the simple reason that no professional union leader wants any curbs whatsoever on his personal and political power over human beings. Far from being a "slave labor" law or an insult to employees as so glibly stated by those who have not read or do not understand the Taft-Hartley law, the facts are that the individual worker favors the provisions of the law, which contain at least 16 new rights and protections for his benefit.

(1) The right to know how the union is run and how the union spends its money.

(2) The right to know which of the unions' officers are Communists.

(3) The right to hold his job as long as he is willing to pay union dues, and the right to protection against arbitrary union bylaws.

(4) The right to hear the employer's side of disagreements under the "free speech" clause.

(5) The right to permit pay-check deductions through check-off only on voluntary consent.

(6) The right to go direct to supervision with a grievance.

(7) The right not to pay excessive union dues.

(8) The right to be protected against "pay off" deals, as union representatives cannot be paid for services not rendered.

(9) The right not to work with "featherbed loafers."

(10) The right to stay at work, regardless of jurisdictional disputes or secondary boycotts which do not concern him.

(11) The right to have his welfare funds properly treated as trust funds.

(12) The right not to be thrown out of work by national strikes.

(13) The statutory right to refrain from joining, as well as the right to join, a union.

(14) The right to vote on the question whether his union should ask for union security, and the right to work without being hired from the union hall.

(15) The right to an election to get rid of a union he no longer wants.

(16) The right to file unfair labor practice charges and petitions for elections.

What evidence has ever been actually submitted against the Taft-Hartley law? Certainly the statements made before the Senate committee by those objecting to the continuance of the Taft-Hartley law have not produced any facts indicating any reasons for the repeal of the law. To the contrary, the facts that have been shown, and which we shall discuss later, indicate that the law has accomplished its purpose. The overwhelming evidence submitted in more than 5 months of hearings before the Senate and House committees in 1947 provides the best evidence that the return to the Wagner Act would be most unfair and would not be in the public's interest.

The United States was the first country ever to legislate the rules of bargaining. Other nations have more successfully solved their labor-management problems, without such legislation. Before the Taft-Hartley law was passed, a liberal friend of labor occupying a most important governmental position during World War II said: "The Wagner Act has served its purpose and ought to be repealed." The darkest incidents in labor history in this country have occurred under the Wagner Act. It has failed in its stated purpose of reducing disputes burdening commerce. It has completely failed in providing employees with protection of their right to work without interference and the right to treat labor unions as their agents. What has actually happened is that the unions have become the masters and the employees the servants of the unions through the devices of the closed shop, industry-wide bargaining, and coercive control over individual employees.

If the Government continues to deal so unsuccessfully with labor-management problems it might be argued that all of the Wagner Act—as well as the Taft-Hartley law—should be repealed. What if it were? Employees would still have the common-law right to organize collectively for whatever purposes they might desire. The purpose and goal of the Wagner Act was to promote union development. Do unions need any more promoting or governmental protection? Evidences of union power are too apparent to require repeating. I refer again to the lengthy hearings held in 1947 before the House and Senate committees. We need only recall the events of 1946 to realize that the unions can stop the economic life of the entire country. What about the unions' financial strength? The results of a survey published in the May 31, 1948, issue of Life magazine show 32 unions which disclosed as their treasury assets a combined wealth of $224,000,000 available for any emergency.

Unions have grown to such a size and have such financial power that small and medium-sized employers such as those in the Grand Rapids area with which I am familiar are becoming helpless to withstand pressure exerted by these unions no matter how unreasonable their demands may be. For example, we find every year in our negotiations that we are faced with a bargaining plan developed not by our locals but by the international union located in some large city elsewhere. Each item of the contract must meet the requirements of the international union's "pattern" and the wage demands are uniform. Either they must be complied with or the small employer is faced with a serious strike backed by the finances of these great unions in case he fails to comply. In 1937 Grand Rapids suffered a flurry of sit-down strikes which were organized and put into effect by international unions, effectively closing the plants, destroying the financial ability of several companies to continue business and costing employees thousands and thousands of dollars in lost wages. The upshot of the sit-down strikes, incidentally, was that the international representative of the union absconded with funds collected from the employees during the sit-down strike period.

Since 1937 numerous manufacturing establishments have failed, because of their inability to recover from the colossal financial blow struck during the sit-down strike.

In 1946 Grand Rapids was faced with a long jurisdictional dispute between the International Upholsterers Union, AFL, and the United Furniture Workers of America, CIO. This dispute was caused solely by the action of the international representatives of the UFW who, after conferring with the representatives of the AFL, called an emergency meeting and announced that the employees were transferring their allegiance from the CIO to the AFL. The resultant battle between these two big international unions brought many high-powered union attorneys and international representatives to Grand Rapids. Much money was spent, production in the firms dropped and general unrest occurred for a period of several months. The employees themselves profited nothing by this condition: the international unions were the ones who stood to gain. Another example of the international interference with collective-bargaining relationships between employers and employees is to be found at one of our large furniture companies. This company offered a very comprehensive sickness and accident insurance policy which its employees were prepared to accept. However, the international union interfered and refused to permit the local to accept this policy, insisting that the policy offered by the insurance company with which the union had a contract for insurance, with any return of premium to be made to the international union would be the one that had to be accepted. The upshot was that the employees had no insurance for that entire period. We have just recently seen the effect of the power of a large international union on an individual employee. In one of the largest plants in Grand Rapids, the company has been forced by threat of strike to enter into a union-shop agreement. Not many weeks ago an employee of this establishment who had worked there for some time prior to existence of a professional international union came to see us because he had been threatened with the loss of his employment if he failed to join the union. This employee had been a faithful worker for the company for many years, had never joined the union, had no interest in joining the union, and yet he found that his right to a job and all his seniority rights depended on his membership in a labor union in which he had no interest. Imagine the case of a small local company with 10 employees managed by a man and his wife who were forced to bring their baby child to the office every day in an effort to minimize cost and devote maximum effort to keep the business going being faced with continual harassment by an international union boasting of many thousands of members. This union attempted to organize the shop and lost the NLRB-held collective-bargaining election. Despite the election results it is now engaged in a policy of annoying this small employer by filing unfair labor practice charges every time the employer lays off or discharges an individual. Such a case is actually going on in Grand Rapids today.

To say that unions are poor, weak, and defenseless and that the employer is all powerful, rich, and overbearing not only flies in the face of facts, but makes a mockery of our governmental attempts to help small business and to discourage all attempts toward monopoly.

It has been simply the victim of a name-calling contest and it is most commonly called the slave-labor law. No argument should carry the day before this committee if its sole proof is name calling without any factual material whatever to justify the appellation.

In an attempt to inquire into the individual citizen's mind concerning what he thought should be in a fair law regulating labor-management relationships, in the public interest, questionnaires were circulated through direct-mail and newspaper advertising containing pertinent inquiries (exhibit A). For example we asked:

A law which permits the Government to get court orders to delay strikes which would harm the country's health and safety?

A law which would protect the employee's job during disputes involving other companies or other unions? (Secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes.)

A law which protects the employee against unfair practices by both unions and management?

It was suggested that the questionnaire be answered and sent to Senators and Congressen. We are advised that great numbers of citizens have followed this suggestion, and that the replies to the questions have been "Yes" by an overwhelming majority. This informal poll plus the information contained in Look magazine entitled "The Strange Case of the Taft-Hartley Law" shows that the private citizen, whether union member or not, demands legislation protecting the public interest against unfair union practices.

The sincerity of the union leaders' objections to the Taft-Hartley law must be questioned when we analyze the arguments of the unions against employers with the actions of the unions toward their own employees. For example it is estimated that unions employ in excess of 110,000 persons to carry on their own internal operations. How does labor deal with its own employees? One observer was curious enough to seek an answer to this question and I quote him as follows:

"And, in dealing with this working personnel, labor as an employer does not have the exemplary record which might be expected from such a vociferous advocate of social improvement. The fact is that, as employers, labor leaders exhibit most of the conservative characteristics of their fellow executives on the management side of the fence, with the result that there are some rather large discrepancies between what they say and what they do.

"In the light of conditions today on the labor front, there is one particularly notable inconsistency in the relationship between labor and its own employees. This involves the failure of the unions to provide their own employees with anything like the general increases won last year, or with anything like the 25 percent cost-of-living adjustment now being headlined as labor's major demand.

"* * * Not so long ago, an outstanding labor leader said: 'A guaranteed weekly and annual wage is in the forefront of the goals toward which the CIO is working. * * * Most of the unions have declared for the annual wage and that is now a matter of CIO policy.' This is indeed a worthy policy. But what union guarantees an annual wage to its own rank and file employees? Even after diligent search I have been unable to discover one international union which provides its own rank and file employees with a guaranteed annual wage! This is somewhat puzzling in view of the fact that the annual income of the unions is a lot more predictable, with check-offs and maintenance of membership clauses, than are the sales of companies in a competitive market. I would be inclined to hazard a guess that every business in America would welcome the chance to place its customers on an annual check-off basis.

"* * * Another inconsistency, which may be of more than passing interest to you gentlemen, permeates those unions which publish their own newspapers and journals for the benefit of their membership. Today, various labor organizations regularly publish over 600 of these journals and newspapers. It has been competently estimated that this huge labor press reaches over 10,000,000 readers. There is a union, the name of which is quite familiar to most of your newspaper publishers, which has jurisdiction over the staffs of those labor publications. This ancient and honorable guild of writers and scribes has a separate department known as the labor press department, which is designated to service newspaper workers employed by the unions. By the latest survey made, covering the more than 600 labor publications, I am reliably informed that this union has active collective bargaining contracts with only 7 labor newspapers! From this it would seem obvious that the union recognizes the fulsome difficulties that are encountered in publishing a newspaper.

"* * * Perhaps now is a good time to take a tantalizing look at a curious minority. It is doubtful whether as many as 20,000 of the 110,000 people who work for the unions are protected by collective bargaining and enjoy the benefits which organized labor demands that we establish for our employees." [1]

All this makes it appear what the union needed most of all is a union to organize the organizers. They certainly have no seniority rights or grievance procedure.

Of paramount interest at the present moment is the example set by the UAW-CIO in granting to its own employees the kind of a pension plan it claims it wants employers to grant. This belated attempt by the unions to overcome the arguments thrown at them because of their own poor labor relations with their employees points out the vast financial power this particular union now holds. The plan itself is an elaborate and expensive one. Do not forget that the money with which this plan is to be put into effect does not come from the employer out of the hard-earned profits he makes from manufacturing and selling his goods in active competition, but comes from the money wrenched by this union from its individual members including those under compulsory union membership contracts. How can the union then object to the employer who wishes to provide the benefits of group insurance to his employees and only asks them to pay perhaps one-half the cost? Here the UAW–CIO is putting into effect a very fancy and comprehensive plan which is being paid by Joe Doaks who works in Grand Rapids in a UAW-CIO plant and pays his union dues every month whether he wants to or not—and he is paying for the whole pension plan.

In view of the dark history in labor-management relations under the terms of the Wagner Act, it is indeed difficult to imagine how the employee and the public can fail to be victimized by unions if labor-management relations continue to be a political football. For example, are we to return to the "deals" which were made between certain union representatives in Grand Rapids designed to transfer membership in a union from the CIO to the AFL, without knowledge or consent of even the employees? No employees as individuals gain one cent from such a transfer, but the international unions in their struggle for more members and more membership dues did gain quite a bit. Or are we to return again to the type of strike which occurred at the Dodge truck plant at Detroit in early 1947 where the AFL teamsters struck and picketed the plant, although they had no contract with the employer, in order to force that employer to require that all of his contract driveaway truckers and their employees become members of the union? The driveaway truckers, of course, were independent contractors who worked for the Dodge truck plant and others in the job of driving away new cars and trucks.

It doesn't take a soothsayer to predict what will happen if we return to the Wagner Act. Don't forget the strikes in 1946 over the issues of the closed shop and industry-wide bargaining. Don't forget the Coca-Cola episode in Detroit, Mich., during World War II on D-day, when two big unions struck war plants to determine which one would deliver Coca-Cola bottles to industrial plants. Don't forget the sit-down strikes which started in Michigan in 1937 and spread throughout the country. Imagine the chaos each year if we are to have entirely new labor laws followed by attempts at gag rule and disgraceful name calling and pitting of class against class as has just occurred before the Senate Labor Committee. The attempt to jam through a repeater of the Taft-Hartley law without hearings failed because it outraged the American sense of fair play and good sportsmanship. Can we ever hope to be united in this country under a program of this kind? Do we want to be ripe for fifth columns and invasions? Arbitrary action on the part of majorities to deprive the minority groups of a fair opportunity to speak partakes of dictatorship, not democracy. The contrast between the Eighty-first Congress hearings in the Senate against the more than 5 months' hearing in the Eightieth Congress before the same committee does not compare favorably. I think all of you know, as experienced Members of Congress, that a good statute is secured by careful consideration of the pros and cons of each item of the bill in committee. To say that a good statute results from floor amendments flies in the face of many years' experience by the Congress. I congratulate this committee on its decision to hold hearings with the membership of the full committee eligible to attend the hearings. By a careful consideration of the issues raised in the public interest, the public may be served.

THE WAGNER ACT

The Wagner Act is based on completely false assumptions.

In the first place it assumes that all labor is exploited by all management. This is as silly as saying that all unions are out to break all companies or overthrow the Government. There are many good unions, and there are many good employers. Just investigate what management today does for its employees. Many establishments in the furniture and other industries, both in Grand Rapids and elsewhere, have been paying employees vacation, holiday and sick benefits in excess of those urged by the unions. Rest periods are not new—many of these plants have had them for years. Wage rates have been increased steadily until Grand Rapids has become one of the highest wage cities in the furniture industry. All of these changes have been the result of good human relations programs instituted by employers (and not by unions, who fail to provide equivalent benefits for their own employees). Employers and employees are natural allies. They get along fine together if only given a chance. Trouble arises because of the arbitrary interference of professional union organizers who, after all, receive remuneration commensurate with the amount of organizing that they successfully accomplish regardless of the methods used.

Another false assumption is that employees and employers are enemies. Actually they are mutual allies and are interdependently serving the public as fellow employees. I suggest that it's time to abandon catchword phrases and emotional assumptions. As the late Will Rogers, once said: "The only exercise some people get is jumping at conclusions." The liberal emotes "I'm for labor every time." Well, who in the world isn't? Doesn't "labor" include everyone who works for a living? I think we have lost sight of the difference between an employee, or group of employees, and a professional union. The purpose of our labor statutes should be to give the maximum opportunity to individual employees to act in accordance with their wishes. The results that have been accomplished under the Wagner Act have developed elaborate heirarchys of professional labor organizers who are not employees but are men whose livelihood is dependent upon their ability to induce or coerce individuals into joining unions. Instead of making it easy for employees to have or not have unions, our Government has assisted the professional labor unionist to gain control over the economic security of the individual employee so that instead of the union being the agent of the employee the employee has become the servant of the union.

A third fallacy upon which the Wagner Act was based was the claim that special interests instead of the public interest need protection and that people can be herded into one economic group. Every active American today is part of all three economic groups. If he works for a living, he is labor. When he buys things, he is a consumer and also an investor. John Smith is a machine operator at Factory X. From 7 a. m. to 3 p. m. he is "labor," and is asking for higher wages. But from 3 p. m. to 4 p. m. he goes shopping with his wife and immediately becomes a consumer interested in lower prices Then he goes to call on his insurance agent to collect his dividend check. He then becomes a capitalist vitally interested in obtaining a higher return on his investment. The attempt in the Wagner Act to protect professional unions as a segment of the public, a special interest, against other segments of the public with equivalent interest must be false because each of us participates in each element in our society depending on the particular activity that we are following at the moment. Any policy setting one economic group in this country against another is equally bad in the long run for all of us. Speaking of special interests, let me point out that the Thomas-Lesinski bill which you are now considering, as I am told and as the papers and other periodicals advise us, was written by the representatives of one particular group, and no management or public experts were consulted.

Finally, the Wagner Act falsely assumes all employees want to join or need protection of unions and that the public has no interest in such an activity by employees. This was certainly shown to be false in the hearings in the 80th Congress in which individual after individual objected to being forced to belong to a union. To say that the public has no interest in unionization is to ignore the public clamor which arose after the arbitrary actions of the unions in 1946 and which resulted in person after person and group after group requesting permission to testify in 1947.

TAFT-HARTLEY LAW CONTRASTED WITH THE WAGNER ACT

It is impotant to note that the Taft-Hartley law incorporates almost all of the provisions of the Wagner Act. No provision of the Wagner Act imposing an obligation on an employer has been eliminated in the Taft-Hartley law. However, the Taft-Hartley law did do the thing that has caused most of the objections and complaints from professional union leaders: It imposed equivalent obligations on professional union leadership. As a matter of fact, the Taft-Hartley law gave to employers only four new privileges; i. e. the right to speak freely in union matters the same as unions; the right to complain of unfair labor practices by unions similar to the previous and continuing unfair labor practices which might be committed by meployers; the right to ask for a bargaining election to determine the interests of employees just the same as unions have a right to ask for such elections; and lastly the right to sue unions for the breach of a contract made in good faith between the employer and the union, a right which the unions also have.

It is only fair to compare the compaints made about the Taft-Hartley law with the facts concerning the operation of the law itself. I propose to take up the major objections one by one and point out the facts rebutting those objections.

(1) It was contended that the Taft-Hartley law would substantially increase strikes. However, the figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics for the first 16 months under the Taft-Hartley law and the last 16 months under the old Wagner Act provide the following statistical proof that such a claim is totally incorrect.

Period	Number of strikes	Number of workers affected	Man-days of idleness
16 Wagner Act months	6,300	4,785,000	83,725,000
16 Taft-Hartley months	3,925	2,143,000	39,060,000
Reduction under Taft-Hartley law	2,375	2,642,000	44,665,000
Percentage reduction	38	55	53

The figures in Michigan, a great industrial State, as supplied by the Michigan Department of Labor and Industry, show similar dramatic changes:

Period:	Number of strikes
Jan. 1, 1946, to July 1, 1947	482
July 1, 1947, to Mar. 1, 1949	214
Reduction under Taft-Hartley law	268
Percentage reduction	55.6

The figures speak for themselves.

(2) That unions would be forced to call jurisdictional strikes in order to get them before the NLRB for settlement. The Department of Labor, however, reports that the number of jurisdictional strikes in 1946 under the Wagner Act averaged more than four per month. In 1947, prior to the time the law became effective, jurisdictional strikes increased to five per month. In 1948 the first full year under the Taft-Hartley law, jurisdictional strikes dropped to three per month.

(3) That unions of supervisors and foremen would be forced to strike to gain their economic ends. The Department of Labor concedes that there were very few foremen strikes under the Taft-Hartley law. More important the congressional "watchdog" committee reported that the FAA strike at the Ford Motor Co. at the time the Taft-Hartley law was passed collapsed within a few days and that shortly thereafter the company went to work and devised a plan to insure that the salaries of its foremen were equal to or better than those paid elsewhere. The Joint Congressional Committee concluded in its report, and I quote, "not only has the exclusion of supervisory employees from the benefits of the act failed to produce the work stoppages predicted by opponents of the provision, but it has served to promote the establishment by employers of plans creating many new benefits for supervisory employees."

(4) That the membership and the economic power of organized labor would be destroyed under the Taft-Hartley law. The American Federation of Labor shows no such ill effect. The facts indicate that, exclusive of the United Mine Workers, the AFL had 6,977,716 members when the Taft-Hartley law went into effect in 1947. One year later it had 7,220,530 members, a gain of nearly a quarter of a million members. The CIO has reported that its membership has been climbing steadily. In the last year under the Taft-Hartley law, it not only recouped losses which occurred in the immediate postwar conversion period under the Wagner Act but has reached a new all-time peak in membership. So far as economic power is concerned the records of the Department of Labor show the following: In the final 16 months under the Wagner Act, average hourly earnings in industry rose 18.4 percent while the cost-of-living index rose 20.8 percent, so the purchasing power of an hour's work fell slightly and labor lost ground. In the first 16 months under the Taft-Hartley law, earnings rose 12 percent and living costs went up only 8.2 percent so labor was able to recover all it had lost in the closing months of the Wagner Act and more.

(5) That the injunction provisions of the law would be abused. The statistics of the National Labor Relations Board show that out of nearly 4,000 strikes occurring since the Taft-Hartley law became effective, exactly 43 injunctions have been sought and the courts have granted only 24. In national emergency strikes, however, President Truman, himself, has six times ordered the Attorney General to seek injunctions against a labor organization and in each time the restraining order has been granted. The facts show that in only six-tenths of 1 percent of all the strikes occurring under the Taft-Hartley law has injunctive relief been granted by the courts.

(7) That the provisions of the law providing for unfair labor practices of unions would permit employers to harass unions by filing case after case, without any foundation in fact, merely for the purpose of keeping the union so busy answering unfair labor practice charges they could not do any effective collective bargaining or organizing. One would expect that, if such a contention were true, the facts would show that the number of cases brought by employers would vastly outnumber those brought by unions. Or even if the law were exactly equal, there would be as many cases by employers as unions. However, the record of the National Labor Relations Board shows that in the first 15 months under the Taft-Hartley law 5,324 unfair labor practice cases were brought to the Board. Of these, 4,136, or nearly 80 percent, were instituted by unions against employers. Unions and individual workers filed 528 of the remaining cases against other unions, and employers brought only 660 cases or about 13 percent of the total against unions.

(8) That the provision giving the employers the right to sue unions would destroy the unions by giving employers an effective harassing tool permitting them to file suit after suit against unions, thus destroying the union's ability to bargain collectively or organize because of the necessity of defending lawsuits with a corresponding drain on their treasury because of legal and other costs. The congressional "watchdog committee," after surveying the records of all the Federal courts, reports the facts as follows:

Although there are more than 100,000 labor contracts in force under the Taft-Hartley law, there have been only 57 damage suits filed in the Federal courts. Instead of taking thousands of minor grievances to law, unions have filed only 19 such actions against employers and an individual employee has filed 1. Employers, instead of resorting to endless litigation have begun only 37 suits against the unions. In no instance has either party received as much as 1 cent in damages from the other. Many of the cases were dismissed by agreement between the parties. The practical answer is that in 99–94/100 percent of all the bargaining agreements now in effect the parties have settled their disputes without resort to the courts. The watchdog committee came to this conclusion: "The committee believes that the suits reported to date show that neither party desires to recover money damages from the other but that the very presence of this remedy has encouraged employers and unions alike to act with a deeper sense of responsibility." And, in support of this conclusion, the committee cites the sharp decline in the number of wildcat strikes since the Taft-Hartley law became operative.

There have been two very interesting developments under this section of the statute. In the first place, several cases have been filed in which either party has sought a declaratory judgment of the court which would quickly clarify basic arguments between the parties. For example, the Upholsterers International Union, AFL, has filed in the Federal District Court in Philadelphia a petition for a declaratory judgment concerning the welfare program of that union and the court handed down a decision favorable to the union. This is a sensible way of solving problems of this type because it provides the parties with a speedy answer and provides the losing party with legal protection for his action under the court's decision. In the second place, there have been no cases in the territory in and about Grand Rapids in which companies and unions have carried on long and involved court battles against unions. In our Federal district court there is presently pending one case involving the Shakespeare Co. of Kalamazoo, Mich., a city some 48 miles from Grand Rapids. This is an interesting case because it involves a lawsuit over the violation of a contract and is doubly interesting because the complaining party is the union, not the employer. This case certainly bears out the contention made by Walter Reuther at the time NLRB issued a complaint against General Motors that "the Denham complaint serves to remind those employers who backed the Taft-Hartley law that its restrictive provisions can serve as a two-edged sword."

That's what management and the public have been asking—a law with equal rights and equal duties on both unions and management. Management has never taken a position, as have the unions on the Wagner Act, that there should be no changes whatever in the Taft-Hartley law. In fact, management has favored changes which are in the public interest.

CLOSED SHOP

The present ban on the closed shop should be continued. The objections to this type of compulsory union membership are many. I will summarize some of the major ones.

In the first place, through the closed-shop device, an individual is forced to join and pay tribute to an organization for the right to a job. If an employer exercised similar compulsion, the heavens themselves would shake with the roars of outraged protest from labor-union leaders. The closed shop is completely destructive of individual freedom. Control of whom he shall employ is taken from the employer and placed in the hands of a union organization which may, for any reason it sees fit, refuse to accept an individual as a member and thus deprive him of the right to a job. The individual worker will become a pawn to be shuttled from place to place as, not himself, but the unions choose. The closed shop is the final step taken in destruction of the rights of an individual employee to organize for collective bargaining and the ultimate step in securing control of industry by union organizations.

Secondly, the closed shop is blood brother to the "yellow dog" contract. The only difference is that one requires an employee to refrain from joining while the other requires an employee to join. The element of compulsion and the destruction of the individual right of choice is just as bad in one case as in the other. The Government has for many years forbidden the "yellow dog" contract; and I submit it is equally necessary to forbid the closed shop. The evil is the same.

We believe that the closed shop represents the most dangerous threat to individual liberties presently existent in this country. It is a little difficult to reconcile the attitude taken by unions in favor of the closed shop with their open advocacy of Fair Employment Practices Acts in State and Federal Legislatures. The unions object to any discrimination practiced by an employer, with regard to race, color, creed, sex, national origin, or political affiliation; but they are consistent advocates of the company's duty to discriminate against an individual for his affiliation or nonaffiliation with a labor organization where the union so demands. If a man should not be hired for or fired from a job because he is in favor of or opposed to the certain religious or racial groups, then logically he should not be hired or fired because he does or does not belong to a union.

It is also difficult to reconcile the fact that the unions are completely oblivious to the rights of the individual employees when they advocate the closed shop. Yet, some of those same unions were the greatest champions of the rights of the individual workers when they fought for enactment of all the basic labor laws, including the Clayton Act, section 6 of which states "that the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce."

Union leaders contend that a law banning the closed shop is an antilabor law. Nothing could be a greater distortion of the truth. The closed shop has nothing to do with employees: it is purely and simply a protective device used by unions against employees. Nothing prevents an employee from joining a union and giving full voice to his rights and opinions; but, by banning the closed shop, we preserve the right of the employee to withdraw from or not joint a union, as he sees fit.

It should be pointed out that the principles of the Wagner Act are designed to protect "the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment and other mutual aid or protection." There is nothing in the closed shop that protects the freedom of workers; it is a device for perpetuating unions and union management by compulsion on the individual workers. I believe that any device such as the closed shop, which deprives employees of their rights as individuals to speak freely, act freely, and believe freely, is inherently opposed to our philosophy of government and should be made unlawful.

CONCLUSION

H. R. 2032 would repeal the Taft-Hartley law and reinstate the Wagner Act with no changes of any significance. No only the fate of labor-management relations but also the very security of our country is in the hands of you gentlemen and your colleagues in Congress. H. R. 2032 should not be enacted. It is completely opposed to the public interest and is, therefore, opposed to the best interests of all economic groups for the reasons explained and set forth in this brief. The Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 is a fair law enacted after careful consideration in the public interest and because public opinion demanded it. Therefore, the law should be retained either in its present form or with such changes as are clearly shown to be necessary in the best interests of the American public.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of all five of the minority members of the committee, I shall refrain from asking the gentleman any questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. I have just one or two questions that I want to put, in order to clear up something for the record.

In your statement, Mr. Dunn, you say that on May 31, 1948, Life magazine carries a list of some 32 unions. Are you quite sure that that was not 45 unions that showed $224,000,000?

Mr. DUNN. I thought it was 32, Congressman, although, as I say, this brief was prepared in one afternoon. There may be some typographical errors there.

Mr. JACOBS. For the record, I will say that I just counted them. I have the copy that he refers to, and I just counted them. There are 45.

Mr. DUNN. I understood, Congressman—and again I am speaking from recollection of the article—that 45 unions reported, but only 32 of the 45 disclosed the data with respect to their financial status.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, here is the article. There are 45, and the amount of their treasury is set opposite each of them.

Wait a minute. No; there are some blanks on the treasuries.

Mr. DUNN. The point I wanted to make, Congressman Jacobs, is——

Mr. JACOBS. Just a moment. I will have to say that you are correct. I counted the unions, but you are correct. There are 13 for which the treasury is not given.

Mr. DUNN. Thank you.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. Did I understand you to say their combined resources were $200,000,000, and some odd, for these 32 unions?

Mr. DUNN. Yes, sir. I have the figure, Mr. Chairman, $224,000,000.

Mr. KELLEY. How does that compare with one of our largest corporations, the single corporations mentioned there? Is it $2,000,000,000?

Mr. JACOBS. Oh, no; $9,000,000,000.

Mr. KELLEY. $9,000,000,000? One corporation?

Mr. JACOBS. There are 51 corporations in the United States that are worth more than $1,000,000,000. They range from $9,000,000,000 and some million down to $1,000,000,000 and some million.

Mr. KELLEY. I would not say there was an economic equality there, would you?

Mr. DUNN. However, do not the corporations have to have those assets in order to carry on their productive facilities, their investments in machinery and equipment, and their necessary reserves for replacements? Unions, of course, do not engage in those productive activities.

Mr. JACOBS. I think the point, though, is this, that corporations are much better able to weather a storm. Now, I divided this up one time, and I think I found that the total treasuries amounted to about $14 per member. Well, if it had come to a union conducting a strike, like the United Automobile Workers, we will say, which is not a rich union for the number of members it has—it is, I think, a relatively poor union for the number of members it has—but it had only $2 or $3 per head at the time I figured it up, and it would not have had but $10 or $15 at the time General Motors went on strike. So, it should pay no strike benefit.

Mr. DUNN. Congressman——

Mr. JACOBS. I am getting to the point where the economic pressure would hit the hardest, and I think, when it hits in the stomach, that is where it has the greatest impact, of course. We all agree on that.

Mr. DUNN. Congressman Jacobs, I cannot agree to that as to the smaller employer. I think that often all of us are confused in treating this subject from the standpoint only of General Motors or General Electric. Now, take the type of employers in our area. I do not know whether any of you are familiar with, say, a small upholstery shop. I cite one of those instances in my brief, a shop employing 10 employees. The proprietors of the business are man and wife. They take their baby to the office every day in order to economize. They are just barely making a go of it. But an international union, with very large resources, after losing an election there, is filing an unfair-labor-practice charge against them every time they lay off an employee.

Now, in our area, the converse is true. It is the employer who is driven to the wall by pattern demands. For instance, suppose General Motors or Chrysler grants the 18½-cent increase, which I believe was the so-called first round, and this little employer, making upholstered furniture, is faced with the same demand; he either has a ruinous strike or he goes into bankruptcy by meeting that kind of demand. The difficulty is that, when these patterns are introduced, it puts all employers on the same level, regardless of the wage they already are paying, the other benefits their other employees enjoy, their own financial conditions, and all those things, and that is why it seems to me that it is important that the law be so framed that bargaining can be at the local-plant level in the light of conditions that exist there.

I happen to have another situation in Grand Rapids. This particular company has just obtained a fourth mortgage in order to carry on its business, but they were struck for the pattern. I mean, that company's inability to pay has nothing to do with it. So, I believe that the facts show that the smaller employer, who is by far the greater number of employers in this entire country, is at a financial disadvantage when dealing with an international union.

Mr. JACOBS. I think you will agree with me as a lawyer that it would be impossible to draw a law that would absolutely equalize all of them.

Mr. DUNN. I think, sir, however, that the Taft-Hartley law, and also a bill which I failed to mention—it just came to my attention as I was leaving—H. R. 3228, which was submitted by one of the Democratic Congressmen of the committee, Mr. Wood—I think those two types of laws do meet the situation. And H. R. 3228 follows the recommendations of the Joint Congressional Committee, which is the only group which has spent any long term considering the problems of the operations of the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you yield there, Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. I yield.

Mr. KELLEY. I was a member of that joint committee, and I do not think they did any sort of job. At least, they did not follow out the instructions that they were supposed to follow.

Mr. DUNN. I take it you were one of the minority report?

Mr. KELLEY. Exactly.

Mr. DUNN. I realize there was a difference.

Mr. KELLY. I think the idea of the joint committee was good, though.

Mr. DUNN. I do, too, Mr. Chairman. I think it is——

Mr. KELLEY. It came too late. It should have come before they made all these studies, and then make the recommendations to the Congress if they want legislation. If that had been done, we would not be in the mess with the Taft-Hartley law today.

Mr. DUNN. I think there would be a lot of truth in that. I served on some joint labor-management study committees myself. They can be very productive with good results.

Mr. KELLEY. I think it is the only real approach to the problem.

Mr. DUNN. I think it is, too.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. I would like to ask this question. You list a series of 16 instances where you believe the Taft-Hartley Act has emancipated the worker from his union, from certain practices. I will not go through all of them, because I do not have the time. I would like to start with No. 1, the right to know how the union is run and how the union spends his money.

Are not unions associations of people, union members?

Mr. DUNN. Unions?

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. DUNN. Yes; I think that is a correct statement, Congressman Burke.

Mr. BURKE. From that, would you not say that in most, if not all, cases, the member does know how his union is run, because he is the one that is running it?

Mr. DUNN. I do not believe that is so on the basis of actual experience. It has been my experience and observation, and I think it is borne out by the figures, that a relatively small percentage of union members attends union meetings. And, unless there is some accounting or financial report to the members, there is no way in which they can ascertain those facts. I believe, also, that the non-Communist affidavit requirement is very important. I have had some of my friends, professional union leaders, tell me it has helped them purge Communists from their own ranks. I happen to be one of those who believes, however, that the requirement should be applied also to officials of employer concerns.

Mr. BURKE. The way you propose this, you say the right to know which of the union's officers are Communists. Did the Taft-Hartley Act give them that, in effect?

Mr. DUNN. I think it did.

Mr. BURKE. How?

Mr. DUNN. Because the individual worker under the Wagner Act had no way of finding that out. He now can determine by inference that if the non-Communist affidavit has not been filed, the official may be a Communist.

Mr. BURKE. That he may be?

Mr. DUNN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE. It is possible that he can have some conscientious objections to filing it; is that not true?

Mr. DUNN. I think that is true, sir. But I think workers also should be honored in their conscientious objections against joining a union they do not want to join.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you yield, Mr. Burke, for one question?

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Are you in the business of furniture manufacturing?

Mr. DUNN. No, sir, I am not.

Mr. JACOBS. No. But the firm you are talking about representing?

Mr. DUNN. I represent——

Mr. JACOBS. Are you talking about that UIU and the United Furniture fight?

Mr. DUNN. Oh, you mean the jurisdictional dispute?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. DUNN. There was a jurisdictional dispute——

Mr. JACOBS. I do not want to go into detail. I just wondered. The plan that you represent, what does it have? UIU, or United Furniture?

Mr. DUNN. They have both.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. I am way ahead of you.

Mr. DUNN. It was an amazizng situation.

Mr. JACOBS. I do not want to take any more of Mr. Burke's time. I really wanted to know that fact.

I turn it back to him. He is limited in his time.

Mr. BURKE. Could you tell me by what method the worker was given a statutory right to refrain from joining a union, as well as having a right to join?

Mr. DUNN. Section 7 of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 specifically states that; so that it is clear the individual has the right to engage or not to engage in concerted activities.

Mr. BURKE. That was true under the Wagner Act, also; was it not?

Mr. DUNN. It was true under decisions of the National Labor Relations Board, but it did not appear to be true specifically in the statute itself. And there always was a possibility that a change in the Board's personnel or a court overruling the Board would upset that interpretation of the Wagner Act.

Mr. BURKE. You say there is a right to hear the employer's side of the interference under the free-speech clause. Did you hear Mr. Reilly's statement this afternoon, and especially his answers to Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. DUNN. I heard part of it, Congressman Burke.

Mr. BURKE. He is, I understand, probably the main architect of the Taft-Hartley Act. He made the statement this afternoon, unless I misunderstood him, that the Wagner Act did not prohibit the employer from exercising the right of free speech. Did he not say that?

Mr. JACOBS. I did not ask him about that. I rather asked him about the technical application of section 8 (c). That is what I examined him on.

Mr. BURKE. He made that statement, though.

Mr. JACOBS. I did not hear him if he did. He could have, without my catching it.

Mr. DUNN. I did not hear that statement either, sir. However, I might say that I made an independent research at one time of the authorities, and found that there was a vast amount of confusion in the decisions of the Board, specifically, as to just what the rights of free speech involve. Under the early decisions of the Board, an employer practically suffered gag rule. But under later decisions of the Board, those rulings were very much eased up. However, even in 1946, there were two decisions of the Board—I do not have the citations with me—which were squarely in conflict with each other. And it seems to me only fair that, after all, employers are Americans as well as employees, and certainly nobody wants to see an employer unable to talk to his people. They ought to be close; they ought not to have obstacles to good relationships.

Mr. BURKE. I personally never had any objection to an employer's talking to his people, even to putting up a bulletin in his plant about what he might have offered the union. But I certainly did object when he told one of his employees, "Either you stay out of that so-and-so union, or else."

Mr. DUNN. I think, sir, that you would find most employers today completely agreeing with you. I think all of us have to bring our thinking up to date with respect to this labor-management problem. I mean, if we were back in the Dark Ages or even in the early days of the industrial revolution, where the courts were holding that unions were illegal conspiracies, then we might need a Wagner Act. But we are not in that situation today.

Mr. BURKE. We needed a Wagner Act, though, at the time the Wagner Act was enacted. I think you will agree with me on that.

Mr. DUNN. I think, sir, that the history of the labor-management relations would have been much better if we had had a more two-sided statute at that time, because whatever may be said about the American employer in the early days, there is no group of employers in the history of the world in any other country who have done so much for their employees and as much for charity on a voluntary basis. Unfortunately, there were some employers, particularly in those early days, who did not do that. I think that employees do need protection under the laws, but I certainly believe a law modeled more on the basis of the Taft-Hartley Law would have served a better purpose than the Wagner Act in 1935.

Mr. BURKE. Without the Wagner Act, the organization of the industry in which I worked would have been impossible. That was the automobile industry.

Mr. DUNN. Do you not think it would have been possible under the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. BURKE. No.

Mr. DUNN. Because after all, you see, the employee is given the same right of self-organization. The unions are given the same rights, and the employers are under the same obligations.

Mr. BURKE. We never could have gotten started, as a practical matter. I know that.

Mr. DUNN. No, sir; I do not know anything that did not happen.

Mr. BURKE. That is speculation, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. DUNN. It is.

Mr. KELLEY. Is that all, Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Dunn.

Mr. DUNN. Thank you, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. The committee will stand in recess until 7:30.

(Whereupon, at 7 p. m., the subcommittee recessed until 7:30 p. m. of the same day.)

NIGHT SESSION

(Pursuant to recess, the subcommittee reconvened at 7:30 p. m.)

Mr. BAILEY. The subcommittee will be in order. At this time we will be pleased to hear from Mr. Arthur L. Winn, Jr., of the National Independent Meat Packers Association.

TESTIMONY OF ARTHUR L. WINN, JR., REPRESENTING THE NATIONAL INDEPENDENT MEAT PACKERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. WINN. May it please the committee, my name is Arthur L. Winn, Jr. I am appearing on behalf of the National Independent Meat Packer's Association, an organization of small- and medium-sized packing plants, over 600 in number, located in almost every State.

General counsel of our association, Wilbur La Roe, Jr., has intended to appear before the committee, but is unable to appear today. I shall limit myself to a few fundamental considerations and ask the committee's permission to file Mr. La Roe's longer statement.

Our association of independent packers, and its members, are not among those who oppose all liberal measures, or among those who fight everything that benefits labor. We wish that all industry and all labor interests would realize that our Nation cannot attain maximum strength if industry and labor regard each other as enemies. They must regard themselves as partners. It takes teamwork to build a democracy.

Our association favors a fair deal for labor. It feels that this fair deal may best be protected and its permanence assured if there is a fair deal all around, for the employer and for the general public. The essence of a successful democracy is not unlimited freedom or unrestrained privilege but rights and privileges with responsibility and so limited as to safeguard the rights of others and the well-being of the general public.

The Taft-Hartley Act, which H. R. 2032 would repeal, provides, in connection with the rights and privileges of labor, safeguards for the rights of the employer—the other partner—and for the general public. In our opinion, these safeguards and beneficial provisions of law should not be discarded. Their repeal would, we believe, deprive the other half of the partnership and the general public of their part of a fair deal.

When we examine the individual provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, it is difficult to see why they should be struck down. For example, the present law recognizes the rights of an employer to free speech. This is a fundamental right of every American citizen. Employers, as well as well as other citizens, should have this right safeguarded.

The closed shop is a denial of freedom to work. It represents an attempt by a particular group to deny freedom to other men, not in the interest of the whole, but in the interest of the particular group. The union-shop arrangements say to the employer "You shall not employ these men, no matter how good they are as workers or how high their standing as American citizens, because we want a monopoly for our own benefit." That sort of thing can kill freedom. It is banned by the present law and that ban should be continued.

The present law gives the public and employers protection against disruptive and destructive jurisdictional strikes and secondary boycotts. Workers certainly have the right to work or not to work and based on this fundamental right they may strike for better wages or working conditions. However, neither the employer nor the public should suffer because of a dispute between unions as to which has jurisdiction over workers.

That question should be decided peaceably and without unnecessary injury to innocent third parties. The secondary boycott, likewise, involves unfair and harmful injury to innocent third parties. The present law protects these third parties and that protection should not be eliminated.

The right of workers to bargain collectively carries with it a duty to bargain. This duty on the part of the union is stated in the present law. If that duty is eliminated by repeal, we shall have not a fair deal but a one-sided arrangement in which the only statutory duty to bargain is imposed upon the employer.

Under the present law, the special position of foremen as a part of management is recognized. If this provision is repealed, foremen will be considered in the same status as other employees and management will have to treat them not as a part of management but merely as employees.

There are many other safeguards to the rights of these parties and the public in the present law which we believe are necessary to a sound national labor policy. My time does not permit me to deal with each of these. We ask that the general provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act be continued in effect and ask the committee to disapprove the general repeal proposed in H. R. 2032.

May I have the permission of the committee to file the longer statement by Mr. La Roe?

Mr. BAILEY. You may do so.

(The statement referred to is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF WILBUR LA ROE, JR., ON BEHALF OF NATIONAL INDEPENDENT MEAT PACKERS ASSOCIATION

My name is Wilbur La Roe, Jr., general counsel, National Independent Meat Packers Association, 743 Investment Building, Washington, D. C. I appear on behalf of National Independent Meat Packers Association, the largest association of meat packers in the United States. It members are so-called independent meat packers, the big packers not being members.

My clients are not among those who oppose all liberal measures or among those who fight everything that benefits labor. We wish that all industries and all labor interests would realize that our Nation cannot attain maximum strength as long as industry and labor regard each other as enemies instead of partners. It takes teamwork to build a democracy. Our Nation has shown a genius not only for solving its great problems but for maximum production. It is only by continuing heavy production that we shall have enough goods to provide the abundant life for everybody, and it is only by teamwork that this goal can be achieved. There is no surer way to spoil our democracy than by having capital and labor continually fighting each other, with the public badly injured as an innocent bystander.

The whole democratic world is looking to America for leadership today—not so much for leadership in technology as for leadership in maintaining the principles of democracy. There are invisible golden strands in the Stars and Stripes which account for America's leadership among the democracies of the world. Our Nation was founded by men who were willing to pay any price for real freedom. When they came over here they brought their Bibles with them, and the cornerstone of their faith was the dignity and sanctity of man. Once we get into our heads the proposition that the humblest man in a factory is a sacred individual we have gone a long way toward solving what I consider to be the most important problem confronting America today, namely, the relationship between capital and labor.

The freedom which was brought for us at great price and which we have inherited without too heavy a contribution by ourselves is, I solemnly believe, in danger of being lost unless we steadfastly and courageously adhere to certain fundamental principles which must control any legislation on this subject.

The first of these principles, obviously, is that there must be minimum interference with liberty, whether the liberty of the industrialist or the liberty of the workingman. This does not mean unrestrained liberty, for it is axiomatic in a democracy that the good of the many is more important than the good of the few. And the rights of men must always be exercised with due regard to the rights of others. Freedom cannot be absolute in a democracy. If I were an absolutely free man I could drive my car at 80 miles per hour through the streets of Washington, but it is not in the public interest that I have so much freedom. If I were absolutely free I could employ labor of any age group, and work them as many hours as I please and under any conditions. But society has a right to say to me as an employer that certain types of employment and certain conditions surrounding employment are injurious to society and that I must obey certain reasonable regulations if I am to be an employer. By the same token the workingman must understand that his freedom is not absolute. He must not use violence. He must not resort to force any more than I may try to collect a debt by force. If a democracy is to succeed it is basic that there shall be peaceful adjudication of differences.

The strike is not necessarily violent. If men have a right to join together peacefully in labor unions, as they clearly do have, they also have a right to agree to quit work, provided there is not a substantial public interest that would be grievously injured. Unless wages are to be fixed by the Government, which is inconceivable in a democracy, capital and labor must be free to bargain with each other, and the right to bargain presupposes the right to disagree.

I must pause here to say a word about the fixing of wages by the Government although no such thing is proposed by anybody. There is no greater danger confronting the world today than totalitarianism, the principal indicia of which are a denial of human freedom, a denial of God, the making of the Government the master instead of the servant of the people and the reducing of man to a point where he is a mere cog in a gigantic state machine. The individual must at his peril conform to the desires of the dictatorship as to his philosophy, his expressions, and even his religion. In America the Government is the servant and not the master of the people and government exists, not as something for the people to serve, but as something to serve the people and protect the most sacred thing we have in our democracy, the dignity and sanctity of the individual.

In saying this I am not one of those who believes that the Government must always remain in a narrow predetermined channel. Those who want a do-nothing government are often those who derive some selfish advantage from exercising their freedom as they please and without regard to the rights of others. But Woodrow Wilson used to warn us at Princeton—and I wish that he were alive to speak now—that there is danger in having the voice of America emanate from Washington. He said that the true voice of America comes from the little farm, the little plant, the little white church and the little red schoolhouse. He wanted the people to tell the Government what to do, and he feared the day when the Government might tell the people what to do. When you have the latter you have totalitarianism.

It follows from what I have said that in a democracy there must always be a middle course between too much freedom and too much government. Too much freedom is anarchy or chaos. Too much government is fascism or communism or some other type of totalitarianism.

This may seem like a lecture on political philosophy, but it has a direct and very important bearing on the issues here. Let us deal with a few phases of industry-labor relations and apply these sound principles to them.

The first principle—one so important that it cannot be subordinated to anything else—is that labor must have an adequate and if possible an abundant standard of living. Our whole democracy must fail if labor does not share reasonably in the fruits of industry. But as to this matter we in America have succeeded better than any nation on the face of the earth, and we have not done it by decreeing wage levels or standards of living by law. If the great mass of our workingmen today have their own little home and their own car and ample food and clothing and reasonable opportunity to educate their children, which the masses of men do have, it is not because this standard of living was legislated for them, as in Russia. This high standard of living in America is the result of our passion for the dignity of man and the incentive that flows from freedom and inspires a man to do his best. It is this respect for the dignity of man and the inspiration that it gives the human soul that account for our huge production and our great wealth and the welfare of the masses of men. If we try to legislate these goals we destroy one of the most precious things in American life.

Do not understand me as being opposed to all labor legislation. Legislation that protects the people as a whole against dangerous practices or which protects the individual against manifest injustice is of the very essence of democracy. Laws are often necessary to assure that greatest good for the greatest number. But you cannot attain that highest good if you kill the spirit that is the genius behind our great success as a nation, and that spirit is the spirit of enterprise, of initiative, of doing better, of improving one's lot, of freedom to choose, of freedom to work or not to work, of freedom to bargain with others, of freedom to use the talents which God has given us to accomplish the highest we know. That spirit must at all costs be kept alive, both for employers and for workers. Regimentation kills it.

The closed shop is perhaps the best illustration of denial of freedom and unwarranted regimentation in the field with which we are here dealing. When you analyze the closed shop, you find that it is a system in which freedom is denied for the benefit, not of the whole, but of a particular group. It represents an attempt by a particular group to deny freedom to other men, not in the interest of the whole, but in the interest of the few. It says to another group of men: "You shall not be permitted to work unless you join our union." And it says to the employer: "You shall not employ these men, no matter how good they are as workers or how high their standing as American citizens, because we want a monopoly for our own benefit." That sort of thing can kill freedom, and it must not be sanctioned by legislation.

Dealing next with the principle of the injunction, it is a very dangerous weapon to use in the area of human freedom, and its use must be sparingly exercised. When you deal with a man's right to work or not to work, you are dealing with something very precious, and you have got to be careful how you deal with it if you are to preserve the spirit to which I have referred. If a man has a right to strike he has a right not to have that right interfered with, unless he strikes in a manner that works injury to the community. It is not the right to strike that may be enjoined, but the right to strike in a manner that works injury to the public.

There are certain occupations which are so closely related to the general public welfare that those engaged in them have a greater responsibility than others have to refrain from any action that would injure the whole public. Taking an extreme illustration to start with, if I am employed by the Navy I should not be permitted to induce my fellow employees to strike and imperil the Nation. When I join the Navy it should be with the understanding that I am willing to have my compensation fixed by the Government. When I work for a water company or a gas company, even if they are privately owned, I must be willing to accept machinery provided by law for the adjustment of my grievances because it ought to be an implied condition of my employment in public utility work that I will not strike because I know that a strike would endanger the health and even the life of the community. Now this does not mean that the private water company or private gas company is to have its own way and be protected in the maintenance of subnormal wages or poor working conditions. The very best machinery must be devised to insure prompt and adequate adjudication or arbitration of such disputes, for they involve far more than the rights of the contesting parties. There must be no surrender of the proposition that the rights of the public are not to be subordinated to the rights of the contestants in such a dispute. This very important principle is violated in the proposed bill because it withdraws or weakens protection to the public which is afforded by the Taft-Hartley law. A situation where the whole public is thus endangered should be regarded as an exception to the general rule against injunctions and the public should receive the fullest protection, but machinery should be devised, as it has been in other areas of life, to provide for peaceful adjudication. Otherwise John L. Lewis will continue to be above the people. I do not have the dislike for him personally which some people have—I think he has done wonders for those whom he represents, but those who love America and the precious things that have made America great cannot but see a grave danger in letting any man become more important than the public. I speak impersonally when I say that the kind of power which John L. Lewis exercises is a threat to our democracy. This bill would tend to restore his power.

Jurisdictional strikes must be made unlawful. When two unions get to quarreling with each other as to which has jurisdiction there is grave danger that the public, the third party, will be seriously injured although it is no party to the dispute. My enemy and I have a legal right to hate each other, but we do not have a right to batter each up on F street because our fighting would inconvenience and disturb the public. The secondary boycott is in the same category because it would punish innocent parties in the interest of the contestants. The bill is sound in attempting to prevent such wrongs.

The attempt to wipe out State laws where they attempt to prohibit the closed shop involves a twofold danger and represents a double violation of principle. In the first place, the closed shop is per se a denial of freedom. In the second place, it was never intended under our Constitution that sovereign rights of the States should be destroyed. There is no more basic right of a State than the exercise of the police power, including the right to control the health and welfare of the citizens. If a State decree by law that freedom within the State demands that there shall be no such monopoly and no such denial of human rights as the closed shop represents, it would be a grotesque interference with the sovereign rights of the State for the Federal Government to hold that it has the power to prevent a State from exercising such control over its own citizens. The United States Supreme Court has recently spoken on this matter, and it will speak again if there is an attempt to deny to the States this basic right.

As to minimum wages, our Association has taken no position, probably because all our members pay well over the minimum. In most of our plants the hourly wage is now over a dollar or close to a dollar.

Of late wages generally have sharply increased due to the operation of economic laws. This increase has applied, as everybody knows who employs labor, to common labor. The best way to ensure a high wage, including the wages of common labor, is to give encouragement to huge production and to the most effective operation of the free-enterprise system. What that system can do when it is encouraged to function at its best has been demonstrated in recent years, and I know full well what an enormous part the Government has played in giving direction to some of the economic forces that have helped to make this result possible. This experience has demonstrated in my opinion that Government can cooperate with business and that business can cooperate with Government and that huge production and the abundant life for the masses of workers can be attained through teamwork and without legislating wages. Teamwork is the real answer to most of these problems—teamwork primarily between industry and labor. But the Government is now definitely a part of the team and it can serve best by cooperating with industry and with labor. If that teamwork continues to be effective we shall find that we can attain the abundant life for our people without an excessive amount of legislation.

The whole world has its eyes on us. There are those who say that our system is sure to break down. It will not break down if we work together as a team and safeguard the sacred principles which have made us the leading democracy of the world.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Winn, what percent of the individual companies making up your association are organized—I mean what percent of their plants are organized?

Mr. WINN. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I do not have the information. I know some are CIO, and some are A. F. of L. They seem to work on an individual basis. I have a feeling that most of our plants are certainly organized, even in some southern towns.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you have any questions, Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Winn, I am quite impressed with the attitude of almost every representative of the employer who comes here, in his testimony against the closed shop. Perhaps you have been here and have heard some of the questions I have put to some of the witnesses.

Mr. WINN. I have heard some of them; yes, sir. I have not heard them all, though, by quite a bit.

Mr. JACOBS. I would like to get someone to get me some procedure whereby the employees, the workers, can formulate for themselves a unified front to meet the unified front that the employer, by the nature of his corporate status, generally has.

Mr. WINN. It seems to me where you have a union shop, or a right to a union shop, each employee thereunder becomes required to become a member of the union, and he finds in doing so that the union does present a unified front. It represents him, and he is bound by it. It is his agent, so, there, you have, it seems to me, a strong unity. In our industry the unions are in a very favorable position because they make a good deal with a competitor, and the other fellows then have to go along, or get struck, and it is a lovely situation for the unions. The unions in our industry are much more unified than the employers.

Mr. JACOBS. I think you are right. I think the union shop adapts itself very well to the permanent employees, but I am thinking now not only of the employees working in the shop, where there is a permanent force, but I am thinking also of what I have referred to as the intermittent worker in building construction trades, et cetera.

The union shop is not adapted, to may way of thinking, to that type of work.

Mr. WINN. It may not be.

Mr. JACOBS. You come here as counsel for this group, and you think in terms of their requirements, do you not?

Mr. WINN. Of our situation, and I cannot plead guilty to knowing anything about the construction industry, or anything about their labor problems or questions.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, we who sit up here are supposed to think of all of them.

Mr. WINN. Quite right.

Mr. JACOBS. I am aware of the fact that in 1921 in the building construction trades in Chicago an open shop was awarded, which sounds good—I mean open shops sound good. It gives every man a free choice, and it sounds fine. As a practical proposition, it was not very long before the contractors did not want it themselves, because they figured they got better men from the union halls, and they went back to it, so when you speak of the union shop you have in mind only the type of plant where there are permanent employees; that is what you are familiar with?

Mr. WINN. In the past, and even today, there is much seasonal work in the packing industry because farmers bring their livestock to market seasonally, but our industry has been striving to give uniform year-round work to workers, so we are working towards more permanent staffs for permanent workers.

Mr. JACOBS. It is not the intermittent type of work that the carpenter and bricklayer and plumber, and so forth, has, of course?

Mr. WINN. It is not.

Mr. JACOBS. And you are not thinking in terms of those which opposed the closed shop, I take it?

Mr. WINN. I know nothing about those problems.

Mr. JACOBS. You know nothing about it and don't pass judgment?

Mr. WINN. I do not.

Mr. JACOBS. I do not know whether I was woolgathering and failed to get your statement, but did you say you favored the continuation of the union-security election?

Mr. WINN. I did not specifically on that, but under the present statute which we favor the continuance of, you do have the union shop, where it is agreed they be protected. Do I answer your question?

Mr. JACOBS. What I want to know is, do you think we should continue to have the election before the union is entitled to bargain for a union shop?

Mr. WINN. I have not thought about that question, Mr. Congressman. I think you normally have to have some procedure for determining whether a certain union does in fact represent your worker.

Mr. JACOBS. No. I do not mean that. Of course, we must always have an election before we can determine union A or union B represents the employees, and if there is a dispute there is one way to settle it and that is to set up the ballot box and let them vote, but we have had the election, and I am the representative of the union, and I come to you, as the employer; do you think I should be allowed to bargain with you for the union shop without having another election as a condition precedent? You know under the Taft-Hartley law you cannot have a union shop unless you hold a second election: you know that do you not?

Mr. WINN. Yes, I know that, but I have not, frankly, Mr. Congressman, thought that thing through, and I would not want to give any half-baked answer to you. It would not help you or help me.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you know whether it is covered in the longer statement you filed?

Mr. WINN. We do not cover that.

Mr. JACOBS. I take it that your position, then, has not been arrived at? You have not arrived at a position in your industry?

Mr. WINN. That is right. We have dealt only with the question as to whether the general provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act and the Wagner Act, as they stand today, should be changed by taking out the Taft-Hartley amendment.

Mr. JACOBS. Then, as a matter of fact, did you have closed shop before the Taft-Hartley, or union shop? Which did you have?

Mr. WINN. When you say "we," you must remember again we have the greatest variety of packers, and we have the big packers in Chicago which are not members of our association. And our little plant in Georgia might have one arrangement, and our plant in Iowa would have another arrangement.

Mr. JACOBS. I mean, by and large, was the union shop prevalent, or was the closed shop prevalent?

Mr. WINN. So far as I know, the union shop was not prevalent. I misspoke: The closed shop was not prevalent.

Mr. JACOBS. It is my impression that the closed shop, as such, was generally not prevalent in industrial plants. The union shop was what obtained in most instances.

Thank you very much.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you.

Mr. WINN. Thank you, and thank you for your patience.

Mr. BAILEY. Is Mr. Keefe present, of the Shipbuilders Council of America?

Mr. Keefe, we will hear you at this time.

TESTIMONY OF J. P. KEEFE, REPRESENTING THE SHIPBUILDERS COUNCIL OF AMERICA

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, may I state at the outset that we have filed a formal statement of our position with the committee.

With your indulgence, I would like to summarize that statement, reducing it to an abbreviated oral presention.

Our position, however, is presented in full in the printed matter left with the committee.[1]

My name is J. P. Keefe. I am director of industrial relations for the Alabama Drydock & Shipbuilding Co., Mobile, Ala.

I appear on behalf of the Shipbuilders Council of America, an association whose members operate 43 yards employing approximately 70 percent of the employees in the industry.

It is the purpose of this statement to present the views of the members of the Shipbuilders Council in support of retaining in the law provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act which members of the council consider vital to the building up and continuance of sound and healthy labor relations and which have, in a measure, restored the balance of responsibility between management and labor.

In June 1946, when President Truman vetoed the Case bill, he stated to Congress the criteria which should govern the drafting of corrective labor legislation. He said:

> There should be no emphasis placed upon considerations of whether a bill is antilabor or prolabor. Where excesses have developed on the part of labor leaders or management, such excesses should be corrected—not in order to injure either party—but to bring about as great an equality as possible between the bargaining positions of labor and management. Neither should be permitted to become too powerful as against the public interest as a whole.
> Equality for both and vigilance for the public welfare—these should be the watchwords of future legislation.
> A comprehensive study of this problem should be based on a realization that labor is now rapidly coming of age and that it should take its place before the bar of public opinion on an equality with management.

The shipbuilding and ship-repair industry believes that the provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act which it is not urging Congress to retain are fully within the spirit of those words of the President. I shall discuss the principal provisions briefly.

(1) Exclusion of supervisory personnel from the coverage of the act. The original Wagner Act did not contain any provisions relating to supervisory personnel, but it seems to have been generally assumed that foremen and other supervisory personnel represent "the boss" and therefore were not covered. It was not until 7 years after Congress passed the Wagner Act that anyone even asked the National Labor Relations Board to establish a separate unit composed of supervisors. The Board then certified a union of supervisors which claimed to be independent but was in fact affiliated with the union that represented the rank and file (matter of Union Collieries Coal Co., 41 N. L. R. B. 961 (1942)). There was promptly introduced in Congress a bill to exclude foremen from the Wagner Act; but, while it was pending in committee, the Board, on May 10, 1943, reversed itself and held that it would not certify a unit of supervisory personnel (matter of Maryland Drydock Co., 49 N. L. R. B. 733). Congress then dropped the bill. Thereafter, the Board confirmed its decision in the Maryland Drydock case in a number of subsequent cases; but 2 years later it again changed its mind and certified a union of foremen (matter of Packard Motor Car Co., 61 N. L. R. B. 1212 (1945)).

It was that state of affairs that Congress in the Labor-Management Relations Act excluded supervisory employees from the coverage of the act.

Congress did not have to go beyond the opinion of the Board in the Maryland Drydock case for powerful reasons for taking that action. As the Board there stated (pp. 740–741):

> The very nature of a foreman's duties makes him an instrumentality of management in dealing with labor * * *. To hold that the National Labor Relations Act contemplated the representation of supervisory employees by the same organizations which might represent the subordinates would be to view the statute as repudiating the historic prohibition of the common law against fiduciaries serving conflicting interests.

But the Labor Committees of both the Senate and House did not rest on the authority of the Board in drafting the provision under discussion. They called witnesses from both management and labor, whose testimony eloquently bore out that the unionization of supervisors led to divided loyalties on the part of men whom management regards as its representatives and whom management must employ as its agents, not only to assign employees to their work, but to see that they keep at their work and do it well, to correct them when they are at fault, to settle their complaints and grievances and to discipline them. The evidence before the committees showed incontrovertibly that supervisors' unions necessarily had to be under constant obligation to the rank and file unions; that supervisors cannot successfully strike without the agreement of the rank and file not to do the work of striking supervisors; that the Foremen's Association of America had adopted a policy of forbidding its members to enter plants, even for the purpose of maintenance, where the rank and file unions were on strike and had not given their consent. One official of a rank and file union testified before the House committee:

> Well, we are trying to get them (the supervisors) to join the union * * * and then we'll be their bosses. We'll be their bosses. (H. Report No. 245, 80th Cong., 1st sess., April 11, 1947, p. 16.)

In the shipbuilding and ship-repair industry particularly, it is of extreme importance that supervisory personnel be absolutely loyal to management and free from the pressures of union groups which they supervise. It is not a mere coincidence that the National Labor Relations Board reestablished the principle of excluding supervisory personnel from the coverage of the Wagner Act in a case where the employer was a ship-repair company, the Maryland Drydock Co. Shipyards cover large areas, operations are greatly decentralized, and many separate operations are performed by small groups of workers working in isolated places. The employers are forced, by physical circumstances, to place great reliance for the supervision and direction of such employees upon their immediate supervisors. In a shipyard, unlike an ordinary factor, a department head cannot enter a room and at a glance see whether operations are proceeding efficiently. As a result, in shipyards greater reliance, perforce, is placed on the lower echelons of supervisory personnel than is necessary in a mass-production manufacturing plant.

The shipbuilding and ship-repair industry therefore urges, on the grounds of the need of management for faithful agents and the inevitability that unions of supervisory personnel will fall under the domination of rank and file unions, that this Congress not make any change in the law that will bring supervisory personnel under the coverage of the Wagner Act.

(2) Freedom of speech: It is so obviously desirable that employees have an opportunity to hear both sides of a labor controversy before making a decision that it is unthinkable that the free-speech provision of the Labor Management Relations Act should in any way be weakened or repealed.

If anything, it should be strengthened by blocking a loophole revealed by a recent decision of the National Labor Relations Board, with two members dissenting, holding that the free speech provision is restricted to unfair labor practice cases.

There is no reason why any distinction should be made between representation cases and unfair-labor-practice cases, and it is recommended that the act be amended so as to insure the constitutional right of free speech in preelection campaigns.

(3) Union responsibility: Every fair-minded person subscribes to the principle that unions should be responsible for their actions—responsible in their dealings with management, in their treatment of their members, and in their relations with the public. But that principle is nothing but an ineffectual generality unless it is implemented and applied in specific situations.

The shipbuilding and ship-repair industry, therefore, urges that there be retained in the law those provisions of the Labor Management Relations Act which are designed to foster union responsibility. Most important among those provisions are the following:

(a) Responsibility for acts of agents. Section 2 (13) of the Labor-Management Regulations Act makes applicable to labor disputes the common-law rules of agency, instead of section 6 of the Norris-Laguardia Act.

Section 6 of the Norris-Laguardia Act has been interpreted by the Supreme Court in such a way that it has become practically impossible to prove an agency relationship, even though under the normal common-law rules of evidence, and in common sense, there could be no doubt that an agency relationship existed. As Justice Frankfurter states in a dissent in which he was joined by Chief Justice Vinson and Justice Burton, the interpretation given to section 6 by the majority of the Court "serves to immunize unions, especially the more alert and powerful, as well as corporations involved in labor disputes, from Sherman Law liability." United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. United States, 330 U. S. 395, 422 (1947). That difficulty of proof, of course, extends to other acts besides Sherman-law violations.

Naturally, unions are opposed to any attempt to deprive them of the artificial protection afforded by the Norris-Laguardia Act. At the same time, they are opposed, as they properly should be, to having such artificial protection extended to employers. It should not be the law and, indeed, is not the law, as Mr. Lee Pressman, formerly general counsel to the CIO, stated in an anlysis of the Taft-Hartley Act which he prepared just before it was submitted to the President:

> If supervisors go around making threats and doing all the other things which employers are forbidden to do under the law, the employer can deny any responsibility for the actions of his foremen, superintendents, etc., simply by denying that these people are technically his agents for these purposes. * * *

At the same time, it also should not be the law, and it is inconceivable that any fair-minded person should wish it to be the law, that, paraphrasing Mr. Pressman:

If union officials go around making threats and doing all the other things which unions are forbidden to do under the law, the union can deny any responsibility for the actions of its officials, shop stewards, organizers, etc., simply by denying that these people are technically its agents for these purposes.

If, as President Truman has recommended, labor is to "take its place before the bar of public opinion on an equality with management," then both labor and management must be accountable for the actions of the individuals through whom they act, whenever those individuals are acting within the scope of their authority, real or apparent. Section 2 (13) of the Labor-Management Relations Act should be retained without change.

(b) Unfair labor practices by unions: The original Wagner Act was labor's "bill of rights" and management's "bill of duties". The Labor-Management Relations Act preserves labor's "bill of rights", but it adds a "bill of duties" for labor correlative to that for employers.

The shipbuilding industry urges that Congress should no more lightly eliminate or weaken labor's "bill of duties" than it would labor's "bill of rights." In particular, we urge that no change be made in the following provisions:

(i) Restraint or coercion: The debates in Congress show the types of activities by unions to which the ban on restraint and coercion of employees was intended to apply—the use of goon squads, threats to charge larger initiation fees if employees did not promptly join the union, physical violence on employees, threats to their families, mass picketing (93 Congressional Record 4016–4017, 4021).

Mass picketing as a form of coercion by unions was condemned by the National Labor Relations Board in the recent case of International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union—that was Mr. Harry Bridges' union out on the west coast—and Sunset Line & Twine Co. (79 N. L. R. B. No. 207) decided on October 22, 1948. There the company's plant, employing about 100 persons, mostly women, was located in the small community of Petaluma, Calif., with a population of about 9,500. The union called a strike. Girls who attempted to go to work were villified; pickets followed them to their homes and threatened them. Finally, between 200 and 300 pickets massed before the entrance to the plants and physically barred access to all who approached. The chief of police testified that while "nobody got hurt," the police had "quite a time all right;" and that he "wouldn't want to go through it again." The sheriff made a number of arrests and had to threaten the use of a gas bomb to disperse the massed pickets. Such activity said the Board, in a statement marked by typical judicial understatement, "patently involved restraint and coercion of employees."

And, incidentally, that was a unanimous decision by the National Labor Relations Board. There were two dissents which related only to the question as to the extent of the liability, of them finding that the liability for the acts I have just related extended to the international as well as the local. Two of the members dissented, including the chairman, but as to the acts themselves constituting a violation of the law, being mass picketing adding up to restraint or coercion, which is prescribed by the law, there was a unanimous decision.

Even the most vociferous opponents of the act did not attempt to condone such activities, although some contended that they were usually unauthorized by the union (93 Congressional Record 4016). Some opponents of the provision against union restraint and coercion insisted that local police action was all that was necessary to deal with such activities. Incidents such as the recent raid by imported thugs on the plant of the Shakespeare Co. at Kalamazoo, Mich., and the incidents described in detail in the report of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments on its investigation into the Nation-wide meat-packing strike in the spring of 1948 (U. R., Rept. No. 2464, Dec. 20, 1948, p. 3) give eloquent evidence that local police forces are frequently unable to cope with mass picketing, accompanied by lawlessness, violence and destruction, and that such conduct is not a thing of the past. The latter report gives concrete food for thought for those who realize that no economy can survive without a decent respect for law and order.

Congress should not impliedly condone such lawless activities by repealing or weakening in any way the present provision prohibiting the use of threats or coercion on employees by unions.

(ii) Refusal to bargain: The provision imposing upon unions the same duty to bargain collectively that the original Wagner Act imposed upon employers has not met any meritorious criticism and, therefore, it should be retained in the law, in our opinion.

(iii) Jurisdictional strikes and boycotts: The President in his state of the Union message condemned jurisdictional strikes in the following words:

> * * * In such strikes the public and the employer are innocent bystanders who are injured by a collision between rival unions. This type of dispute hurts production, industry, and the public—and labor itself. I consider jurisdictional strikes indefensible.

There cannot be any reasonable difference of opinion over the President's statement that jurisdictional disputes are "indefensible." Even representatives of labor have admitted that jurisdictional strikes are unjustified. For example, Mr. Gerhard P. Van Arkel, formerly general counsel to the National Labor Relations Board and now a prominent attorney for labor unions, has flatly stated that "union representatives will not defend jurisdictional strikes" (article on the Taft-Hartley Act in the April, 1948, issue of Social Action). The President, in his veto message, far from finding any objections to the provisions of the act relating to jurisdictional strikes, objected to them because they did not go far enough.

Congress, therefore, should not eliminate the provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act relating to jurisdictional strikes. In order to meet the President's criticism concerning the lack of means for settling jurisdictional disputes over assignments of work before they ripen into a strike, it is recommended that section 10 (k) be modified so as to provide that any union involved in such dispute, or the employer of the employees concerned, may petition the Board to appoint an arbitrator to determine the dispute, whose decision shall be final and binding on all parties concerned, subject to reasonable review by the Board.

(iv) Secondary boycott and strikes: The provisions against secondary strikes and boycotts were enacted in response to the President's request, in his 1947 state of the Union message, that Congress outlaw "secondary boycotts in pursuance of unjustifiable objectives."

Secondary strikes and boycotts to compel an employer to recognize or bargain with a union which has not been certified as a representative of his employees is certainly "in pursuance of unjustifiable objectives." If a union which is not the freely designated representative of the majority of the employees may resort to secondary pressure to force an employer to recognize it, then the basic right of such employees to be represented only by representatives freely chosen by a majority may be defeated.

Secondary strikes called by one union against an employer either because his employees are not unionized or because his employees belong to a different union are likewise directed toward "unjustifiable objective." The fundamental fallacy of all the arguments in favor of secondary strikes of that type is that they fail to recognize that such secondary strikes are inconsistent with the fundamental right of employees, written into the law by the original Wagner Act, to make a free choice as to whether or not they will join a union and to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, free from interference, restraint, or coercion by their employers.

The method by which a union should seek to unionize employees is not the method of indirect coercion but the direct and democratic method of persuasion and selling itself by the advantages which it offers.

There is, course, a superficial appeal to the argument that union men should not be required to handle material made under sweatshop conditions. But the answer to that is that the law has set up machinery, for the declared purpose of preventing strikes and industrial strife, by which unions may directly and effectively organize the employees who are subject to sweatshop conditions.

What has been said concerning the impropriety of secondary strikes and boycotts directed against nonunion employers and nonunion labor applies with even greater force with reference to such activities directed by one union against employers whose employees are unionized by a different union. Secondary strikes and boycotts under such circumstances are nothing more than instruments of interunion warfare, of which innocent employers, employees, and the public are all victims.

As for secondary strikes and boycotts of the sympathetic variety, they have the vice, which is also common to the other type that I have discussed, that they not only operate to spread and intensify industrial strife far from the original area of dispute but they also bring hardship to innocent disinterested employers, their employees, their customers, and the public.

Carried to its logical extreme, the secondary strike leads to the general strike and the economic paralysis of the whole Nation. The ban on secondary strikes is, therefore, a necessary measure for localizing disputes between the immediate employer and his employees.

Archibald Cox, professor of labor law at Harvard University, in an article on the Labor-Management Relations Act, has this to say (61 Harvard Law Review, 1, 26–27 November 1947) :

> * * * Banning the use of secondary strikes and boycotts as weapons of organization is primarily a prohibition against economic pressures; the interference with the freedom of persuasion is relatively slight, since all avenues of communication except the picket line are left open. Furthermore, the measure is necessary to localize industrial disputes, this minimizing the resulting loss to the community, and forms an important part of any labor policy based on collective bargaining between employers and representatives chosen by their employees.

(c) Injunctions: The injunction provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act are a necessary implementation of the unfair labor practices provisions. It was the experience under the original Wagner Act that, by reason of the lengthy hearings and litigation leading up to the enforcement of its orders, the Board was not able in some instances to correct unfair labor practices until after substantial injury had been done. It is only fair, therefore, that the Board should have available, when it needs it, the normal remedy of courts of equity of a temporary restraining order pending final adjudication by the Board. That is particularly true in the case of secondary strikes, which are directed against third parties, not directly concerned in the dispute, whose business may be substantially injured or even ruined, if prompt action cannot be taken to prevent the continuance of such strikes. In the case of "indefensible" jurisdictional strikes, in which, as the President stated, "the public and the employer are innocent bystanders who are injured by a collision between rival unions," it is extremely difficult to see how any legitimate objection can be raised against the requirement that the Board obtain a mandatory injunction to restrain them.

The cry of "government by injunction" may not fairly be leveled at the injunction provisions of the act. That phrase was a shorthand condemnation, two decades past, of the abuse of the injunction by the Federal courts, at the behest of employers, in dealing with labor controversies, unrestrained by Federal legislation. Those criticisms do not apply here. Under the act, an injunction cannot be obtained by either employer or union, but only by the National Labor Relations Board, the impartial guardian of the public interest. Furthermore, the policy of the Nation on labor matters is declared in the act, and the authority of the courts is defined by is provisions. There is no longer any reason to fear that the courts will exercise their injunctive powers according to their own considerations of public policy and their own social and economic philosophies.

(d) Suability of unions for contract violations: In his 1947 state of the Union message, President Truman expressed the opinion that "collective-bargaining agreements, like other contracts, should be faithfully adhered to by both parties." The remedy of a suit for damages for unjustified breach of contract is one of the most potent means of securing adherence to contracts. There is no reason why a collective-bargaining agreement should have a different status in that respect than any other type of commercial contract.

Perhaps the finest statement in favor of section 301 is that contained in an address which that great friend of labor, Justice Brandeis, delivered before the Economic Club of Boston on December 4, 1902, and which was referred to in the course of the congressional debates (93 Congressional Record 4282); and I quote an excerpt from Justice Brandeis' address:

> The unions should take the position squarely that they are amenable to law, prepared to take the consequences if they transgress, and thus show that they are in full sympathy with the spirit of our people, whose political system rests upon the proposition that this is a government of law, and not of men.

I quote further from Justice Brandeis' address:

> I can conceive of no expenditure of money by a union which could bring so large a return as the payment of compensation for some wrong actually committed by it. Any such payment would go far in curbing the officers and members of the union from future transgressions of the law, and it would, above all, establish the position of the union as a responsible agent in the community, ready to abide by the law. This would be of immense advantage to the union in all of its operations.

(4) The closed shop: The prohibition of the closed shop certainly was not intended to destroy unions, as its critics have alleged, nor does it have that effect. The Railway Labor Act forbids any kind of compulsory unionism, yet the railroad brotherhoods certainly have not suffered because of that ban. On the contrary they are among the largest, most powerful, and richest unions in the country.

Congress outlawed the closed shop in order to guarantee to the individual worker the right to work.

As recently as the beginning of this year, the Supreme Court of the United States unanimously upheld the constitutionality of certain State statutes prohibiting the closed shop, on the ground that the constitutional right of workers to organize does not give them a further constitutional right to drive from remunerative employment all other persons who will not or cannot participate in union assemblies.

Justice Brandeis always maintained it was in the interest of employers and the community that "unions should be powerful and responsible." But, nevertheless, he maintained that the idea of the closed shop was "so antagonistic to the American spirit" that it was indefensible. He predicted, furthermore—and I quote Justice Brandeis again—that:

* * * the American people should not, and will not accept unionism if it involves the closed shop. They will not consent to the exchange of the tyranny of the employer for the tyranny of the employees.

Congress should retain the present prohibition against the closed shop.

(5) Non-Communist affidavits: If the retention of the anti-Communist affidavit provision depends on its success in accomplishing its desired end, then it is clear that it should be retained. Not only has the President's prediction completely failed to materialize, but that provision has had remarkable success in stimulating responsible labor leaders and the rank and file of union members to sweep Communist officials out of office and control. In many instances, union memberships took decisive action to compel reluctant officers to comply with the filing requirements. In other instances, refusal by incumbent officers to sign the affidavits was made an issue in union elections, which resulted in those officers being repudiated at the polls.

Apparently, no one has had the temerity to suggest that Communists should be unrestricted in their rights to engage in trade-union activities. Certainly in shipbuilding and ship repairing, upon which the national welfare has from time to time depended, Communist control or interference is unthinkable. The American public has in recent years been made acutely conscious that, as stated in the interim report of the House Committee on Education and Labor on its investigation of Communist infiltration into labor unions (report 16, Dec. 17, 1948, p. 5):

The Communist Party regards trade unions as a means rather than an end. In the hands of the Communist Party, a trade-union in a strategic industry is an effective means to accomplish the ultimate objective: control of the state.

David Dubinsky, head of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union and a vice president of the American Federation of Labor, in the January 1949 issue of Foreign Affairs, writes:

Precisely because the Communists place the capture and control of the trade unions as the first prerequisite for foisting their dictatorship on any industrial country, it is imperative for the democratic trade unions of all countries to pool their resources and join forces in the protection and promotion of their welfare and liberties * * *

The lesson must be reiterated: The attempt to work with Communists is futile folly. * * *

Collaboration by trade unions and liberals with Communists serves only to provide them with a means of deception and with prestige which they subsequently exploit for party purposes.

The intent of the Communists is plain from their own statements: Lenin:

> It is necessary to be able to agree to any and every sacrifice, and even, if need be, to resort to all sorts of devices, maneuvers, and illegal methods, to evasion and subterfuge, in order to penetrate into the trade unions, to remain in them, and to carry on Communist work in them at all costs.

Earl Browder (1944):

> Communists are active in the PAC, in AFL nonpartisan committees * * *

Program of the Communist International published by the Communist party of the United States:

> Mass action [under Communist leadership] includes a combination of strikes and demonstrations; a combination of strikes and armed demonstrations; and, finally, the general strike cojointly with armed insurrection against the state power of the bourgeosie.

It would be indefensible, therefore, if the anti-Communist affidavit provision of the act should be eliminated or in any way weakened.

(6) National emergency provisions: The Labor-Management Relations Act contains provisions enabling the President to deal with strikes or lock-outs constituting national emergencies. Some machinery to deal with paralyzing Nation-wide strikes was requested by the President, and its need is universally conceded.

Experience has shown, however, that the machinery set up by the act is deficient in a number of respects. The "last offer" ballot has proved ineffectual; the delay caused by the appointment and report of a board of inquiry has been objectionable, since a strike may in the meantime be called or continue, and the President may not seek an injunction until after the report is rendered; the report of the board of inquiry is not as effective as it could be because it may not contain recommendations.

Admittedly suitable legislation to deal with Nation-wide strikes is difficult to devise. On one thing, however, both labor and management are agreed: They are not ready to accept compulsory arbitration as the solution. In the current climate of opinion, therefore, the procedure provided for in the Labor-Management Relations Act, with modifications to meet the defects pointed out above, should be acceptable and is recommended by the shipbuilding and ship-repair industry.

Conclusion: The shipbuilding and ship-repair industry does not believe that the Labor-Management Relations Act cannot be improved. No law is perfect, especially one dealing with such a dynamic field as labor relations. The act, however, represents an honest effort to restore an equitable balance between management and labor, and by and large its provisions, and especially those which have been specifically discussed in this statement, will promote greater responsibility on the part of unions, progressively improved relations between management and labor and a decrease in industrial strife. The shipbuilding and ship-repair industry is sure that if Congress will reexamine those provisions in the spirit of "equality for both and vigilance for the public welfare," which President Truman, albeit almost 2 years ago, declared should be "the watchwords of future legislation," Congress will not find those provisions wanting.

And may I further, beyond the statement I have read, state that the Shipbuilding Council, which I am here as spokesman of, is deeply grateful to this committee for its kind indulgence to sit here at this late hour on a Saturday evening to give us an opportunity to be here and present our position. It certainly is clear and convincing evidence of the determination of this committee to learn the facts and to arrive at the recommendations for legislation in their wisdom they deem feasible, and we are grateful to you for your kind consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Keefe, were you present this afternoon when I was questioning Mr. Moody of the southern coal operators?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes, I was, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Then you must know my deep feelings on the use of mandatory injunctions in labor disputes?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. You made a statement in your presentation that neither the employer or the employee had the right to apply for an injunction, and that was at the discretion of the Labor Board. Am I quoting you correctly?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask you, then, why some months ago in my home State and home city of Charleston, at a strike in the Dupont plant, the company applied for and secured an injunction from the circuit court of Kanawha County and an injunction was issued, prohibiting mass picketing?

Mr. KEEFE. I think the answer to that, Mr. Chairman, and I am speculating——

Mr. BAILEY. That does not coincide with your statement.

Mr. KEEFE. No, it does not. I think the answer may be—and I am speculating, not knowing more of the facts than I do—perhaps the injunction was obtained in the State court under the State law under State procedure, but I dare say it was not obtained in a Federal court under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley act.

Mr. BAILEY. I am aware it was a State court. You should have been more explicit in saying the injunction could not be secured except through the Labor Board.

Mr. KEEFE. Perhaps I may have, but I was discussing the national legislation. I am aware that many of the States of the Union will permit injunctions to be obtained, and other States will not.

Mr. BAILEY. One other question: I think you will agree with me that in the case of the coal strike the first injunction procedure in Judge Goldsborough's court came before the effective date of the Taft-Hartley Act; is that right?

Mr. KEEFE. I am not entirely certain. My memory is that the chairman is right in his statement, but I am not certain.

Mr. BAILEY. And the second procedure, or the second injunction proceedings, came after the act was in effect?

Mr. KEEFE. That is possibly so.

Mr. BAILEY. Who secured the injunction before Judge Goldsborough?

Mr. KEEFE. My memory serves me that it was the Attorney General.

Mr. BAILEY. Acting on behalf of Government?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true in the first case, but who got the injunction in the second case?

Mr. KEEFE. I think it was the Government and, I think, in the second case it may have been at the instigation of the National Labor Relations Board. I am not certain of that, but I am fairly certain that in both instances it was obtained by the Government.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all the questions I have at this time.

I will call on Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. KEEFE. I might say, if I may, Mr. Chairman, along those lines, in answer to your question——

Mr. BAILEY. Before I have concluded, I will put at the disposal of a minority member the 4 or 5 minutes of my time remaining. He has no right to question unless it is delegated to him, so after the members of the majority have finished questioning, I will allow him to question.

We will hear from Mr. Jacobs at this time.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you have any members in your industry in Portland, Oreg.?

Mr. KEEFE. I did not hear you.

Mr. JACOBS. Are there any of the shipbuilding companies you represent located in Portland, Oreg.?

Mr. KEEFE. I am not entirely certain whether they are members of the council, but there are representatives of the industry in Portland, Oreg.

Mr. JACOBS. Are you familiar in any respect with the case of local 72, the Boilermakers?

Mr. KEEFE. Just in a vague sort of way, but not to the extent that I could discuss it intelligently.

Mr. JACOBS. You know there was quite a bit of difficulty out there in local 72?

Mr. KEEFE. I understand there was at one time.

Mr. JACOBS. I believe you are an attorney, are you not?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you know in a general way what that difficulty was?

Mr. KEEFE. No, I do not. I do not recall. Perhaps you might refresh my memory, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. JACOBS. I believe the headquarters of the union is at Kansas City; is that right?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. According to the court records I examined, it seems about three and a half million dollars went down to Kansas City, and Judge Donaldson appointed a receiver out there, and they finally got the money back. Does that refresh your memory?

Mr. KEEFE. No, I am sorry. Do you recall the year it was?

Mr. JACOBS. It has been during the last 4 or 5 years, or probably the last 2 or 3 years.

What I was leading up to was, you were speaking of union responsibility and I was wondering if you find anything under the Taft-Hartley law that gives a local union any remedy under those circumstances?

Mr. KEEFE. I would like to know more of the circumstances. You mean the funds had been impounded?

Mr. JACOBS. What I am getting at is this: The Taft-Hartley law requires a financial statement to be filed with the Government and made available to all members; that is about as far as it goes, is it not?

Mr. KEEFE. I believe so.

Mr. JACOBS. Except that if a statement is not filed it curtails the right of the union to use the Labor Board?

Mr. KEEFE. That is true.

Mr. JACOBS. And the same thing is true in reference to the non-Communist affidavit; the actual effect it has is to immunize the employer from an unfair labor practice in case there is some union officer around who does not file the affidavit?

Mr. KEEFE: That works out that way.

Mr. JACOBS. It would work out that way, would it not? As a lawyer, do you know that even a convicted traitor could bring an action in court for tort and collect damages, could he not?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. A convicted murderer, or anyone else?

Mr. KEEFE. That is true.

Mr. JACOBS. I am against Communists, but I believe we should handle the problem in a more direct manner.

I do not want to spend too much time on that.

There is something I want to ask you about in reference to the national emergency strike. I have thought about that a lot. We have the situation where the emergency may be delayed and there are probably those occasions when it would be delayed even if there were not a law, though I agree with you it should be spelled out specifically. I think Theodore Roosevelt, in 1902, said they were going to mine coal in Pennsylvania when the operators refused to arbitrate, and if they had not he was going to send the troops in, but I am thinking about an orderly law to govern this thing.

You made one statement that it was very difficult to devise.

Mr. KEEFE. Most difficult.

Mr. JACOBS. I have gone up a blind alley every time I have tried to devise one in my mind, and I am looking for someone to give me a remedy where we will not go up a blind alley. Suppose we delay a strike 80 days, and follow the Taft-Hartley procedure, or the procedure outlined in your testimony; eventually, the time is going to expire, and the period of delay is going to end. What if the dispute is not settled? What would you do then? I know I am handing you a tough question.

Mr. KEEFE. That is the problem; that is exactly the problem that was met on the west coast in the shipping strike. They reached the end of the rope and they had not arrived at a solution, and it proved effective in that case.

Mr. JACOBS. I am in dead earnest about this. I have talked about it a lot, and I would like to follow it through a little further.

The next step under Taft-Hartley is a report to Congress and I suppose the mail man would be bringing our mail in in wheelbarrows under such circumstances, and I read in that a direct threat that Congress, under the pressure of public opinion, would settle that strike by compulsory direction, whether you call it compulsory arbitration, or how, but that we would step in and say, "This strike is settled, and the wages are so much." We will have to fix the wages and the terms and conditions if we tell the people they must work together when they have not agreed, and we have to impose the agreement upon them; that is what it amounts to.

Mr. KEEFE. That may be the solution.

Mr. JACOBS. That would be the solution, but let us see where we go to from there. Let us suppose it is the coal industry and we say the miners have to go back to work, and we are going to give them $2 an hour, and the next thing we know the miners are in here saying, "We cannot buy shoes for our children at that price because prices have gone up. We go down to buy a Ford automobile, and we used to pay $800 for it, and now they charge us $2,000, for it." And they say, "Now, Mr. Congressman, we want you to fix the price on those things. We cannot work for that figure."

We have bottled up one end of the log and the possum is in there, and if we are going to keep him from getting out, we will have to bottle up the other end.

Mr. KEEFE. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Can you tell me what we are going to do with that situation? As the learned Omar Khayyam said:

I always came out the same door I went in.

I have always come out the same door, and maybe you can find another exit.

Mr. KEEFE. Frankly, Mr. Congressman, I do not know the answer. I have, to some extent, like yourself, probed and explored and discussed this thing at some length trying to find an answer. I do not know what the answer is, and apparently there were other horns of the dilemma when your predecessors were engaged in this legislation during the Eightieth Congress.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us go a little further and see what happened. We have fixed the wage, and now the workers come back and say, "Fix the price," and we have done that. Do you not think that some measure of ownership is going to be lost on the part of proprietors, and the resistance against nationalization of the industry is going to be broken down considerably?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes, that is true, but I am inclined to believe, Congressman, that somewhere along the line that some effective means must be available, the transcendent right of the public can step in and halt the paralyzing, or the threat to a paralyzing national work stoppage. It seems to me that some measure should be available to call a halt, particularly where there has been this period of 80 days in a consciously sincere effort to reconcile differences.

Mr. JACOBS. As a matter of fact, as far as I can recollect from reading history, it always had, even before the 80 days, had it not? Now, here is where I am separated from you in my thinking. You represent the employer. You want to draw the line up here 80 days some place, and you recognize with me that there is a terrific amount of danger in doing it?

Mr. KEEFE. I do.

Mr. JACOBS. But you started down a road that we do not want to go down when we do that. You agree with me on that?

Mr. KEEFE. I agree with you thoroughly.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you remember a fellow named Fritz Thyssen?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. He thought that that line was going to be drawn somewhere, too.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. You had better think about that a lot, I believe.

Mr. KEEFE. Well, we have been. And we feel this way, Mr. Congressman, that these are days when the Nation is probing and exploring and trying to find an answer to some of these questions. We admit quickly, as we have in this prepared statement, that certainly the present act is deserving of changes here and there. For example, you mentioned one when an earlier speaker was in the witness chair concerning these union-shop elections. I do not know whether it is treated in the brief, but I certainly did not refer to it in this summary. We feel, as the Congressman stated, that the present provisions for the union-shop election are superfluous and might well be eliminated.

Mr. JACOBS. Did you hear what I said the union wanted us to do?

Mr. KEEFE. I could not subscribe to that thinking.

Mr. JACOBS. I say, did you hear it?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes, I did.

Mr. JACOBS. I could not, either. I wrote and told them that I could not, but it is a good indication of how one thing leads to another, is it not?

Mr. KEEFE. That is true.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. I just want to ask one question, and then I will yield to Mr. Gwinn.

You made quite an outline of your position on the Taft-Hartley Act. I think you cited about six sections that you laid particular emphasis on as being very important to labor-management relations.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. WIER. So I will not take up the entire 16 sections that have been referred to by others as being important. But the shipbuilding and its allied fields are quite representative of labor relations. I know that, because I have been on the west coast, the Gulf coast, the east coast, and the Great Lakes.

Of these 16 proposals that are under fire pro and con in this Congress as against the Wagner Act and the present Taft-Hartley Act, all these 16 that have been referred to in the Wagner Act, which one of the 16 do you think is the most important and the most vital? Just pick out one with some deliberation that you think is the most vital necessity to be maintained in the law as establishing good relationships. You might pick out two or three. That is all right. But I mean, what is the pertinent one? I have been listening to employers now for 4 days, and in some cases they are bitterly against the closed shop and another fellow is bitter against the secondary boycott, and another one is bitter on jurisdictional disputes. And that is the way it goes.

I want to hear your reaction if the Congress were to accept the administration's bill here that is before us. Which do you think would be the most vital loss to the industrial relations, removing all the points that the President wants?

Mr. KEEFE. If I might answer your question, Mr. Congressman, that is exactly what we have tried to do here in our presentation by the shipbuilding and ship repair industry. Of all the various features of the Taft-Hartley Act which are presently under discussion, and I think the Congressman summed them up as 16 points—I think I heard a speaker earlier today refer to them as 16 points—we have in the shipbuilding industry in this presentation attempted to point out to the gentlemen of this committee that in our opinion there are six points which are of outstanding importance. We do not mean, and we hope that the inference will not be left with the committee, that we believe that all other matters may well be repealed. We do not mean that. But we feel that we could conscientiously come before this committee and present a sincere position on those points which we thought, to our industry, were of controlling importance, and those are the six points I have mentioned:

No. 1. Exclusion of supervisory personnel from the coverage of the act.

No. 2. Freedom of speech.

No. 3. Union responsibility.

No. 4. The closed shop.

No. 5. Non-Communist affidavits.

No. 6. National emergency provisions.

Mr. WIER. Thank you.

That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Gwinn, have you any questions?

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate your asking me, and thank you, Mr. Wier.

This does bring me back to old times a bit, sitting here. May I ask the gentleman if you have seen any recent efforts to redefine what the right to strike is? Have you seen any good treatment of that subject lately, by a justice or a scholar on the subject?

Mr. KEEFE. I think the best that I have seen is a collection that is available at the Harvard Law Library on the works and addresses and writings of Mr. Justice Brandeis. They are not recent, but in my opinion, they are so solid and they are so loaded with 100 percent Americanism, and they are so loaded with that which we are also proud of as part of our heritage, that I think it could be well for all of us to refer again to them, because I believe when we are treating with a subject such as this, we could well refer to the authority of Mr. Justice Brandeis.

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Chairman, you might be interested to know that we felt when we drew that provision, which was rather late in the deliberations of the committee, we had not explored that whole subject thoroughly enough, and we had very little testimony on the point as to wheher or not the right to strike went so far as to permit absolute monopolistic, compulsory positions on the part of labor, just as a total monopoly might develop in industry, which we refused to tolerate under the antitrust laws. The question was raised, and not very well answered, whether or not labor in the labor law should not have provisions governing labor in the same way the industrial monopolies were treated in the antitrust law.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you yield at that point, Mr. Gwinn? I do not care whether this goes in the record or not, if you want to make in informal. I am interested in that angle. I think there was a bill introduced here in the last Congress along those lines. But it was a type of bill which would have absolutely destroyed the right to strike in any industry with the exception of big industries, like automobiles, steel, aluminum, and so forth. And that was Mr. Hartley's bill introduced forbidding a monopolistic strike and defining a monopolistic strike as the striking of more than one proprietor in an industry. Now, let us take the 6,000 coal operators, for exemple. I mean, if you strike one coal operator, all the rest of them would be immune as long as that mine was out.

Of course, I am with that as I was with the anti-Communist affidavit. I would rather go at it directly and be forthright. It would just destroy the right to strike entirely.

Mr. GWINN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Whether fair men could devise a rule and fix a level for industry and labor both, or a percentage for industry and labor both, I do not know. It is a pretty dangerous rule. If it gets into the hands of somebody who wants to manipulate it a little, they can pay off awfully big favors one way or the other.

Mr. GWINN. It would depend entirely on the exercise or the threatened exercise of absolute power, so that there would be no competition, no possibility of employing competing labor in the job, and also there would be the question of whether or not monopoly force was threatened or about to be exercised.

Mr. JACOBS. It is a little difficult, of course, for us to think of labor in the same category that we think of goods and commodities. That has been the reason why we have never applied the monopoly laws to labor as such. It goes against the grain of American people to consider labor in the same category.

Mr. GWINN. I think you would be interested, in that connection, Mr. Jacobs, in this. We came to the conclusion that the Antitrust Act could not be applied to labor for the reason that you have intimated, that it would have to be framed within the Labor Management Act itself, and it would be a provision that would be applicable to labor and not to industry.

Mr. JACOBS. I have stated a lot about this emergency business, and in reflecting on history, I came to this conclusion, and I stated to labor in my campaign that I felt that it had to be dealt with legally. So my campaign was made on the thesis that it should be. I have studied it, reflected upon history, and I am not sure but what maybe if we want to maintain a completely free economy, maybe we had better prepare ourselves to take a little lacing once in a while. I do not know. I am not convinced that maybe we had better not just take our medicine once in awhile and not take the chance of going down that road we were talking about.

Mr. KEEFE. I think that you gentlemen of the Congress have a terrific burden. I think the whole Nation is looking to you to find a solution to a strike that threatens the national welfare.

Mr. BAILEY. Could I join in the conversation at this point?

You gave us some rather definite advice that we should keep the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. KEEFE. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. You did not help us much in reaching a middle ground.

Mr. KEEFE. The most that we have tried to do here today, Mr. Chairman, is to present what is our conscientious opinion, reduced to a position, and we feel that it was our duty and our responsibility to come here and represent that position to you.

Mr. BAILEY. The committee, I am sure, appreciates very sincerely your coming back this evening for the night session to enable us to get back on our schedule. It was rather an imposition that you have had to wait as long as you have. You understand that on Wednesday last, it was necessary to forego these hearings, and it put us a day behind. And by having two night sessions, we are now caught up.

We appreciate it very much. Thank you.

Mr. KEEFE. Thank you.

Mr. BAILEY. The committee will stand adjourned until 10 o'clock Monday morning.

(Whereupon, at 9:20 p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until 10 a. m., Monday, March 14, 1949.)

APPENDIX

The Position of the Shipbuilders Council of America With Respect to the Proposed Revision of the Taft-Hartley Act

This statement is made by the Shipbuilders Council of America, an association whose members operate 43 yards employing approximately 70 percent of the employees in the industry. It would be superfluous to emphasize the fundamental importance of the shipbuilding and ship repair industry to national defense, as well as the part it plays in the normal peacetime economy of our country.

It is the purpose of this statement to present the views of the members of the Shipbuilders Council in support of retaining in the law provisions of the Labor Management Relations Act which members of the Council consider vital to the building up and continuance of sound and healthy labor relations and which have, in a measure, restored the balance of responsibility between management and labor.

For a number of years prior to passage of the Labor Management Relations Act, it became increasingly apparent that the Wagner Act was not accomplishing its express purpose of reducing industrial strife, because unions and their leaders were abusing the privileges and powers which the Act conferred on them and their conduct in many instances was encouraged by the one-sided administration of the Act by the National Labor Relations Board. The tidal wave of strikes following the end of the war, which in some instances threatened the economic paralysis of the whole country, finally brought from an aroused public a demand for corrective legislation.

President Truman shared the public sentiment in favor of such legislation. Three times during 1946 and 1947 he requested Congress to amend the Wagner Act. In May 1946, when the Nation was threatened by an industry-wide strike on the railroads, President Truman appeared before Congress and requested corrective legislation (92 Cong. Rec. 5753), in response to which Congress enacted the Case bill. President Truman vetoed that bill on June 11, 1946 (92 Cong. Rec. 6674–78). He again acknowledged, however, the need for such legislation and recommended to Congress that it make another attempt to draft a bill that would be acceptable to him. The President stated as his criteria:

> There should be no emphasis placed upon considerations of whether a bill is "antilabor" or "prolabor." Where excesses have developed on the part of labor leaders or management, such excesses should be corrected—not in order to injure either party—but to bring about as great an equality as possible between the bargaining positions of labor and management. Neither should be permitted to become too powerful as against the public interest as a whole.
> Equality for both and vigilance for the public welfare—these should be the watchwords of future legislation.
> * * * * * * * * * A comprehensive study of this problem should be based on a realization that labor is now rapidly "coming of age" and that it should take its place before the bar of public opinion on an equality with management.

In the State of the Union Message which the President delivered on January 6, 1947, he told Congress that it was "essential to improve the methods for reaching agreements between labor and management and to reduce the number of strikes and lock-outs." The urgency of the problem was emphasized by his appeal for specific legislative recommendations not later than March 15, 1947. The Labor Management Relations Act, which was passed by Congress on June 6, 1947, was Congress's answer to the President's request. It was passed after extensive hearings before Congressional committees, compromises between the Senate and House views, and full debate in Congress; and it was repassed over the President's veto by an overwhelming majority that strikingly cut across party lines.

President Truman's statements have been dwelt on at such length, because the shipbuilding and ship repair industry believes that the provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act which it is now urging Congress to retain are fully within the spirit of the President's recommendations. It is believed that those provisions, as the President stated, "bring about as great an equality as possible between the bargaining position of labor and management." It is believed that those provisions are necessary in order to prevent either labor or management from becoming, in the words of the President, "too powerful as against the public interest as a whole." It is believed that those provisions are, again to quote the President, "based on a realization that labor is now rapidly 'coming of age' and that it should take its place before the bar of public opinion on equality with management." It is believed that the principal provisions of the Labor Management Relations Act conform to the ideal of the President of "aquality for both and vigilance for the public wefare." The shipbuilding and ship repair industry urges, therefore, that the Congress retain the provisions which are hereafter discussed and which this statement demonstrates come within that ideal.

1. EXCLUSION OF SUPERVISORY PERSONNEL FROM THE COVERAGE OF THE ACT

The Labor-Management Relations Act excludes supervisory personnel from the coverage of the Wagner Act (Sec. 2 (3), 2 (11)).

In appraising this provision, "a page of history," as Justice Holmes once said, "is worth a volume of logic." A brief historical background is therefore in order.

The original Wagner Act did not contain any provisions relating to supervisory personnel, but it seems to have been generally assumed that foremen and other supervisory personnel represent "the boss" and therefore were not covered. It was not until seven years after Congress passed the Wagner Act that anyone even asked the National Labor Relations Board to establish a separate unit composed of supervisors. The Board then certified a union of supervisors which claimed to be independent but was in fact affiliated with the union that represented the rank and file (Matter of Union Collieries Coal Company, 41 N. L. R. B. 961 (1942). There was promptly introduced in Congress a bill to exclude foremen from the Wagner Act, but while it was pending in Committee, the Board, on May 10, 1943, reversed itself and held that it would not certify a unit of supervisory personnel (Matter of Maryland Drydock Company, 49 N. L. R. B. 733). Congress then dropped the bill. Thereafter, the Board confirmed its decision in the Maryland Drydock case in a number of subsequent cases; but two years later it again changed its mind and certified a union of foremen (Matter of Packard Motor Car Company, 61 N. L. R. B. 1212 (1945).

It was in that state of affairs that Congress in the Labor Management Relations Act excluded supervisory employees from the coverage of the Act.

Congress did not have to go beyond the opinion of the Board in the Maryland Dry Dock case for powerful reasons for taking that action. As the Board there stated (pp. 740–741):

> The very nature of a foreman's duties makes him an instrumentality of management in dealing with labor * * *. To hold that the National Labor Relations Act contemplated the representation of supervisory employees by the same organizations which might represent the subordinates would be to view the statute as repudiating the historic prohibition of the common law against fiduciaries serving conflicting interests.

But the Labor Committees of both the Senate and House did not rest on the authority of the Board in drafting the provision under discussion. They called witnesses from both management and labor, whose testimony eloquently bore out that the unionization of supervisors leads to divided loyalties on the part of men whom management regards as its representatives and whom management must employ as its agents, not only to assign employees to their work, but to see that they keep at their work and do it well, to correct them when they are at fault, to settle their complaints and grievances and to discipline them. The evidence before the Committees showed incontrovertibly that supervisors' unions necessarily had to be under constant obligation to the rank and file unions; that supervisors cannot successfully strike without the agreement of the rank and file not to do the work of striking supervisors; that the Foremen's Association of America had adopted a policy of forbidding its members to enter plants, even for the purpose of maintenance, where the rank and file unions were on strike and had not given their consent. One official of a rank and file union testified before the House Committee:

"Well, we are trying to get them (the supervisors) to join the union * * * and then we'll be their bosses." (House Report No. 245, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., April 11, 1947, p. 16.)

In the shipbuilding and ship-repair industry particularly, it is of extreme importance that supervisory personnel be absolutely loyal to management and free from the pressures of union groups which they supervise. It is not a mere coincidence that the National Labor Relations Board reestablished the principle of excluding supervisory personnel from the coverage of the Wagner Act in a case where the employer was a ship-repair company, The Maryland Drydock Company. Shipyards cover large areas, operations are greatly decentralized, and many separate operations are performed by small groups of workers working in isolated places. The employers are forced, by physical circumstances, to place great reliance for the supervision and direction of such employees upon their immediate supervisors. In a shipyard, unlike an ordinary factory, a department head cannot enter a room and at a glance see whether operations are proceeding efficiently. As a result, in shipyards greater reliance, perforce, is placed on the lower echelons of supervisory personnel than is necessary in a mass-production manufacturing plant.

The shipbuilding and ship-repair industry therefore urges, on the grounds of the need of management for faithful agents and the inevitability that unions of supervisory personnel will fall under the domination of rank and file unions, that this Congress not make any change in the law that will bring supervisory personnel under the coverage of the Wagner Act.

2. FREEDOM OF SPEECH

The Labor Management Relations Act provides that the expression of any view, argument or opinion, shall not constitute, or be evidence of, an an unfair labor practice, if such expression does not contain any threat of force or promise of benefit (Sec. 8 (c)).

It is so obviously desirable that employees have an opportunity to hear both sides of a labor controversy before making a decision that it is unthinkable that this provision should in any way be weakened or repealed. Even opponents of the Labor Managements Relations Act conceded its desirability. For example, the Minority of the Senate Labor Committee stated: "We agree with the excellent protection of the rights of free speech accorded by section 8 (c)." (Senate Report No. 105, Part 11, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., April 22, 1947, p. 41.)

This provision, therefore, should not be repealed. If anything, it should be strengthened by blocking a loophole revealed by a recent decision of the National Labor Relations Board. Matter of General Shoe Corp., 77 N. L. R. B. No. 18 (April 19, 1948). In that case, the Board, with two members dissenting, held that the free speech provision was restricted to unfair labor practice cases and it set aside an election on the ground that statements made by an employer during a preelection campaign, which were admitedly privileged under the constitutional guarantee of free speech, were expressed in such a manner that they "created an atmosphere calculated to prevent a free and untrammeled choice by the employees."

There is no reason why any distinction should be made between representation cases and unfair labor practice cases, and it is recommended that the Act be amended so as to insure the constitutional right of free speech in preelection compaigns.

3. UNION RESPONSIBILITY

Every fair-minded person subscribes to the principle that unions should be responsible for their actions—responsible in their dealings with management, in their treatment of their members, and in their relations with the public. But that principle is nothing but an ineffectual generality unless it is implemented and applied in specific situations.

The shipbuilding and ship repair industry, therefore, urges that there be retained in the law those provisions of the Labor Management Relations Act which are designed to foster union responsibility. Most important among those provisions are the following:

(a) Responsibility for Acts of Agents

Section 2 (13) of the Labor Management Relations Act provides:

> In determining whether any person is acting as an "agent" of another person so as to make such other person responsible for his acts, the question > of whether the specific acts performed were actually authorized or subsequently ratified shall not be controlling.

The effect of that provision is to make applicable to labor disputes the common law rules of agency, instead of the rule that otherwise might be applicable, viz, Section 6 of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, which provides that neither a corporation nor a union participating or interested in a labor dispute shall be held responsible for the unlawful acts of individual officers, members, or agents—> * * * except upon clear proof of actual participation in, or actual authorization of, such acts, or of ratification of such acts after actual knowledge thereof.

Section 6 of the Norris-LaGuardia Act has been interpreted by the Supreme Court in such a way that it has become practically impossible to prove an agency relationship, even though under the normal common-law rules of evidence, and in common sense, there could be no doubt that an agency relationship existed. As Justice Frankfurter stated in a dissent in which he was joined by Chief Justice Vinson and Justice Burton the interpretation given to Section 6 by the majority of the Court "serves to immunize unions, especially the more alert and powerful, as well as corporations involved in labor disputes, from Sherman Law liability." United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. United States, 330 U. S. 395, 422 (1947). That difficulty of proof, of course, extends to other acts besides Sherman Law violations.

Naturally, unions are opposed to any attempt to deprive them of the artificial protection afforded by the Norris-LaGuardia Act. At the same time, they are opposed, as they properly should be, to having such artificial protection extended to employers. It should not be the law and, indeed, is not the law, as Mr. Lee Pressman, formerly General Counsel to the CIO, stated in an analysis of the Taft-Hartley Act which he prepared just before it was submitted to the President:[1]

> If supervisors go around making threats and doing all the other things which employers are forbidden to do under the law, the employer can deny any responsibility for the actions of his foremen, superintendents, etc., simply by denying that these people are technically his "agents" for these purposes. * * *

At the same time, it also should not be the law, and it is inconceivable that any fair-minded person should wish it to be the law, that, paraphrasing Mr. Pressman:

> If union officials go around making threats and doing all the other things which unions are forbidden to do under the law, the union can deny any responsibility for the actions of its officials, shop stewards, organizers, etc., simply by denying that these people are technically its agents for these purposes.

If, as President Truman has recommended, labor is to "take its place before the bar of public opinion on an equality with management," then both labor and management must be accountable for the actions of the individuals through whom they act, whenever those individuals are acting within the scope of their authority, real or apparent. Section 2 (13) of the Labor-Management Relations Act should be retained without change.

(b) Unfair Labor Practices by Unions

The original Wagner Act imposed duties upon employers by making certain acts unfair labor practices; and it is unnecessary to labor the point that the Labor-Management Relations Act preserves essentially unchanged those provisions of the original Wagner Act. The latter Act, however, for the first time, has imposed correlative duties upon unions, and certain other practices by unions which were found to have "unduly infringed upon the rights of individual employees, employers, and the public" (Senate Report No. 105, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 7) have been made unfair labor practices (Sec. 8 (b)).

This attempt to equalize the responsibilities of labor and management has been one of the objects of the indiscriminate and emotional condemnations of the Act as a "slave-labor law." It is, of course, impossible to answer critics who indulge only in name calling. More restrained opponents of the Act, however, have been impelled to concede that it is only right and proper that certain practices by unions should have been made unfair labor practices.

[1] It might be mentioned by way of footnote that Pressman's analysis was included in the Congressional Record by Congressman Vito Marcantonio as an extension of his remarks (93 Cong. Rec. A2629).

The shipbuilding and ship repair industry urges Congress to retain all the provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act relating to unfair labor practices by unions. In particular, the industry urges that no change be made in the following provisions:

(i) Restraint or Coercion.—It is an unfair labor practice for a union to restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights (Sec. 8 (b) (1)).

The debates in Congress show the types of activities by unions to which the ban on restraint and coercion of employees was intended to apply—the use of "goon quads," threats to charge larger initiation fees if employees did not promptly join the union, physical violence on employees, threats to their families, mass picketing (93 Cong. Rec. 4016–7, 4021).

Mass picketing as a form of coercion by unions was condemned by the National Labor Relations Board in the recent case of International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union and Sunset Line & Twine Company, 79 N. L. R. B. No. 207, decided on October 22, 1948. There the Company's plant, employing about 100 persons, mostly women, was located in the small community of Petaluma, California, with a population of about 9,500. The union called a strike. Girls who attempted to go to work were vilified; pickets followed them to their homes and threatened them. Finally, between 200 and 300 pickets massed before the entrance to the plants and physically barred access to all who approached. The chief of police testified that while "nobody got hurt," the police had "quite a time all right"; and that he "wouldn't want to go through it again." The sheriff made a number of arrests and had to threaten the use of a gas bomb to disperse the massed pickets. "Such activity," said the Board, in a statement marked by typical judicial understatement, "patently involved restraint and coercion of employees."

Even the most vociferous opponents of the Act did not attempt to condone such activities, although some contended that they were usually unauthorized by the union (93 Cong. Rec. 4016). Some opponents of the provision against union restraint and coercion insisted that local police action was all that was necessary to deal with such activities. Incidents such as the recent raid by imported thugs on the plant of the Shakespeare Company at Kalamazoo, Michigan, and the incidents described in detail in the report of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments on its investigation into the nation-wide meat-packing strike in the spring of 1948 (H. R. Report No. 2464, December 20, 1948, p. 3) give eloquent evidence that local police forces are frequently unable to cope with mass picketing, accompanied by lawlessness, violence and destruction, and that such conduct is not a thing of the past. The latter report gives concrete food for thought for those who realize that no economy can survive without a decent respect for law and order.

Congress should not impliedly condone such lawless activities by repealing or weakening in any way the present provision prohibiting the use of threats or coercion on employees by unions.

(ii) Refusal to Bargain.—The Labor-Management Relations Act not only makes it an unfair labor practice for either an employer or a union to refuse to bargain collectively (Sec. 8 (b) (3)), but it also defines collective bargaining (Sec. 8 (d)). The definition of collective bargaining represents essentially a codification of the concept of good faith in collective bargaining as laid down in the cases by both the National Labor Relations Board and the courts. In addition, however, the Act provides that the duty to bargain shall also carry with it the obligation of each party to a collective bargaining agreement not to terminate or modify the agreement except on 60 days prior written notice. This added obligation is endorsed by the shipbuilding and ship-repair industry.

The provision imposing upon unions the same duty to bargain collectively that the original Wagner Act imposed upon employers has not met any meritorius criticism and therefore should be retained in the law.

(iii) Jurisdictional Strikes and Boycotts.—Subdivision (C) of Section 8 (b) (4) outlaws both primary and secondary jurisdictional strikes and boycotts by minority unions to compel employers to deal with them despite a legal duty to bargain with a certified majority union; and Subdivision (D) of the same Section outlaws jurisdictional strikes and boycotts which involve the question of which labor union or craft is entitled to perform a particular task.

Those provisions were enacted in accordance with recommendations made by the President in his 1947 State of the Union message, in which he condemned jurisdictional strikes in the following words:

> * * * In such strikes the public and the employer are innocent bystanders who are injured by a collision between rival unions. This type of dispute hurts production, industry, and the public—and labor itself. I consider jurisdictional strikes indefensible.

There cannot be any reasonable difference of opinion over the President's statement that jurisdictional disputes are "indefensible." The provisions of the Labor Management Relations Act dealing with the subject met with little or no objection on the part of the members of the Congressional Committees who drafted the Act. Even representatives of labor have admitted that jurisdictional strikes are unjustified. For example, Mr. Gerhard P. Van Arkel, formerly General Counsel to the National Labor Relations Board and now a prominent attorney for labor unions, has flatly stated that "union representatives will not defend jurisdictional strikes." (Article on "The Taft-Hartley Act" in the April 1948 issue of "Social Action.") The President, in his veto message, far from finding any objection to the provisions of the Act relating to jurisdictional strikes, objected to them because they did not go far enough, stating:

> The bill would force unions to strike or to boycott if they wish to have a jurisdictional dispute settled by the National Labor Relations Board. This peculiar situation results from the fact that the Board is given authority to determine jurisdictional disputes over assignment of work only after such disputes have been converted into strikes or boycotts.
> The bill would require the Board to "determine" jurisdictional disputes over work tasks, instead of using arbitration, the accepted and traditional method of settling such disputes.

Congress, therefore, should not eliminate the provisions of the Labor Management Relations Act relating to jurisdictional strikes. In order to meet the President's criticism concerning the lack of means for settling jurisdictional disputes over assignments of work before they ripen into a strike, it is recommended that Section 10 (k) be modified so as to provide that any union involved in such dispute, or the employer of the employees concerned, may petition the Board to appoint an arbitrator to determine the dispute, whose decision shall be final and binding on all parties concerned, subject to reasonable review by the Board.

(iv) Secondary Strikes and Boycotts.—Subdivisions (A) and (B) of Section 8 (b) (4) of the Labor Management Relations Act make it an unfair labor practice for a union or its agents to engage in or induce or encourage certain types of secondary strikes and boycotts. Those provisions were enacted in response to the President's request, in his 1947 State of the Union Message, that Congress outlaw "secondary boycotts in pursuance of unjustifiable objectives." In his veto message, however, the President criticized the prohibition on secondary strikes and boycotts on the ground that:

> It would deprive workers of the power to meet the competition of goods produced under sweatshop conditions by permitting employers to halt every type of secondary boycott, not merely those for unjustifiable purposes.

That criticism certainly cannot justifiably be leveled against Subdivision (B) of Section 8 (b) (4), which makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to engage in or to induce the employees of any employer to engage in, a secondary strike or boycott which has the object of forcing any other employer (that is, other than the employer of the striking employees) to recognize or bargain with a union, unless that union has been certified as a representative of his employees. Obviously, if that union is the freely designated representative of a majority of the employees of the other employer, there is no need for secondary pressure, for the union can require recognition and bargaining by the employer through the peaceful and orderly procedures prescribed by the Act. On the other hand, if the union is not the freely designated representative of a majority of the employees, then secondary pressure on the employer of such employees to force him to recognize the union may result in defeating the basic right of such employees to be represented only by representatives freely chosen by a majority. Indeed, it is not an unreasonable inference that a union which resorts to secondary pressures in preference to the election procedure of the Act does so for the very reason that it does not represent the majority of the employees whom it claims to represent.

It is submitted, furthermore, that the secondary strikes and boycotts prohibited by Subdivision (A) of Section 8 (b) (4) are likewise directed toward "unjustifiable purposes". That Subdivision covers two broad types of secondary strikes and boycotts—(1) those called by one union against an employer either because his employees are not unionized or because his employees belong to a different union and (2) what is often called the sympathetic strike or boycott, that is, a strike or boycott by a union directed against a disinterested employer designed to bring pressure to bear on the employer with whom the union has its real dispute.

The fundamental fallacy of all the arguments in favor of secondary strikes or boycotts of the first type is that they fail to recognize that such secondary strikes or boycotts are inconsistent with the fundamental right of employees, written into the law by the original Wagner Act, to make a free choice as to whether or not they will join a union and to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, free from interference, restraint, or coercion by their employers. In the face of that right, such secondary strikes and boycotts have no justification. For such a secondary strike is not directed to persuading non-union employees to join the union because of the benefits they can obtain by becoming members; it is directed rather against the employer of those employees. A typical secondary strike of that sort—to compel Employer A not to purchase the product of Employer B—says in effect to Employer A: "Do not do business with Employer B because his employees do not belong to our union. If you and other customers do not deal with Employer B (and we will do our utmost to force you and them not to deal with him), he either will be driven out of business or he will be forced to hire union labor."

But the employer is powerless legally to do otherwise than leave the choice of joining the union entirely to his employees. Under the Wagner Act, and under that Act as amended, the employer cannot take sides. He is forbidden to interfere with, restrain or coerce his employees in the exercise of their rights; he is forbidden to discriminate in regard to hire or tenure of employment in order "to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization." True, under the original Wagner Act he could have agreed to a closed shop, and under the amended Act, he may agree to a union shop, but it is first necessary for the union to be designated by a majority of his employees as their collective-bargaining agent.

Thus, the conventional secondary strike and boycott of the first type, which labor devised to further its interests long before the Wagner Act came into existence, and which had some justification in the era before labor's bill of rights was passed, is now so obviously violative of the rights of employees and contrary to the duties of employers that it should no longer be countenanced. The method by which a union should seek to unionize employees is not the method of indirect coercion but the direct and democratic method of persuasion and selling itself by the advantages which it offers.

There is, of course, a superficial appeal to the argument that union men should not be required to handle material made under "sweatshop conditions." But the answer to that is that the law has set up machinery (for the declared purpose of preventing strikes and industrial strife) by which unions may directly and effectively organize the employees who are subject to the sweatshop conditions. Indeed, it is strange that unions nowadays should argue for the indirect and cumbersome method of secondary boycott to combat sweatshop conditions. It would seem that employees working under sweatshop conditions should be eager to join a union that is able to better their working conditions; and if they are so satisfied with their lot that they freely choose not to join a union, one may well doubt that they are working under "sweatshop conditions."

What has been said concerning the impropriety of secondary strikes and boycotts directed against nonunion employers and nonunion labor applies with even greater force with reference to such activities directed by one union against employers whose employees are unionized by a different union. Secondary strikes and boycotts under such circumstances are nothing more than instruments of interunion warfare, of which innocent employers, employees and the public are all the victims. A specific example, which is found well documented in the case of Allen Bradley Co. v. Local Union No. 3, 325 U. S. 797 (1945), is the tactics employed by Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, which has jurisdiction in the New York area, in forbidding electrical contractors to purchase electrical equipment manufactured outside the area, whether manufactured by nonunion labor or by other unions (usually the United Electrical Workers), and in requiring the dismantling and rewiring of such equipment by I. B. E. W. members before the contractor may use it. Congress had before it other examples of secondary boycotts used as instruments of interunion rivalry (93 Cong. Rec. 4198).

As for the secondary strikes and boycotts of the second type—that is, the sympathetic variety—they have the vice (which is also common to the first type) that they not only operate to spread and intensify industrial strife far from the original area of dispute but they also bring hardship to innocent disinterested employers, their employees, their customers, and the public. Illustrative is the case of Printing Specialties and Paper Converters Union v. Regional Director of the N. L. R. B., decided on December 13, 1948, in which the Federal Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit upheld the constitutionality of the provision here under discussion. In that case, the union called a strike over wage demands against a manufacturer of paper containers. To make the primary strike more effective, the union then proceeded to picket a trucking concern and a railroad terminal company, both common carriers, with the result that employees of the motor carrier refused to move trucks carrying the containers and employees of the terminal company refused to load them into freight cars. Operations of both the trucking and terminal company were disrupted, some of their employees were deprived of an opportunity to work, and innocent customers had movements of their goods delayed.

In the Printing Specialties case, the Court of Appeals stated the purpose of the provision here under discussion as follows:

> * * * In an effort to narrow the area of industrial strife, and thus to safeguard the national interest in the free flow of commerce, it [Congress] has in effect banned picketing when utilized to conscript in a given struggle the employees of an employer who is not himself a party to the dispute.

The Court then upheld its constitutionality, stating:

> It remains to inquire briefly whether the Act, as so construed, infringes the constitutional right of free speech. We think the decision in Carpenters Union v. Ritter's Cafe (315 U. S. 722), answers the question in the negative. In substance the Court held that the state has the right to determine whether the common interest is best served by imposing restrictions upon the use of weapons for inflicting economic injury in the struggle of conflicting industrial forces. "It is true," said the Court (p. 727), "that by peaceful picketing workingmen communicate their grievances. * * * But recognition of peaceful picketing as an exercise of free speech does not imply that the states must be without power to confine the sphere of communication to that directly related to the dispute. Restriction of picketing to the area of the industry within which a labor dispute arises leaves open to the disputants other traditional modes of communication." And the Court added that the adoption of a contrary view would compel the state "to allow the disputants in a particular industrial episode to conscript neutrals having no relation to either the dispute or the industry in which it arose."

Carried to its logical extreme, the secondary strike leads to the general strike and the economic paralysis of the whole nation. The ban on secondary strikes is, therefore a necessary measure for localizing disputes between the immediate employer and his employees.

Archibald Cox, Professor of Labor Law at Harvard University, in an article on the Labor Management Relations Act, has this to say (61 Harvard Law Review 1, 26–27, November, 1947):

> * * * Banning the use of secondary strikes and boycotts as weapons of organization is primarily a prohibition against economic pressures; the interference with freedom of persuasion is relatively slight since all avenues of communication except the picket line are left open. Furthermore, the measure is necessary to localize industrial disputes, thus minimizing the resulting loss to the community, and forms an important part of any labor policy based on collective bargaining between employers and representatives chosen by their employees.

(e) Injunctions

To implement the unfair labor practice provisions, the Labor-Management Relations Act empowers the National Labor Relations Board, at its discretion, to petition the Federal District Courts for "appropriate temporary relief or restraining order" upon the issuance of a complaint of an unfair labor practice by either a union or an employer (Sec. 10 (j)). Furthermore, it is mandatory upon the Regional Attorney to petition for an injunction in the case of a charge of an unfair labor practice against a union for engaging in a secondary or jurisdictional strike or boycott (Sec. 10 (k)).

Three main objections have been made against those provisions. First, the objection has been made that they are unnecessary; secondly, it has been objected that the cases would be settled by the courts before the National Labor Relations Board had a chance to decide the issues; and the third argument has been that they revive "government by injunction."

As to the necessity for the injunction provisions, particularly the provision for a discretionary injunction, it was the experience under the original Wagner Act that, by reason of the lengthy hearings and litigation leading up to the enforcement of its orders, the Board was not able in some instances to correct unfair labor practices until after substantial injury had been done. It is only fair, therefore, that the Board should have available, when it needs it, the normal remedy of courts of equity of a temporary restraining order pending final adjudication by the Board. That is particularly true in the case of secondary strikes, which are directed against third parties, not directly concerned in the dispute, whose business may be substantially injured or even ruined, if prompt action cannot be taken to prevent the continuance of such strikes. In the case of "indefensible" jurisdictional strikes, in which, as the President stated, "the public and the employer are innocent bystanders who are injured by a collision between rival unions", it is extremely difficult to see how any legitimate objection can be raised against the requirement that the Board obtain a mandatory injunction to restrain them.

As for the argument that the injunction procedure would result in having cases settled by the courts before the Board has a chance to decide the issues, it has been held that it is not the province of the court upon a petition for a temporary injunction to decide whether or not the alleged unfair labor practice is being committed. Douds v. Local 294, 75 F. Supp. 414 (D. C., N. D. N. Y., 1947). It may reasonably be expected that the federal district courts will continue to heed the admonition of the Supreme Court in Hecht Co. v. Bowles, 321 U. S. 321, 330 (1944), that:

> * * * court and agency are not to be regarded as wholly independent and unrelated instrumentalities of justice, each acting in the performance of its prescribed statutory duty without regard to the appropriate function of the other in securing the plainly indicated objects of the statute. Court and agency are the means adopted to attain the prescribed end, and so far as their duties are defined by the words of the statute, those words should be construed so as to attain that end through coordinated action. * * *

Finally, the cry of "government by injunction" may not fairly be levelled at the injunction provisions of the Act. That phrase was a short-hand condemnation, two decades past, of the abuse of the injunction by the Federal courts, at the behest of employers, in dealing with labor controversies, unrestrained by federal legislation. Those criticisms do not apply here. Under the Act, an injunction cannot be obtained by either employer or union, but only by the National Labor Relations Board, the impartial guardian of the public interest. Furthermore, the policy of the nation on labor matters is declared in the Act, and the authority of the courts is defined by its provisions. There is no longer any reason to fear that the courts will exercise their injunctive powers according to their own considerations of public policy and their own social and economic philosophies.

(d) Suability of Unions for Contract Violations

The Labor Management Relations Act opens the Federal Courts to suits by or against unions, but any money judgment against the union is enforceable only against the union as an entity and against its assets and not against any individual member or his assets (Sec. 301).

In his 1947 State of the Union Message, President Truman expressed the opinion that "collective-bargaining agreements, like other contracts, should be faithfully adhered to by both parties." The remedy of a suit for damages for unjustified breach of contract is one of the most potent means of securing adherence to contracts. There is no reason why a collective-bargaining agreement should have a different status in that respect than any other type of commercial contract.

Perhaps the finest statement in favor of Section 301 is that contained in an address which that great friend of labor, Justice Brandeis, delivered before the Economic Club of Boston on December 4, 1902, and which was referred to in the course of the Congressional debates (93 Cong. Rec. 4282):

> The unions should take the position squarely that they are amenable to law, prepared to take the consequences if they transgress, and thus show that they are in full sympathy with the spirit of our people, whose political system rests upon the proposition that this is a government of law, and not of men.

* * * * * * *

I can conceive of no expenditure of money by a union which could bring so large a return as the payment of compensation for some wrong actually committed by it. Any such payment would go far in curbing the officers and members of the union from future transgressions of the law, and it would, above all, establish the position of the union as a responsible agent in the community, ready to abide by the law. This would be of immense advantage to the union in all of its operations.

4. THE CLOSED SHOP

The Labor Management Relations Act makes it an unfair labor practice for employers to enter into, or for a union to insist upon, a closed shop agreement (Sec. 8 (a) (3), 8 (b) (2)).

The prohibition of the closed shop certainly was not intended to destroy unions, as its critics have alleged, nor does it have that effect. Congress had before it the precedent of the Railway Labor Act which forbids any kind of compulsory unionism. Yet the railroad brotherhoods certainly have not suffered because of that ban. On the contrary they are among the largest, most powerful, and richest unions in the country.

Congress outlawed the closed shop in order to guarantee to the individual worker the right to work. It had evidence before it that under closed-shop contracts in certain industries, a man had to join the union before applying for a job; and, if for any reason the union would not take him in, he had to seek work in other fields. No matter how qualified he might have been, no employer could hire him. Furthermore, under the monopoly of the closed shop, many unions rigidly held down the number of apprentices in order to create or maintain a scarcity of skilled workmen. The effect was to deprive young men of the opportunity to learn a trade.

As recently as the beginning of this year, the Supreme Court of the United States unanimously upheld the constitutionality of certain state statutes prohibiting the closed shop. In Lincoln Union v. Northwestern Iron and Metal Co., 69 Sup. Ct. 260 (1949), Justice Black, speaking for the Court, said:

> There cannot be wrung from a constitutional right of workers to assemble to discuss improvement of their own working standards, a further constitutional right to drive from remunerative employment all other persons who will not or cannot participate in union assemblies.

In a concurring opinion, Justice Frankfurter cited statements made by Justice Brandeis before he went on the bench that it is in the interest of employers and the community that "unions should be powerful and responsible," but that—

> The objections, legal, economic, and social, against the closed shop are so strong, and the ideas of the closed shop so antagonistic to the American spirit, that the insistence upon it has been a serious obstacle to union progress." (Letter of September 6, 1910, to Lawrence F. Abbott of the Outlook.)

* * * * * * *

> But the American people should not, and will not accept unionism if it involves the closed shop. They will not consent to the exchange of the tyranny of the employer for the tyranny of the employees. (Letter of February 26, 1912, to Lincoln Steffens.)

If the prohibition of the closed shop should be eliminated, then the only reasonable alternative in the public interest is to prohibit the "closed union." But the latter alternative would require regulation of the internal affairs of unions in order to ensure (a) the protection of union members against arbitrary action by union leaders and (b) the protection of applicants for admission to unions against arbitrary and restrictive rules of admission. The sounder alternative is for Congress to retain the present prohibition on the closed shop.

5. NON-COMMUNIST AFFIDAVITS

The provision of the Labor-Management Relations Act requiring the filing of non-Communist affidavits by union officers was designed to eliminate and to prevent the infiltration of Communists into unions. In his veto message, the President stated: "With this objective I am in full accord"; but he predicted that the provision would not accomplish that result.

If the retention of the anti-Communist affidavit provision depends on its success in accomplishing its desired end, then it is clear that it should be retained. Not only has the President's prediction completely failed to materialize, but that provision has had remarkable success in stimulating responsible labor leaders and the rank and file of union members to sweep Communist officials out of office and control. In many instances, union memberships took decisive action to compel reluctant officers to comply with the filing requirements. In other instances, refusal by incumbent officers to sign the affidavits was made an issue in union elections, which resulted in those officers being repudiated at the polls.

Apparently, no one has had the temerity to suggest that Communists should be unrestricted in their rights to engage in trade-union activities. Certainly in shipbuilding and ship repairing, upon which the national welfare has from time to time depended, Communist control or interference is unthinkable. The American public has in recent years been made acutely conscious that (as stated in the interim report of the House Committee on Education and Labor on its investigation of Communist infiltration into labor unions, Report 16, Dec. 17, 1948, p. 5):

> The Communist Party regards trade-unions as a means rather than an end. In the hands of the Communist Party, a trade-union in a strategic industry is an effective means to accomplish the ultimate objective: control of the state.

David Dubinsky, head of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union and a vice president of the American Federation of Labor, in the January 1949, issue of "Foreign Affairs", writes:

> Precisely because the Communists place the capture and control of the trade-unions as the first prerequisite for foisting their dictatorship on any industrial country, it is imperative for the democratic trade-unions of all countries to pool their resources and join forces in the protection and promotion of their welfare and liberties. * * *
> The lesson must be reiterated: The attempt to work with Communists is futile folly. * * *
> Collaboration by trade-unions and liberals with Communists serves only to provide them with a means of deception and with prestige which they subsequently exploit for party purposes.

The intent of the Communists is plain from their own statements:[2]

> Lenin: "It is necessary to be able to agree to any and every sacrifice, and even—if need be—to resort to all sorts of devices, maneuvers, and illegal methods, to evasion and subterfuge, in order to penetrate into the trade unions, to remain in them, and to carry on Communist work in them at all costs."
> Earl Browder (1944): "Communists are active in the PAC, in AFL nonpartisan committees * * *."
> Program of the Communist International published by the Communist Party of the United States: "Mass action (under Communist leadership) includes a combination of strikes and demonstrations; a combination of strikes and armed demonstrations; and, finally, the general strike cojointly with armed insurrection against the state power of the bourgeoisie."

It would be indefensible, therefore, if the anti-Communist affidavit provision of the Act should be eliminated or in any way weakened. The International Ladies Garment Workers Union has proposed that the affidavit requirement be extended to cover all paid officers of unions (New York Times, Dec. 27, 1948). The suggestion has also been made that the same requirement be extended to employers. Of course, there should be no objection to such an extension.

6. NATIONAL EMERGENCY PROVISIONS

The Labor Management Relations Act contains provisions enabling the President to deal with strikes or lock-outs constituting national emergencies. Some machinery to deal with paralyzing nation-wide strikes was requested by the President, and its need is universally conceded.

Experience has shown, however, that the machinery set up by the Act is deficient in a number of respects. The "last offer" ballot has proved ineffectual; the delay caused by the appointment and report of a board of inquiry has been

[2] The case against the Communists is well documented in 92 Cong. Rec. A–4116–23; in National Maritime Union v. Herzog, 78 F. Supp. 146 (App. D. C., 1948), in which the constitutionality of the anti-Communist affidavit provision was sustained; in Barsky v. United States, 167 F. (2d) 241 (App. D. C., 1948); and in Ames v. Dubinsky, 20 LRRM 2021 (Supp. Ct., N. Y. County); from which sources the above quotations are taken.

objectionable, since a strike may in the meantime be called or continue, and the President may not seek an injunction until after the report is rendered; the report of the board of inquiry is not as effective as it could be because it may not contain recommendations.

Admittedly suitable legislation to deal with nation-wide strikes is difficult to devise. On one thing, however, both labor and management are agreed: They are not ready to accept compulsory arbitration as the solution. In the current climate of opinion, therefore, the procedure provided for in the Labor-Management Relations Act, with modifications to meet the defects pointed out above, should be acceptable and is recommended by the shipbuilding and ship repair industry.

CONCLUSION

The shipbuilding and ship-repair industry does not believe that the Labor-Management Relations Act cannot be improved. No law is perfect, especially one dealing with such a dynamic field as labor relations. The Act, however, represents an honest effort to restore an equitable balance between management and labor, and by and large its provisions, and especially those which have been specifically discussed in this statement, will promote greater responsibility on the part of unions, progressively improved relations between management and labor and a decrease in industrial strife. The shipbuilding and ship repair industry is sure that, if Congress will reexamine those provisions in the spirit of "equality for both and vigilance for the public welfare," which President Truman, albeit almost two years ago, declared should be "the watchwords of future legislation," Congress will not find those provisions wanting.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949

MONDAY, MARCH 14, 1949

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., Hon. Cleveland M. Bailey, presiding.

Mr. BAILEY. The committee will be in order.

The committee at this time will be pleased to hear from Harvey W. Brown, international president, International Association of Machinists.

Please give your name and your affiliation.

Mr. BROWN. Harvey W. Brown, president of the International Association of Machinists, Machinists Building, Washington, D. C.

TESTIMONY OF HARVEY W. BROWN, PRESIDENT, INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am grateful for this opportunity to appear before your committee to express the views of the International Association of Machinists regarding the Taft-Hartley law and the urgency for its prompt repeal. I trust that my remarks will in some measure contribute toward the enactment of legislation which will restore to American workers the rights which prevailed prior to the enactment of this infamous statute.

As president of the International Association of Machinists, it has been my privilege to view first hand the harm which the Taft-Hartley law has brought to members of our organization. This law has made it necessary for our local unions to retain legal counsel for many cases, which ordinarily could be handled expeditiously and effectively by trained union representatives.

In many situations the workers' funds have necessarily been expended in channels of legal defense rather than for purposes of sustaining the growth and efficiency of their local unions. I am convinced that those who designed and sponsored the Taft-Hartley law deliberately intended for its provisions and restrictions to strangle and deplete the treasuries of labor unions, thereby destroying the rights or organization and collective action. I earnestly believe that the light of American freedom and opportunity which we proudly boast of at home and abroad, will become dim unless this labor-restricting law is promptly repealed.

The absence of a clear definition of the term "agent" has placed local unions in a position in which their funds are vulnerable in the event of an unwise act by any member presumably acting in the interest of the union. The Board's General Counsel has indicated that a union's responsibility for its agents goes at least to the level of shop committeeman, regardless of whether or not such person is acting in violation of the established policy of the local or international union.

In regard to the union-shop requirements of the law, it has been necessary to expend incalculable time and effort in getting authorization cards signed, when such time should have been spent in productive effort, in the interest of the local membership. The overwhelming endorsement of the union shop by employees has demonstrated the fact that workers want their unions to continue. Conducting union-shop elections has cost the American taxpayers approximately $1,377,287 up to February 1, 1949.

The thirteenth annual report of the National Labor Relations Board discloses that 98 percent of the union-shop elections conducted by the Board from August 22, 1947, to July 1, 1948, resulted in authorization for such a provision to be incorporated in labor agreements. It is to be noted, however, that the union shop permitted by the Taft-Hartley Act is only a phoney substitute for a true union shop.

The true union shop protects the majority of members against the actions of destructive or irresponsible members, or the infiltration of undesirables who seek employment for purposes of disrupting the union. The "good standing" provision of the Taft-Hartley law protects all applicants for membership as long as they offer to pay their union dues, regardless of their behavior.

It is our opinion that free collective bargaining is essential to a sound and progressive economy. The Taft-Hartley law has served to engender bitterness and distrust between management and labor and has proven itself to be a barrier to wholesome collective relationships. The process of organizing the unorganized has been greatly retarded by this law which provides many new weapons with which employers may openly carry on their fight against employee organizations. These include the free-speech proviso, the threat of damage suits, the filing of charges against unions by the exercise of section 8 (c) of the act and the threat of injunctions.

I could recite many more aspects of the Taft-Hartley law which have proven to be harmful to the interest of American workers and the public generally, but I do not want to impose on the limited time of your committee.

It is my firm conviction, however, that detrimental restraints have been placed upon precious and essential freedoms by the Taft-Hartley law, resulting in serious curtailment of the processes of collective bargaining. I am convinced that permanent injury to our free-enterprise system will accrue unless the Eighty-first Congress removes from the statute books this law which was obviously conceived in a spirit of hatred and reaction.

The Taft-Hartley law was an outstanding issue in the political campaign last fall and it is significant that President Truman, who stood foursquare for the law's repeal, and campaigned against the act in every rural and urban community in which he spoke, was elected, while his opponent, Mr. Dewey, who endorsed the measure in his famous Pittsburgh speech, went down in defeat.

The American voters conclusively demonstrated their disapproval of the Taft-Hartley law, by their action at the polls on November 2, and a citizens' mandate has been rendered calling for repeal—the clearness with which they have spoken is without parallel. The Taft-Hartley law, with its restrictive and punitive measures, must be abandoned and the traditional American concept of free collective bargaining restored. It is with great hope that we look forward to appropriate action by the Eighty-first Congress, which will completely annul the future effects of this antilabor law.

During the 19 months since the Taft-Hartley law became effective, the members of the International Association of Machinists have had the unfortunate experiences of being caught in many of its retrogressive booby traps. I will briefly cite a few of these unfortunate instances in order to bring to your attention the hardships to American workers that have been flowing from this law.

In one particular case the Interational Association of Machinists and the Boeing Airplane Co. have, over a long period, established a relationship that was generally considered an example of good labor-management relations. In a spirit of teamwork, both parties sought and found the basis for settlement of every dispute that arose, without a hint of work stoppage. The traditional responsibilities of both parties continued on a cooperative basis until the cry for a change in the Wagner Act was heard.

From that time on the attitude of management changed and the usual efforts to resolve disagreements by negotiations were met with strong management opposition and a "dare to strike" attitude. Negotiations for a renewed agreement dragged on from October 1946 to April 1948, and the repeated offer by the union to have the differences impartially arbitrated in accordance with the provisions of the contract was met with refusal unless the company was given the right to veto any and all the proposed members of the arbitration panel.

The employees voted to strike, and on or about April 21, 1948, a strike was legally called, halting all work among the company's employees numbering several thousand. It is quite apparent that this strike, which lasted for several months, involving millions of dollars in losses to both stockholders and employees, would not have been provoked except for the Taft-Hartley law and the reactionary planning for punitive legislation which preceded its enactment.

In another case the employees of the Pipe Machinery Co., Cleveland, Ohio, engaged in a strike against the company after negotiations had broken down for a renewed contract. The company at a later date resumed operations with strikebreakers. This group formed a so-called independent union which filed a representation petition with the National Labor Relations Board. The Board accepted the petition and conducted an election resulting in 148 ballots being cast with strikers and strikebreakers participating.

All ballots were challenged and the National Labor Relations Board, pursuant to the Taft-Hartley law, declared the votes cast by the striking employees to be invalid and gave validity to the no-union votes of the strikebreakers. In substance, this means that under the Taft-Hartley law, no matter how just a strike might be, employees are subject to loss of all equity in their jobs as soon as the unfair employer is able to hire strikebreakers. Under the Wagner Act, it has always been the administrative practice of the Board to give full consideration to the votes of striking employees in representation cases.

The Taft-Hartley law denies to strikers replaced by strikebreakers the right to effectively participate in an election affecting the plant at which they are striking. The denial of the workers' rights in this regard is grossly unfair and presents the possibilities of great harm to the cause of free American labor. The striking employees in this situation are continuing this strike, notwithstanding the hardships imposed upon them by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Another situation in which the Taft-Hartley law has seriously injured the rights of free American labor is at the Granite City Steel Plant in Granite City, Ill. The employees of this plant engaged in a strike after all peaceful means to resolve their differences had been exhausted. The company sent its work to another employer in the same area with which the International Association of Machinists also has a current agreement. The employees in the second plant were compelled to work as strikebreakers against their fellow trade-unionists. Refusal to work on struck work would have subjected the union to the danger of being found in violation of section 8 (b) 4 (A) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Many additional cases could be cited to show that the Taft-Hartley law has brought great harm to the interest of the Nation's workers.

The situation created by the Taft-Hartley Act calls for immediate correction by Congress. It is my earnest conviction that complete repeal of the Taft-Hartley law and the reenactment of the Wagner Act is the only solution.

The Lesinski bill, H. R. 2032, which is before your committee for consideration, is designed to repeal the Labor-Management Relations—Taft-Hartley—Act of 1947 and provides for the reenactment of the National Labor Relations—Wagner—Act of 1935 with certain amendments.

From what has been said before, I am sure that the position of our association with regard to the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law is clear, and I wish to emphatically present our endorsement of the Wagner Act as the proper and necessary substitute. Insofar as the amendments proposed by H. R. 2032 are concerned, we heartily agree that some carefully planned changes can be made which will improve and strengthen the Wagner Act.

The particular amendment which calls for the continuance of five members of the National Labor Relations Board is very essential in the interest of expediting its cases. It has been conclusively proved that delays in NLRB decisions have had serious and detrimental effect upon labor-management relations. The continuance of the five-man Board, together with the possibility of easing their work by repeal of the Taft-Hartley law, raises some hope for speedier case treatment in the future. We are heartily in accord also with the amendment which would increase the salary of the Board members to $17,500 a year. Certainly the caliber of men needed to administer the Federal labor-management statute are in demand at far greater compensation than they now receive.

Provisions are made in H. R. 2032 for the reestablishment of the Conciliation Service in the Department of Labor. Prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, the Conciliation Service had functioned with notable success as a division of the Department of Labor. During the 24 years that the Conciliation Service functioned as a division of the Department of Labor, I have no knowledge of any employer expressing lack of confidence in the service until the Taft-Hartley measure was introduced. I am convinced that, because its functions are closely integrated with the Government's over-all labor policy; the Conciliation Service can best serve as a part of the Department of Labor.

That portion of section 106 of the proposed bill which would give the National Labor Relations Board authority to deal with jurisdictional disputes raises a question in my mind. It is my opinion that such disputes between unions can best be resolved by action initiated jointly by the parties to such disputes. I earnestly believe that settlement on any other premise would not resolve the real issues and would only serve, at best, as a temporary award. We are concerned, too, with the past work history criteria set forth in section 106 which would appear to give weight to the position of the union which had been performing the disputed work in the past. We believe that it is necessary in the interest of fairness to determine and depend wholly upon whether or not the performing union is operating contrary to its original jurisdictional grants or interunion agreements. In other words, the fact that one's purse is held by a thief over a period of years does not give the thief any ownership rights.

We believe the secondary-boycott provisions of section 106 are as far as the Government should go in preventing boycotts. Since it is legal for an employer to contract with another employer to finish goods removed from a struck plant, it must be equally legal for the employees in the second plant to act collectively to refuse to work on struck work.

Section 107 of the proposed bill would permit the union shop in establishments engaged in interstate commerce and would prohibit State laws from interfering with the right of the parties to make union-shop agreements. We believe that this is a much-needed amendment which would set the legislative pattern on a national scale on so vital an issue as the union shop. Such matters should not be left to State legislatures, particularly in industries which affect the commerce of our Nation.

We are in accord with title IV of the bill before your committee, particularly section 402. There should be no statutory restrictions against the free participation of labor unions in the election of candidates to public office who receive the endorsement of trade-union members. A labor union is a voluntary association composed of working men and women and formed for the purpose of improving the economic welfare of those its represents.

Unlike corporations, which exist for the purpose of making profits for their stockholders, labor unions exist solely in the interest of improving living and working standards. When union members assemble in union halls and decide to support political candidates whom they find worthy, there is no sound reason to prohibit them from using the funds of their organization in order to assure the election of such favorable candidates. I am convinced that those who fear the political power of labor unions are also fearful of the political power of the people generally.

In closing, I would again like to thank your committee for your thoughtfulness in inviting me to appear here today.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Brown, do you and the members of the groups of machinists that you represent feel that under the Taft-Hartley law we have free collective bargaining?

Mr. BROWN. No.

Mr. BAILEY. Would you mind explaining to the committee in what way free collective bargaining is interferred with by the act?

Mr. BROWN. First of all, under the Taft-Hartley Act, the employer is free to spite the shop by planting a great number of persons who are employed for no other purpose than to reflect discredit upon the organization, create strife and turmoil with the organization; and under that kind of condition it is almost impossible for an organization to have freedom of action to express the real feelings and sentiments of the sincere and conscientious members of the organization because of the interference by those who are planted there, because of that particular provision of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Furthermore, it is our position that where an employer and a union believe that it is for their mutual benefit to have a union shop, so-called, we believe that the Taft-Hartley Act is wrong in denying that right.

Mr. BAILEY. You mean, the right of a closed shop?

Mr. BROWN. The right of a closed shop.

Mr. BAILEY. I notice, Mr. Brown, you mentioned the fact that you favored the provision of the proposed bill of enlarging the membership of the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you have any idea as to how far they are behind with their work?

Mr. BROWN. No. But I do not believe there is as heavy a case load there as there was when they had a board of three there. I believe they made far more progress in handling cases to a conclusion than the old Board with only three. It stands to reason that, when they subdivide the cases among the personnel of the Board, if they have five men working on the Board, they can do a better job than three in handling volume.

Mr. BAILEY. And you approve the proposal to transfer these activities from their present status to the Labor Department?

Mr. BROWN. Yes. That is, the Federal Mediation Board. In fact, we believe that this labor act should be under the Labor Department. It should be administered, and the personnel should be under the direction of the Labor Department.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs, do you have any questions?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes, sir.

Mr. Brown, I was interested particularly in your testimony in regard to the provision in the bill on jurisdictional disputes.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, I suppose it is well known that there had been a jurisdictional dispute between your organization and another organization for a great many years.

Mr. BROWN. That is true.

Mr. JACOBS. And I believe it is true that the A. F. of L.——

Mr. BROWN. Pardon me, Mr. Congressman. I would like to correct that answer. The dispute disappeared when a decision was arrived at. It is only now a matter of one organization refusing to conform to that decision.

Mr. JACOBS. From the history of it, I think that I can accept your answer as absolutely correct.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, I am leading up to another matter. I know a good many members of the other organization, and I think that their feeling is that the decision, which I believe was in 1914, was it not—was not 1914 the first decision?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; in 1914 the American Federation of Labor made a decision which without question should have disposed of that particular issue.

Mr. JACOBS. As a matter of fact, I know a good many members of the other organizations which believe that that decision should have been complied with.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, I want to bring you up to 1947, when a delegate—I am wondering if you are familiar with it—a delegate to the American Federation of Labor, who was from Wichita, Kans.—he was a Kansas delegate at the American Federation of Labor convention—made a motion that that decision be complied with. And, to call a spade a spade, he happened to be a carpenter. He was the business agent of the carpenters' union out there.

Mr. BROWN. I recall that.

Mr. JACOBS. Immediately upon his making that motion, which was really a mandate of the central labor union, he was ordered expelled from the position he held in the carpenters' union, Local 201, Wichita, Kans. Do you remember that? Or do you know about that?

Mr. BROWN. I do not recall that.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you remember his making the motion?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, he was immediately ordered by the general president of the carpenters' union to be relieved of his position as an officer in the local union. And that case was in the courts out in Kansas. It seems that his remedy at common law was rather ineffectual.

Now, that leads me up to the question I wanted to ask you. Do you think that it would be wholesome legislation to provide for democratic elections in unions and for protection for a member who follows out the mandate of his body?

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Congressman, that has been the procedure in the International Association of Machinists ever since its inception.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you agree that it is not the procedure, though, in a few labor organizations?

Mr. BROWN. I understand there are some unions that are not as democratic as the machinists' union in the matter of electing officers.

Mr. JACOBS. Or in the matter of permitting them to voice their opinions on matters where they might be in disagreement with their officers?

Mr. BROWN. There have been some instances where I believe members of some unions did not have the freedom of action as is enjoyed by the members of the machinists' union.

Mr. JACOBS. Then, of course, any legislation of that kind would not affect the machinists' union, because they do operate democratically?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think it would be wholesome legislation to make provisions so that we could assure to those members of those other organizations democratic action within their bodies?

Mr. BROWN. I personally would oppose any kind of legislation that would interfere with the operations of trade-unions for this reason: Wherever there appears to be an absence of democratic action, or freedom of action, I would say that it is very apparent that that kind of practice meets with the approval of the majority, because if the majority wishes to change the policies of their union, regardless of what the structure of that union is, I contend the majority can find some way to make known their position and change the policies of the union if they so desire. There is a danger, a great danger, to the labor movement when the Government attempts by law to legislate, because, after all, it is not so much what kind of law you have; it depends on how it is administered. And I found in my short life that the administration of government sways from side to side, and there have been periods where I would be very happy if I was not subjected to the interpretations placed on law by those in power at the time.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, it is true that any law might be misconstrued, misinterpreted, and thus used for a purpose for which it was not intended. And we must, of course, rely upon our administrative officers and our courts to come back to a true course; is that not correct?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. As you depend on us to come back to the true course in revising labor legislation.

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. I think we got off the beam 2 years ago in this legislation. But I wanted to suggest this to you, Mr. Brown. With respect to your difficulty in the Boeing plant, I know a little about it. I wonder if the members of the organization that were actually strikebreakers would really have wanted to do that if they had had complete democratic action in the union. What do you think about that?

Mr. BROWN. I cannot believe that the majority of those whom you refer to were influenced by personal desires. I believe there was a pressure there somewhere that compelled them to do that which does not reflect credit upon the labor movement.

Mr. JACOBS. Nor the particular leaders.

Mr. BROWN. I beg your pardon?

Mr. JACOBS. Nor the particular leader in that case, or leaders, whoever they were. Do you agree with me on that?

Mr. BROWN. That is true.

Mr. JACOBS. For example, I have in mind a local organization that was denied the right to elect their officers for 16 years. I happened to be their attorney, and procured for them the right to elect their officers. And the next job was to bring about an equalization of wage scale with adjoining districts. They were working for 34 cents an hour less than the adjoining district.

Mr. BROWN. I cannot conceive of a group of workers affiliated with a labor union that would submit to that kind of treatment.

Mr. JACOBS. Let me tell you further that petitions had gone forth to the international president asking the right to elect their officers—and it happened to be the first organization that we were talking about—it was ignored and denied. When they finally brought an action in court to assure their rights, he suspended the old members' pension benefits as a matter of pressure on the local, and eventually he tried to revoke their charter entirely, so as to deprive them of their union status. Now, that is a considerable pressure on those men, is it not? You and I will agree that that is a terrific pressure on those men?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, may I go further and say that in order to implement the revocation of that charter, he put up a $700,000 bond and got a mandatory injunction against the newly elected officers in that local, the ones that had just been elected, and hired the best legal talent in the United States to try to revoke the charter and deprive them of their union status.

Do you not think that some legislation that simply required a democratic election would be a protection to the men who belonged to an organization of that kind?

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman has 2 minutes.

Mr. JACOBS. Thank you.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Congressman, I would say that rather than have the Government enact legislation that would apply to the entire labor movement, I would say that it would be far better for a local union to continue to suffer until the rank and file of that international union woke up. That is one of the unfortunate things in free competitive enterprise.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, just as the last point of information on that, when they held their international convention, there was a large caucus. About half of the delegates met and selected an opposition ticket to run against the incumbent. One man stood up to nominate a candidate to oppose the one favored by the general president. And when the delegation made his nomination of the candidate, the Chair said, "Does the Chair understand that you want to second the nomination of so-and-so?" who happened to be the incumbent. The delegate said, "No;" and the Chair said, "Then I will have to rule you out of order. Sit down."

And the nomination was not accepted.

Now, how can a group of men meet with that sort of power unless they have something in the labor legislation? That is what I would like to know. I am for those men. I want to know how they can cope with it.

Mr. BROWN. Unfortunately, that one group must continue to suffer until the rank and file throughout the Nation speak up and select a delegation to the convention who have the courage of their convictions and will stand up like "he-men" and challenge the right of anyone who would dictate as you have described.

Mr. JACOBS. My time is up.

Mr. BAILEY. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Brown, I would like to address myself to the portion of your testimony, just very briefly, in regard to the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, which requires in a union-shop condition, that the employer must retain on his pay roll anyone who offers to pay dues to the union; is that not correct?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. That is basically the meaning of the act, although that is not the wording, and so on? Is it not true that a situation could arise where an employee of a plant working under union-shop conditions, and who might have allegiance to some outside subversive group, could carry on a series of agitations for work stoppages against the wishes of both the employer and the union, and the union would be powerless to do anything about that?

Mr. BROWN. Under that provision of the law an employer can have an individual candidate in the shop, and that individual may, in time, become elected as treasurer of that local union, and he may later be charged some times with misappropriating the funds of the association, and be found guilty, and be proven to be a thief; or it may be proven that he owes allegience to the high priest of Moscow, or there may be an individual is granted the power for the purpose of creating strife and turmoil, and found guilty, and expelled from the organization, and those individuals could go to the secretary and say, "We want to pay dues," and he could say, "We cannot accept them because you are no longer a member of the organization."

And then they can go back to the employer and say, "We had a controversy with the union," but the employer cannot discharge them on the basis of the information furnished by the shop committee as to the reasons why they were expelled from the organization.

Mr. BURKE. That is my understanding of the provisions of the act, as it now stands.

Mr. BROWN. Absolutely.

Mr. BURKE. Thank you.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. Mr. Brown, with a bit of interest I listened to the comment a minute ago by my colleague, Mr. Jacobs. That is the legal approach to some of our problems in labor. I assume that in that great big international union that you are general president of, from time to time you find a local unit that gets involved in a lot of unnecessary and illegal performances, in compliance with your constitution, where some forces move in and take over control of the union and use it for an experimental operation; you have had such an incident, have you not?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. WIER. And necessarily, in the interest of the membership of that unit, and on behalf of an appeal from many of the members of that unit, the international union, which is the parent body and is guided by the actions of a convention, necessarily has to take steps to clean up a very deplorable situation in that unit; is that not correct?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. I think you have had some experiences in that?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. During the 1930's, when unemployment was very large in many unions, some elements took over control of these unions, and it was rather difficult to remove them by democratic processes, but you faced the situation of either removing them and putting union on a footing in compliance with the international policy, or facing destruction of the union; is that correct?

Mr. BROWN. That is correct.

Mr. WIER. The point that I want to bring out, and contrary to the thinking of my colleague, Mr. Jacobs, is that in his desire or in his thinking of the inclusion of a compulsory election every year, from a practical point of view, would you agree that in the American Federation of Labor it has been necessary sometimes for the international to step in to a local community where they have a very bad picture, and remove the officers compulsorily under charges, and install new officers, particularly in a large union, to run and direct the affairs of that union? You have done that, too, have you not?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. And that is not always possible, is it, to make a change of policy by the international in a local union of three or four thousand and get recontrol of that union within the period of a year?

Mr. BROWN. It is very difficult.

Mr. WIER. I say that because I know of three or four cases, Mr. Jacobs, where it took an international union 5 years, and they put it into receivership for 5 years, because within 2 or 3 years that leadership was so heavily imbedded in the union, and so strongly entrenched that they would have been returned to office, but over the period of 2 or 3 years they were finally able to convince the membership to get a more wholesome union by the elimination of these elements who were experimenting with the welfare of these workers, and making up this unit.

Have you had that experience?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; and usually in cases of that kind, those who lead that kind of a campaign against the policies and the laws of the organization, usually start out by building up a prejudice against the grand lodge and the officers of the grand lodge so that when the grand lodge, pursuant to its duties and responsibilities, has to step in to see that the unit conforms to the laws and rules of the organization, there is a tremendous prejudice against the representatives of the grand lodge and, hence, it takes so long a time to awaken the membership and get them to look on both sides of the fence until they finally cooperate to the end that the policies do conform to the practices of the international union.

Mr. WIER. Thank you.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. I arrived a little late, Mr. Brown, so I missed your discussion of the Taft-Hartley act, and I am trying to catch up with what you said here.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Would you mind explaining more in detail the provisions which interfere with free collective bargaining in the Taft-Hartley act, in your judgment?

Mr. BROWN. Is there any particular phase of collective bargaining you may have in mind?

Mr. MCCONNELL. I was just curious about the various provisions that have been mentioned from time to time which I understand are supposed to interfere with collective bargaining, and I would like to have them summarized, from your own experience.

Mr. BROWN. Were you present when I answered that question?

Mr. MCCONNELL. No, I was not.

Mr. BROWN. As near as I can recall, I advised the committee that one of the reasons I do not believe that the membership of a union has freedom of action in the matter of collective bargaining is because the Taft-Hartley Act has brought about a condition where the local union becomes a haven for the Communists, the so-called industrial spy, or the individual planted there to disrupt the organization and to bring about a condition that reflects discredit upon the organization. It usually winds up with facts developing in the local union with the result that that local union does not operate as is intended, and it is next to impossible for the committee to represent the employees when bargaining collectively, and to express the views of the more conscientious members. It disrupts the entire operating machinery of the local union.

Mr. McConnell. What disrupts it?

Mr. Brown. Because the Taft-Hartley Act permits the employers under the phony union-shop clause to plant men in who are there for a purpose other than to make a helpful contribution to the progress of that union.

Mr. McConnell. You mentioned communism. I thought communism in unions had been lessening since the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. Brown. Yes, but you know a Communist thrives on deception. Our union, for more than 24 years, has had a policy where a Communist could not join, and where one was uncovered as being a Communist he was expelled. I am satisfied there still are a few in our union, but not having the evidence we cannot expel them, even though we know they are there.

Mr. McConnell. Under the Wagner Act you certainly could plant an industrial spy.

Mr. Brown. Under the Wagner Act you can have discipline in your union. When a member deviates from the policies of the union he is expelled. It is no more a question of going to the boss and saying, "I have had a controversy with the union, and they refused to accept the dues."

Mr. McConnell. The first, you say, would be the union shop that interferes with collective bargaining. Now, what else, under the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. Brown. Just at the moment I cannot recall any provision that does interfere with collective bargaining, if you mean by collective bargaining negotiating for improved working conditions.

Mr. McConnell. Arriving at a contract agreement, and so on; yes.

Mr. Brown. Excepting again the planting of these individuals within the union, employers can point their finger to the conduct of members, which may be the basis for a charge of unfair labor practice, and hold the union responsible for an individual's conduct, and that is a stay against collective bargaining.

Mr. McConnell. Are there any other provisions, in your judgment, in the Taft-Hartley Act that interfere with free collective bargaining?

Mr. Brown. I think that would be sufficient; I think that would serve the purpose of the authors of the act.

Mr. McConnell. I take it, from your statement, that you are opposed to the Government being very actively engaged in the field of labor-management relations; is that correct?

Mr. Brown. No; to the contrary, Mr. Congressman. I think the Government can make a definitely wonderful contribution in the field of labor-management relations, to have both parties become more conscious of their respective rights and responsibilities. What I do oppose is the Government enacting laws that interfere with the normal functioning of a union, and the rights of the membership.

Mr. McConnell. And there was normal functioning under the Wagner Act?

Mr. Brown. Yes.

Mr. McConnell. It would seem to me—if I correctly remember the statistics—we had the greatest amount of industrial strife in 1946 before the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act that we had ever known in the history of labor-management relations in the United States; that was my understanding.

Mr. Brown. That is not due to the fact that the workers for the first time had the protection of a law, the purpose of which was to prevent employers interfering with the rights of workers to work; but again I say we must always keep in mind why we had a Wagner Act.

Mr. McConnell. Of course, the passage of the Wagner Act and various other labor laws brought the Government more into labor-management relations, did it not?

Mr. Brown. It was the conditions preceding the National Industrial Recovery Act which caused Congress to recognize something must be done to prevent the interference with workers' rights and, if possible, to try to avoid a reoccurrence of what happened from 1929 until the early 1930's when we had from 15 to 16 million workers unemployed.

Mr. McConnell. Was it not a fact that various labor leaders at that time opposed the Wagner Act? In fact, they tried to amend it, did they not?

Mr. Brown. Just to the contrary, Mr. Congressman. If there were any opposed to it, I never heard of them.

Mr. McConnell. Was not the A. F. of L. quite active in its efforts to change the Wagner Act around 1940 and 1941, and amendments were brought in, and some of the members of the union, some of the top leaders, were opposed to the general idea of the passage of the Wagner Act or, at least, put it this way: They were opposed to the passage of the Wagner Act, and I believe, John L. Lewis was opposed?

Mr. Brown. My comments were with respect to the enactment of the Wagner Act. There may have been some proposed amendments, and I know there was, where the A. F. of L. did oppose some amendments.

Mr. McConnell. It was to the effect they did not want the Government coming into labor-management relations and, I think, they felt that labor and management should have freedom to bargain and work out their problems between themselves, rather than have the Government in the midst of labor-management relations and I think that is the real reason for the opposition.

Mr. Brown. I think you are in error. I do not believe the American Federation of Labor opposed the enactment or continuance of the Wagner Act.

Mr. McConnell. I did not say the American Federation of Labor; I said various leaders of the American Federation of Labor did.

Mr. Brown. Mr. Congressman, I do not know of an official affiliated with any union of the A. F. of L. who opposed the Wagner Act, although after the Wagner Act was established efforts were made to amend the act, and it is true that the American Federation of Labor did oppose certain amendments, but their opposition to certain proposed amendments did not reflect their position as to the fundamental purpose of the Wagner Act because, after all is said and done, the Wagner Act merely prevented employers, who believed they should have a monopoly in organization—it prevented them from interfering with the workers' right to choose their own union for collective-bargaining purposes.

Mr. McConnell. The thought I am groping for here, Mr. Brown, is this: To find out the degree to which the Government should come into the relationship between labor and management. I know we have the problem of protecting the public, and that has to be handled, and the Government is undoubtedly probably the main one in the position to protect the public in certain types of national emergency strikes, but I am wondering just how far we should go. Speaking of changing the Taft-Hartley Act, I am wondering just how far we should go in having the Government in these relationships. I am sure there are various labor leaders who are watchful of the encroachment of the Government into those relationships. I am sure I am correct on that.

Mr. Brown. I believe the Lesinski bill has the answer. I do not believe the Government should go beyond that, what is proposed in that bill, which is similar in principle to a provision in the Wagner Act, and that has worked successfully.

Mr. McConnell. We had an example of extension of Government restriction for a short period of time, when the administration proposed drafting the workers who were out on strike if they did not go back to work.

Mr. Brown. I believe it was about 48 hours; but why look for perfections in an imperfect world?

Mr. McConnell. Of course, that is a good generalization, and an easy way out.

Mr. Bailey. The gentleman has 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. McConnell. Regarding political contributions, I think you are of the opinion that corporations should be restricted, but labor unions not; is that correct?

Mr. Brown. With respect to what?

Mr. McConnell. With respect to political contributions.

Mr. Brown. Yes, I think there should be no parallel.

Mr. McConnell. You would not permit political contributions and expenditures to both of them, or would you exempt both of them; either way?

Mr. Brown. No, Mr. Congressman. In my opinion at the moment, I cannot put my finger on it. I am satisfied, though, that in some corporations they channel some of the funds that finally go into a campaign pot. If you say the individual worker is privileged to make the donation like an individual stockholder, how effective would any other machinery be in this great political arena in making a donation in a political contest?

Mr. McConnell. This provision about political contributions did not seem to deter a great deal of activity on the part of the unions in the past election.

Mr. Brown. When there is a will you will find a way, but why go about it that way? And I think we did a pretty good job.

Mr. McConnell. Maybe we had better leave it in there if it is that effective and helpful to you.

That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. You said in response to Mr. Wier's question that it took 5 years to show local unions there were two sides to the fence?

Mr. BROWN. I do not believe I said 5 years. In replying to Mr. Wier's question, I understood him to say there are times when it takes several years.

Mr. SMITH. It takes several years to show that there are two sides to the fence. Do you grant there are two sides to the matter you are testifying about, this matter?

Mr. BROWN. There are two sides to every question, every controversy.

Mr. SMITH. What union were you and Mr. Jacobs discussing here a while ago, the controversy between two unions?

Mr. BROWN. Referring to the situation at the Boeing aircraft plant?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. The teamsters' union.

Mr. SMITH. The teamsters' union; and what other union, your union?

Mr. BROWN. The teamsters' union interfering with the rights of the machinists' union.

Mr. SMITH. And what decision was it that was made where a dispute had been going on since 1914? Did I get that date correctly?

Mr. BROWN. Yes. He was referring to a decision by the American Federation of Labor which issued a public pronouncement with respect to the jurisdiction of the machinists' union over the making and installing and erecting of machinery, and another union was trespassing the union's jurisdictional rights.

Mr. SMITH. What union was it?

Mr. BROWN. The carpenters.

Mr. SMITH. In other words, I am to understand that since 1914 there has been that dispute between the machinists and the carpenters?

Mr. BROWN. Since 1914, with the exception of a short period intervening when the carpenters quite clearly had disregarded that action by the American Federation of Labor, and, Mr. Congressman, if you will permit this interference, let me make this suggestion: There have been negotiations between all organizations of the American Federation of Labor for some time, and unless it is absolutely necessary to inject the matter when we are discussing this bill before the committee, I would greatly appreciate it if we did not deal with it, because I do not believe it is going to help the committee in this particular case, and we may be able to find an answer to resolve our differences.

Mr. SMITH. It looks to me like you should have found an answer in 5 years. I was just trying to get facts and information for my own benefit.

You think the closed shop would keep out of the union those men that you objected to, those men the employer puts into a union shop in order to cause trouble within the union?

Mr. BROWN. No, I do not say they will keep them out, but I do say when they are uncovered you can expel them, and we are through with them, and the employer is privileged to fire them on the basis of the testimony that was developed at those trials of the men who were planted in the organization to disrupt the organization.

Mr. SMITH. If you had a closed shop would it give you better control over your members? That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. BROWN. You can have more discipline over your membership, and you can do more to have that membership conform to the policies and laws of the organization, and in our organization laws and policies are made by the membership themselves. And, furthermore, the closed shop, as under the Wagner Act, I say it is an American institution, a patriotic institution, and I say nothing more than that can be referrred to as being more patterned after our own Government and its operations than is the so-called closed shop.

Mr. SMITH. I have just a few brief questions, and you can answer them "Yes" or "No."

Do you think the Congress should legislate in the matter of jurisdictional disputes?

Mr. BROWN. I do not think they should.

Mr. SMITH. Do you think the Congress should legislate in the matter of jurisdictional strikes or secondary boycotts?

Mr. BROWN. There may be some types of secondary boycott, yes.

Mr. SMITH. Do you think Congress should do anything about featherbedding?

Mr. BROWN. It all depends on what you mean by featherbedding.

Mr. SMITH. Paying men for work that is not earned, or is not productive for the employer.

Mr. BROWN. No, I do not believe the union has a right to demand pay for services not rendered, but what can you expect in the trade-union movement when you experience that filisbuster in the United States Senate; I say that is featherbedding.

Mr. SMITH. You were filibustering over there in what you have been talking about with the gentleman on the right, about trying to work the will of the majority in the parent organization, the international union?

Mr. BROWN. That is not filibustering.

Mr. SMITH. In this dispute that you were talking about down there in the Boeing aircraft plant, was that not a filibuster by the local union as far as the international union was concerned?

Mr. BROWN. I do not follow you, Mr. Congressman. I want to be helpful.

Mr. SMITH. You referred to the filibustering over in the Senate as supporting a majority?

Mr. BROWN. I say so long as you are going to have such a disgraceful scene in the United States Senate, regardless of the issues, then I say we should not talk about featherbedding in industry.

Mr. NIXON. Will you yield?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. In other words, you would make both impossible by law?

Let me ask it this way: Would you control the filibuster of the Senate? Do you favor controlling the filibustering in the Senate?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. Do you favor controlling featherbedding in unions?

Mr. BROWN. If the international was opposed to claiming pay of members not earned.

Mr. NIXON. Both in the Senate and in unions, then, you believe the law should prohibit filibustering or featherbedding?

Mr. BROWN. We should bring about an elimination of both, but I do not know that it is necessary to resort to law.

Mr. NIXON. In the Senate you think they should resort to law?

Mr. BROWN. I think there should be something to keep a Senator from reading from a catalog or a telephone book.

Mr. NIXON. You agree the Senate should pass a law eliminating the filibuster?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. Because, in effect, we are paying the Senators for work that is not being done.

Now, by the same token, if that rule is a good rule as applied to the Senate, do you not think it is a good one as applied to the unions?

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Congressman, it is my understanding that every so-called featherbed rule in an agreement was mutually negotiated by management and the union; but, as time moved on, employers did not like a certain rule, and then they labeled it "featherbedding."

Mr. NIXON. I understand that, but as far as you have already indicated here, you think that, even though it ws agreed to, that a union should not insist on getting paid for work that is not done, just as the Senate should not insist on maintaining a rule allowing talk that is not productive?

Mr. BROWN. I will agree with respect to getting pay, if you use the term "service." I say the union has no moral or legal right to claim pay for service not rendered.

Mr. NIXON. I want to say I agree with you in your recognition of the difficulty of defining the terms, and I also realize your union is not one of those that has been criticized as extensively in this field as have some other unions. I think the machinists have made an excellent record.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield to the chair?

Mr. NIXON. Yes, as soon as I have finished my question.

Mr. BAILEY. Are you speaking on your time or the time granted by Mr. Smith?

Mr. NIXON. I am speaking on his time. Is his time up?

Mr. BAILEY. He has 1 minute.

Mr. NIXON. I will yield him 5 minutes of my time, if necessary.

As far as you are concerned, then, you do feel that, concerning a filibuster in the Senate, a rule should be passed against it, and that featherbedding, in the sense that you have described it, using your own definition, that a rule should be passed against that?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. That is all.

Mr. SMITH. Just one question: Do you think the Congress should legislate in the matter of strikes involving the public welfare and interest?

Mr. BROWN. I believe this bill now before the committee has the answer. I would supplement that opinion with the further statement that too often, when there is a strike, we overlook the thousands of other instances where through peaceful negotiations contractual relationship was established without a stoppage of work. I make that statement because in our union we have an agreement with over 10,000 employers, and in less than 10 percent in those agreements was it necessary to resort to stoppage of work, and why should the machinists be criticized when less than 10 percent resorted to stoppage of work? And we secured agreements without interrupting work. Too often a spot light is pointed to one case, and then agitation starts to enact legislation and strait-jacket the entire movement because of what happened in one solitary case in one industry.

Mr. SMITH. Of course, it is an isolated case in this matter of strikes involving the public welfare and interest and, you say, that the bill before us is sufficient, in your opinion?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, I do.

Mr. SMITH. Of course, you will also agree it is just mere verbiage, is it not? Just a bunch of words?

Mr. BROWN. No, Mr. Congressman; it is patterned after the Wagner Labor Act, and it has worked wonderfully in the labor industry.

Mr. SMITH. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Nixon, do you care to use any more of your time? You have 4 minutes.

Mr. NIXON. Yes.

You have indicated you are opposed to all of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act other than those that are contained in the new Lesinski bill and, in your statement, I might say that I was impressed by the examples that you gave. For example, I think you made a good case against the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act which denies economic strikers the right to vote in an election. You made a good case because you gave a specific example of how it affected one of your unions.

I also think you made a good case against the restriction of the Taft-Hartley Act on that type of secondary boycott in which, in effect, employees are required to act as strikebreakers by working on what would otherwise be struck work.

I want to see if you can give me specific examples on some of the other sections of the act.

Have you found that the provision in the Taft-Hartley Act which provides, in effect, for election procedure which guarantees craft unions a right to obtain representation as distinguished from the rule of the Wagner Act, which gave the balance of power in such elections to plant-wide unions? Do you oppose that provision in the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. BROWN. Whether it may be in the Taft-Hartley Act or the Wagner Act, after all, it is a matter of how the Board interprets it. The Board has discretionary authority to determine what type of union is set up, and whether a union has a right to cut out a craft, and whether they want to maintain an industrial form of organization, so it all depends on the administration of the law.

Mr. NIXON. But you believe, certainly, representing the machinists, that it is necessary that either the law or the interpretation of the law recognize the right of craft unions for representation in the plants?

Mr. BROWN. I believe the members of a craft want the union to be their bargaining agency.

Mr. NIXON. So you are not opposed to that provision of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. BROWN. No.

Mr. NIXON. How about the provisions that both management and unions should bargain in good faith? Has that proved harmful to your organization?

Mr. BROWN. No; because I could never understand why that was not placed in the act. If a union does not bargain in good faith it belies its existence.

Mr. NIXON. You spoke of transferring the Conciliation Service to the Department of Labor.

I would like to ask you whether or not the conciliators under Mr. Ching in the Conciliation Agency have acted in such a way as to be harmful to the interests of labor?

Mr. BROWN. Up to the present time I have no particular criticism to offer against Mr. Ching. Our position is not as to the manner in which the present Administrator of that department is functioning, but we say that it should never have been removed from the Department of Labor.

Mr. NIXON. In other words, you have nothing specifically critical about the way it is operated under the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. BROWN. No.

Mr. NIXON. Of course, if it went to the Department of Labor, that might be the same thing; is that not correct?

Mr. BROWN. That is true.

Mr. BAILEY. You have 1 minute, Mr. Nixon.

Mr. NIXON. On the matter of liability of contracts: You made a general reference on liabilty for contracts, the threats of damage suits against unions. Do I understand you oppose the provision in the Taft-Hartley Act which proposes the liabilty for contracts?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. Mr. Jacobs, in questioning witnesses a couple of days ago, indicated that the liability of contracts—the contracts provision of the act—really was misleading in that unions were liable for their contracts even before the act was passed.

If that is the case, why would you oppose this provision?

Mr. BROWN. Of course, I am not a lawyer, and I am not too familiar with State laws.

Mr. NIXON. Let me ask you this, then: In your opinion, then, unions were not liable for their contracts before the act was passed, and that is why you oppose the provision in the Taft-Hartley Act, which makes them liable?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you, Mr. Brown. You have been very patient.

Mr. BROWN. And thanks to the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. At this time the committee will be pleased to hear Don Mahon, executive president, Confederated Unions of America, and president o fthe National Brotherhood of Packinghouse Workers.

TESTIMONY OF DON MAHON, EXECUTIVE VICE PRESIDENT, CONFEDERATED UNIONS OF AMERICA, DES MOINES, IOWA; ACCOMPANIED BY JOSEPH McKENNA, OF THE CENTRAL STATES PETROLEUM UNIONS; ADOLPH KARLO, OF THE AUTOMOTIVE WORKERS INDUSTRIAL UNION; AND EUGENE RAETZ, OF THE INDEPENDENT RADIONIC WORKERS OF AMERICA, CUA

Mr. MAHON. My name is Don Mahon. I am executive vice president of the Confederated Unions of America and president of the National Brotherhood of Packinghouse Workers. My address is 518 East Grand Avenue, Des Moines, Iowa. I am appearing here before this committee hearing on H. R. 2032 in behalf of all independent unions, who in the final analysis represent a large percentage of American workers, and in particular those unions that are affiliated with our organization, the Confederated Unions of America, usually referred to as the CUA.

The unions we represent differ in many respects from the two major federations, and one of the principal differences is our determined and continued belief in freedom for each local to determine its policies free from the imposition of any one individual or group, whether national or international in scope. We know our livelihood is earned in our local communities; therefore, the policy of our locals must coincide with the welfare of these communities.

Figures made public by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the United States Department of Labor, not long ago, indicated that there were more than 60,000,000 workers gainfully employed in this country. The major labor federations now claim some 15,000,000 of these workers as their members. The rest of us are either independent, affiliated or unaffiliated, and/or as yet unorganized.

There is a directory of labor unions in the United States Department of Labor, compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. This directory shows the names of just those unions that are considered national or international in scope. It also includes the names of their head officers, the official address of these particular unions, the name of their official union publication, and similarly related information about these organizations.

This directory of labor unions is incomplete because it does not give the same information about the hundreds of smaller or unaffiliated unions. We have repeatedly requested that this information be made available in a similar manner with respect to these smaller unions, but as of this date it has not been forthcoming, although we now have hopes since Secretary of Labor Tobin promised, during our meeting with him several days ago, that this information would be obtained; however, there is no official catalog available at present regarding these independent unions, but it is common knowledge that there are hundreds of them and that they represent thousands of American workers.

The smaller unions are comparable to small business in some respects and any Federal law that is passed should give consideration to its rights or it will be absorbed by the large monopolies or federations. The unions we speak for originally were certified under section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, better known as the Wagner Act. As you know, this act provides that: "Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations," et cetera. If administered to the letter and in the spirit in which we think the law was passed, it would give all unions an equal opportunity. However, under the original policy of the National Labor Relations Board a dual policy existed; one applied to large federations and the other applied to the smaller or independent unions and was detrimental to them. This discrimination was corrected in the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, commonly called the Taft-Hartley Act, which required that in deciding cases the same regulations and rules of decision shall apply irrespective of whether or not the labor organizations affected are affiliated with a labor organization national or international in scope.

Contrary to the propaganda issued by the A. F. of L., CIO, and their spokesmen, alleging independent unions are company unions, independent unions have earned their title the hard way. The best proof of our being bona fide is the fact that only unions certified by a law enacted by the Federal Government can become affiliated with the CUA. We can further attest to the fact of our worthiness by the fact that in spite of constant harassment by the two major federations we are here today. Is not our survival since the enactment of the Wagner Act conclusive proof to the legislators of this country that were we not bona fide in character and worthy of the name "union," we could not possibly have survived the past 14 years?

Therefore, we recommend that the new bill, when approved by the committee, will also provide for fair and equal treatment of independent unions which are an integral part of the American labor movement as distinguished from those forms of totalitarian government where every worker must belong to one big union under a supreme dictator. Such regimentation is contradictory to all democratic principles.

A policy of fair and equal treatment for all unions can be further guaranteed by the enactment of provisions for an Assistant Secretary in the Department of Labor who is familiar with and friendly to the problems of the smaller unions the same as the present Assistant Secretaries of Labor are familiar with the problems of the CIO and the A. F. of L. unions from whence they came.

Until such legislation is passed or this policy adopted and made effective, the Department of Labor will necessarily continue to remain largely a research and organizational bureau for the unions exclusively represented by its Assistant Secretaries.

The Confederated Unions of America, better known as the CUA, is a national confederation of independent unions who have banded together to protect their members' rights on a national scale, although retaining absolute local autonomy. The CUA membership is composed of workers in the following industries: Meat packing, food processing and distribution; oil refining and distribution; radio and electrical equipment manufacturing; automotive and Diesel workers; steel-mill workers; machine and tool industries; paper workers; aluminum workers; rayon workers; furnace workers; aircraft workers; shipyard workers; transportation workers; textile workers; tobacco and utility workers, as well as many salaried and white-collar employees, and others.

We do not pretend to speak for the large independent groups such as the mine workers, machinists, railroad brotherhoods, and others who are protected by their numerical strength or special labor legislation such as the Railway Labor Act which deals specifically with the related industry.

Officers of the CUA and its affiliates and cooperating unions are all workers in their own particular industry. Almost without exception top officials of the CUA receive no salary and are paid only for actual time lost from their jobs and expenses when representing their unions on official business. However, their personal contacts with their membership and direct knowledge of working conditions within their respective industries have made it possible for them to negotiate the best contracts with the highest wages in the country.

These facts are borne out through a survey conducted by the National War Labor Board during the war period. It proved that these independent unions had averaged higher increases than other unions coming under the jurisdiction of the Board. We are confident that a survey at this time, or any time, would show approximately similar conditions.

We have cited these facts because the independent unions have not been publicized in the past largely due to their local nature and the fact that most of their disputes are settled by methods which usually do not make the headlines such as strikes invariably do. Consequently, we are requesting attention and, unless we are given fair and equal treatment under the terms of the National Labor Relations Act of 1949, the very existence of bona fide independent labor organizations may be jeopardized, thereby leading to complete totalitarianism for labor in this country.

In referring to the section of the proposed bill dealing with jurisdictional disputes, it is our position, in order to settle questions of representation, that the employees involved should be given an opportunity to determine the type of union they desire, whether it be of the craft or industrial type, and regardless of whether it is independent or otherwise. Employees should be guaranteed the right to determine this question by a secret election conducted by agents of the National Labor Relations Board. Under past Board policies, however, employees were permitted to vote for only certain so-called craft unions when they indicated a desire to be in a unit separate from the one previously certified or recognized. In order to become workable and prevent constant strife, this section of the law must apply equally to all unions.

Title II of the proposed act is labeled "Mediation and Arbitration." This section is of great importance to many of our unions on arbitration as a final method for the settlement of all disputes in accordance with the terms of their contracts. We favor this method of settling disputes only when the parties involved have mutually agreed to use this method as a final solution. We are unalterably opposed to compulsory arbitration.

The matter of arbitration as currently practiced is inequitable to organized labor. Indirectly, the Government is now assuming the cost of arbitration in behalf of the companies within all of industry by permitting the use of "tax dollars" to meet this expense which is far in excess of the income of the average individual labor union representing employees of the aforesaid companies. Corporations using such "tax dollars" can arbitrate unions to death so long as the present arbitration procedures are continued, without relief to organized labor by the Federal Government. We believe that free arbitration should be available to all desiring such services in industry as defined in the act. Arbitrators so selected would be free from serving two masters, and such servitude can best be avoided by placing such arbitrators within the jurisdiction of the Department of Labor in a status similar to or within the protection of benefits afforded to governmental employees under the Civil Service Act.

With respect to labor-management advisory committees, as provided in the proposed bill, in the appointment of these labor-management committees from respective industries it is our recommendation that the law require equal representation for all unions involved in the industry, regardless of whether or not the union is local, national, or international in scope. Unless equal representation is compulsory, those who do gain representation are wont to use their position for organizational purposes among their competitors. This fact was clearly demonstrated when the petroleum panel was set up during the war and on which independent unions representing the vast majority of workers in their particular industry were denied representation on the panels established by the War Labor Board. Quite naturally the cases affecting the independent unions received little or no consideration except as a source of organizational propaganda by the union represented on this particular panel. We suggest that similar consideration be given to the independent unions in any industry involved when emergency boards are created as provided in the proposed bill.

In closing, let me call your attention to these facts. Independent unions, such as those affiliated with the Confederated Unions of America, are run from the bottom up by their working members and not from the top down by professional organizers. This probably accounts largely for the fact that your House Committee on Un-American Activities did not find a single instance of Communist infiltration, domination or even sympathy among CUA affiliates to our knowledge. The principal reason for this being that the average American worker knows that we, in the United States, have the best form of government on earth, and we want to keep it that way.

This independence and freedom, however, has its disadvantages because the very people who speak so vociferously of our great American form of government sometimes look with disdain upon labor organizations such as the CUA, which have adopted the very principles upon which our great democracy was founded.

Our CUA officers and members all work in the mills, factories, offices and plants, where their unions have the bargaining rights. It is a well-known fact that the Communist organizers are usually allergic to work of the manual type. They prefer worming into an executive or official capacity wherever they can work from within or under cover like the parasites they are known to be. So long as laws affecting labor protect the American workers' right in self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations of their own choosing, our problems can be worked out in a democratic manner. In order to be workable, these labor laws must provide fair and equal treatment for all unions, whether independent or otherwise. We trust that your committee will take the action necessary to guarantee this fair and equal treatment.

I thank you.

I would like to introduce my colleagues here: Joseph McKenna, of the Central States Petroleum Unions, Whiting, Ind.; Adolph Karlo, of the Automotive Workers Industrial Union, Chicago, Ill.; and Eugene Raetz, of the Independent Radionic Workers of America, CUA, Chicago, Ill.

If you care to ask these gentlemen any questions, they will be pleased to answer them.

Mr. BAILEY. The chairman would like to inquire at this time if your associates who are present with you have any briefs they desire to file?

Mr. MAHON. We have no briefs to file, Mr. Chairman. They are open to questions, if there is anyone who cares to question them.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask you, Mr. Mahon, how many unions are involved in this independent organization of yours?

Mr. MAHON. We have approximately 70 affiliates in the CUA. There are a good number of independent unions that cooperate with us in excess of that, but, of course, they are independent and are not directly affiliated; but they have always cooperated with us.

Mr. BAILEY. About what would be the total membership of the unions involved?

Mr. MAHON. Over 100,000 in the CUA. We have never yet been able to find out how many small independent unions there are, and we think the Department of Labor should provide that. We are sure their interests are common.

Mr. BAILEY. You are speaking now of the 70 affiliated groups?

Mr. MAHON. I am talking about the ones I said have always cooperated, in addition to the CUA affiliates.

Mr. BAILEY. That are purely in an independent status?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you have a constitution and bylaws in your organization?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir; we do.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you have a copy?

Mr. MAHON. I do not have a copy available, but I can get one for you.

Mr. BAILEY. I think it would be advisable for you to file one.

Mr. MAHON. Yes. We will do that.

Mr. BAILEY. What is the attitude of your group toward communism?

Mr. MAHON. Our group is absolutely opposed to it; and, if there are any Communists in our unions, it is because the company hired them. We have no members except the members who work in the plants and factories.

Mr. BAILEY. If there were, could you get rid of them?

Mr. MAHON. Our constitution and bylaws will not allow them to hold office in our unions. We could not get rid of them in the plants, because under the present law that is not permitted.

Mr. BAILEY. What is the attitude of your group toward the present so-called Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. MAHON. That is a big order. We are opposed to the Taft-Hartley Act in general. However, we understand the present Taft-Hartley Act includes a lot of the provisions of the Wagner Act, which we favor. You mentioned the Communist angle of it. We are not, as I say, opposed to that. We believe everyone should be willing to sign one of the affidavits, but we do not think it should be just the labor people. We think it puts a smear on us to have to sign an affidavit of that nature and sit across the table from the people we negotiate with who are not required to sign such affidavits.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to inquire whether you think that that provision should not be made general and apply to all people rather than to be written into special legislation, say, legislation affecting labor relations?

Mr. MAHON. I do, and I think it should apply to all subversive elements.

Mr. BAILEY. Regardless of whether they are in a union organization or out of a union organization?

Mr. MAHON. Absolutely.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you feel that the imposition of this oath that is required tends to weaken the union organizations of the Nation, in that they are not able to clear their membership of these subversive elements?

Mr. MAHON. I cannot speak for the others. I am sure the independent unions we represent have no objection to the filing of the affidavits, other than it seems discriminatory to us, because the people with whom we are required to deal are not placed under the same obligation.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you think that the ban against the closed shop in the present act is fair and workable as compared to the set-up of a union shop?

What is the attitude of your groups on that?

Mr. MAHON. We feel, Congressman, that the closed shop is something that should be decided by the group of employees in the particular unit, especially if it has been certified under the law. We think if the people in that unit have indicated by a majority that they want that particular union to deal for them—under the law or policies of the Board, that certification is only good for a period of time, usually a year, or not more than 2 years—and we think they should elect a representative just like we elect a representative to Congress and during the time they are in office they should have the right to act freely, and if the closed shop is one of the things they negotiate, we believe they should have a right not to do it, or to do it, providing they can get the people they are dealing with to agree. We think it is a problem that involves the particular union and the company they are dealing with.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe you suggested here that the fieldmen, or the men attached to the National Labor Relations Board, should be brought under the provisions of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MAHON. I had reference only to arbitrators.

Mr. BAILEY. You are aware of the fact those fieldmen are under civil service?

Mr. MAHON. I understand they are. I was referring to arbitrators in the Department of Labor.

Mr. BAILEY. That is in the Conciliation Division; yes.

Mr. MAHON. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. I think what you meant, Mr. Mahon, in regard to arbitrators, was that they should be paid by the Government, as a public service and be on the Government pay roll?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you have some membership in Lake County, Ind.?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; we do.

Mr. JACOBS. I think some of those people talked to me the other day about that point.

Mr. MAHON. We have a number of oil workers there.

Mr. JACOBS. In the oil industry?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. And they stated to me that since the arbitrators were not furnished by the Conciliation Service they had found their decisions were not firm like they had been in the past when they were in the Government employ.

Mr. MAHON. If it is permissible, I would like to have Mr. McKenna answer the question.

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Is the position I stated substantially correct?

Mr. MCKENNA. Practically that. We have records that will substantiate that, before the advent of the Taft-Hartley Act, where the Department of Labor furnished that service, provisions in our contract provided that in case of a stalemate, then with the company we had a right to appeal to the Department of Labor to send an arbitrator that would be paid by the Department of Labor.

Mr. JACOBS. That, of course, was by virtue of a contract?

Mr. MCKENNA. Yes, by contract.

Mr. JACOBS. I believe your association grew out of the old committee of the Standard Oil?

Mr. MCKENNA. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. And that came out of the fearful strike and difficulty back in 1917?

Mr. MCKENNA. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. And you evolved into this union you are the head of now?

Mr. MCKENNA. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. And during a great many of those years you had used the arbitration service, and both sides have found it satisfactory?

Mr. MCKENNA. We wrote that in our union contract. Our union is incorporated in the State of Indiana. Since 1937, up to the advent of the Taft-Hartley Act, that was very successful. After the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act they stripped the Department of Labor and set up a Conciliation Department, and possibly during that time I represented more or less 500 issues before the Department of Labor over a period of years, and the record will show I had never complained about decisions, so I did not like——

Mr. JACOBS. That is always true.

Mr. MCKENNA. Yes, that is always true, but after that, when it was put under the Conciliation Department, under paid arbitration, where you set up men who had no responsibility to the Government or anybody else, they have rendered decisions where we had no recourse or appeal, but under the Taft-Hartley Act we can appeal those——

Mr. JACOBS. Under the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. MCKENNA. No. Prior to the Taft-Hartley Act we could appeal to the National Labor Relations Board, and if an arbitrator went beyond the stipulation they held the decision null and void. We have five of the decisions today that affect the industry, the men that we represent, and I personally represent 30,000 oil workers, and we have no recourse under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. JACOBS. The substance of your position is that you think we will get fairer decisions, and your arbitrators are more prone to look at the facts when they are Government employees, than when they are private arbitrators who are selected and sent in?

Mr. McKenna. Yes, we always believe the Gvernment representative, whether he be a mailman or a Congressman or an arbitrator, usually performs his duties fairly and honestly.

Mr. Jacobs. I do not have any further time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bailey. Mr. Wier?

Mr. Wier. Mr. Mahon, your set-up here is new to me. I do not think we have any unions in our State, but you make some reference to your membership. You said a minute ago you have 70,000 members?

Mr. Mahon. No, sir, I said we had 70 affiliated unions.

Mr. Wier. What does that membership amount to?

Mr. Mahon. We have over 100,000 members.

Mr. Wier. 100,000 members?

Mr. Mahon. Yes, sir.

Mr. Wier. What dues do you charge the units?

Mr. Mahon. Each local unit determines its own dues. They pay 3 cents per capita tax to the CUA. Is that what you had reference to?

Mr. Wier. Where is the CUA office?

Mr. Mahon. Here in Washington, D. C.

Mr. Wier. Are you three men here out of that office?

Mr. Mahon. No, sir.

We have counsel down here, and we send a man here whenever it is necessary. We came down here for this hearing.

Mr. Wier. How about your initiation fees? What do you charge for initiation fes?

Mr. Mahon. The CUA charters unions the same as all national affiliations. We charge $25 for initiation fee to an organization desiring to affiliate, and after that it is 3 cents per month per member.

Mr. Wier. Who sets the policy for the general direction of all of the 70 units?

Mr. Mahon. They handle that locally. They have local autonomy.

Mr. Wier. In other words, all of the local units are in some degree orphans?

How are they affiliated?

Mr. Mahon. We have meetings periodically, and each one of them has a representative on our national board.

Mr. Wier. And they pay a per capita tax to your central office?

Mr. Mahon. Yes, sir.

Mr. Wier. How much?

Mr. Mahon. Three cents per month per member.

Mr. Wier. Three cents per month per member?

Mr. Mahon. That is right.

Mr. Wier. Then you have no officials of that general organization, of the parent organization, do you?

Mr. Mahon. Oh, yes. We have a president and three vice presidents and a secretary.

Mr. Wier. You say you have 100,000 members scattered throughout the United States?

Mr. Mahon. Yes, sir.

Mr. Wier. You make some reference here to industries which you have organized?

Mr. Mahon. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. How many do you have in the meat-packing industry? You mentioned that.

Mr. MAHON. There are 19,000 in the meat-packing industry.

Mr. WIER. Nineteen thousand?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Are they all in one firm, or are they scattered over various firms?

Mr. MAHON. Various firms.

Mr. WIER. How about food processing?

Mr. MAHON. Yes; we have some of those.

Mr. WIER. How many?

Mr. MAHON. They come under packinghouse workers. Packinghouse and distribution of foods; we include them together.

Mr. WIER. What would be the approximate number?

Mr. MAHON. They are all included in that lump sum there.

Mr. WIER. Nineteen thousand?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir. That includes all of those who handle food.

Mr. WIER. Radio and electrical equipment; how many do you have there?

Mr. MAHON. Nine thousand.

Mr. WIER. In one spot?

Mr. MAHON. We have four unions in the radio and electrical workers.

Mr. WIER. Four unions?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Are they combined with the automotive and Diesel workers?

Mr. MAHON. No, sir.

Mr. WIER. How many do you have in that field?

Mr. MAHON. In the automotive and Diesel we have about 1,300 people.

Mr. WIER. Are they scattered around the country?

Mr. MAHON. In two or three localities.

Mr. WIER. How about steel mill workers?

Mr. MAHON. Twelve thousand.

Mr. WIER. You have 12,000 in the steel mills?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir; that we speak for.

Mr. WIER. Machinists and the tool industry?

Mr. MAHON. Five thousand.

Mr. WIER. Paper workers?

Mr. MAHON. About 2,700.

Mr. WIER. Aluminum workers?

Mr. MAHON. One thousand two hundred.

Mr. WIER. Rayon workers?

Mr. MAHON. One thousand five hundred.

Mr. WIER. Is that one plant, or are they scattered around the country?

Mr. MAHON. I would have to check on that.

Mr. WIER. That is all right. Furnace workers?

Mr. MAHON. There is one unit of 500 there.

Mr. WIER. Aircraft workers?

Mr. MAHON. One thousand.

Mr. WIER. I would like to see your constitution and bylaws. Shipyard workers; how many do you have there?

Mr. MAHON. I do not have the figure on that.

Mr. WIER. How about transportation workers?

Mr. MAHON. I do not have the figure right here on that. That is 500.

Mr. WIER. What do you call transportation workers?

Mr. MAHON. Taxicab drivers and truck drivers, and so forth.

Mr. WIER. How about textile workers?

Mr. MAHON. Five hundred.

Mr. WIER. Is that one plant?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir; that is a local union.

Mr. WIER. That is one local union. Tobacco workers?

Mr. MAHON. Two thousand.

Mr. WIER. And utility workers, or is utility combined——

Mr. MAHON. It must be combined, sir. As I say there are some 70 affiliates. I thought the question might come up, so we just raked off the general groups there. The large groups, of course, you can see, are the oil workers and the packinghouse workers, radio and electrical, and steel.

Mr. WIER. Is there anybody connected with the CUA that can officially set the policy by convention, or how does this unit over here work along with this unit over there?

Mr. MAHON. We have a regular convention, and the convention powers are delegated in accordance with the number of people represented.

Mr. WIER. I probably should have realized that, because you also say that you have no paid officials.

Mr. MAHON. I did not say that.

Mr. WIER. "Almost without exception, top officials of the CUA receive no salary, and are paid only for actual time"?

Mr. MAHON. They are paid for actual time, whatever amount of time it takes to handle the business.

Mr. WIER. So you do not have administrative time?

Mr. MAHON. Oh, yes; we have at least one man who works all the time at whatever time it takes to handle the business.

Mr. WIER. For 100,000 workers?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. How do you service them?

Mr. MAHON. The CUA is a national organization, and primarily its purpose is to give representation whenever it is needed, and to bring the people together. The locals have their own officers and handle their business locally, and the CUA maintains its office here, and we have necessary legal counsel when we have matters of policy to be determined, and they are determined in an annual convention or special convention or in regular board meetings.

Mr. WIER. How does your international organize workers with such limited administration?

Mr. MAHON. By sending notice to all the people in independent unions who are interested, and by permitting them to come to our conferences and conventions—unofficially, of course—and to participate in the activity that we carry on, to try to get equal representation for labor generally.

Mr. WIER. Who negotiates the contracts for all of these people?

Mr. MAHON. The CUA does not negotiate the local contracts, any more than the AFL negotiates its local contracts, or the CIO.

Mr. WIER. I see.

Mr. MAHON. Each local is certified in that particular plant under the terms of either the Wagner Act, or, since that, the Taft-Hartley Act, and the people in that particular unit negotiate their contract.

Mr. WIER. You recognize the difference between your national organization and the CIO and the AFL, who have paid officials to take care of not only their contracts, but their services?

Mr. MAHON. Their per capita tax is not as much different. I think it was recently raised. I think it was 5 cents in the CIO and I think, if I am not mistaken 3½ or 2½ cents in the AFL. The only difference is that they have more members.

Mr. WIER. But you have already admitted that you have officials around to service your membership. Your membership always has grievances, if you remember that.

Mr. MAHON. Congressman, every local has its officials, and whether they are paid or not, I am not going into that. I am talking about the CUA, this national organization.

Mr. WIER. Did the telephone workers ever belong to your group?

Mr. MAHON. No; they did not.

Mr. WIER. They have never belonged to it?

Mr. MAHON. No.

Mr. WIER. That is an independent union in many cases?

Mr. MAHON. Yes. They have cooperated. They have come down here with us as witnesses in meetings at various times, and they have cooperated. They believe they should have representation, too, I am sure, but we do not claim to speak for them.

Mr. WIER. One more question. I have only about 10 minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. You have one more minute, Mr. Wier.

Mr. JACOBS. I yielded my time.

Mr. WIER. Let me ask you this one question. I am serious about this. You lay a lot of stress upon the fact that your group was one of the groups where there were no Communists found. Now, will you please tell me if you organized workers on any scale at all, how would you determine whether you had any Communists in your membership or not?

Mr. MAHON. Congressman, I said that your committee down here did not find any in our organization. I said if there were any there, it was not because we had brought them in; it was because they were employees hired by the company. I do not know if they are there or not. I said that all of our officers had signed non-Communist affidavits.

Mr. WIER. If you go over here to a packing plant and offer your unions to the service of the workers there, you take them all in, do you not?

Mr. MAHON. We surely do.

Mr. WIER. And there might be three or four Communists or "left wingers," or whatever you want to call them; is that possible?

Mr. MAHON. That is very possible.

Mr. WIER. Then you would not say that you have not any?

Mr. MAHON. I did not say that we did not have any. I said that our officers have all signed affidavits, and I said that if there were any Communists in there, they were people that the company had employed, and we did not bring them in there, and under the requirements of law, we have to represent them. We cannot do anything else about it under the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. WIER. That is what I wondered, if you had a new formula for meeting that situation.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. But the point that you made, Mr. Mahon, was that your unions are set up as a local organization, and as such, you probably have better control over them than some of the big national organizations. Is that the point that you are making?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir; we think that the local problems are the ones that the people on the job are interested in, and under both the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley Act, all unions are certified on a local basis. We have just carried on and let those people run their own business, sir.

Mr. SMITH. Do I understand that you cannot get from the Secretary of Labor the number of men employed in the United States who are affiliated with some local union?

Mr. MAHON. We cannot; that is right.

Mr. SMITH. Does the Secretary of Labor have those figures?

Mr. MAHON. The Secretary of Labor should have them, or the National Labor Relations Board, because they handle all the elections. They require all the unions to register under the Taft-Hartley law. I do not know why they would not have them; that is, the ones that want to use the National Labor Relations Board since they are required to register. They should be over there.

Mr. SMITH. Have you made written inquiry as well as talked to them about it?

Mr. MAHON. I surely have.

Mr. SMITH. What was their answer?

Mr. MAHON. Well, 2 weeks ago I wrote to them, and they sent me back a book that has all the national and international unions in it. It did not have all the independents in there, though.

Mr. SMITH. Do you have anybody down there at the Secretary of Labor?

Mr. MAHON. No, we do not. The CIO and the AFL both have an Assistant Secretary down there, but we are not represented in the Department. They are not too much concerned about getting information for us, apparently. We cannot seem to get it.

Mr. SMITH. Do you have any opinion as to how many men there are in the United States that are in these local unions? Do you have any way of guessing as to how many men there are in the United States who are in them?

Mr. MAHON. No. It would be just a guess, Congressman, and I really do not know. We would like to know. We think that it is a function of the Department of Labor and the Bureau of Labor Statistics, to compile that information. We do not want to come down here and say we represent people that we do not, because they never authorized us to. But we think under the law or any law that all unions should get the same consideration and representation in the Department of Labor, whether large, small, or in between, whether independent or affiliated, so long as they are in compliance with the law.

Mr. SMITH. I am surprised and shocked, because I thought that they knew down at the Department of Labor and the Bureau of Labor Statistics down there even the number of clothespins that were made last year in the United States.

Mr. MAHON. You are writing a law that will affect all of us, and we are certainly affected by any law that results, and like other good citizens we expect to go along with it. But we certainly feel entitled to consideration. We may be considered a minority, but it is our understanding that the policy is to give minorites at least the right to be heard and to have representation.

Mr. SMITH. Now, this is a rather direct question. Has the Taft-Hartley Labor Act, passed 2 years ago, interfered in any way with your union?

Mr. MAHON. It definitely has interfered. Would you care——

Mr. SMITH. I mean, as far as your own local membership is concerned and the activities that you are engaged in at the local level.

Mr. MAHON. Yes, it has, Congressman, placed us at a disadvantage in many respects.

Mr. SMITH. If it has, what would you like to see this present Congress do to help you and your organization?

Mr. MAHON. According to the things that I outlined there in my statement, we think that a good labor law should more or less act as an umpire to keep all the parties involved going according to its rules, and that the rules should not be loaded one way or the other. We think it should be right down the middle with the Government acting as an umpire, and giving the same consideration and equal consideration to all of us involved, whether they are unions or the people with whom we have to bargain.

Mr. SMITH. Do you feel that the Taft-Hartley Labor Act gave the CIO and the AFL advantages over your union?

Mr. MAHON. I can say this, that since the Taft-Hartley law was passed, one provision of it requires the Labor Board to give the same consideration to unions regardless of whether they are national or international in scope, and the CIO and AFL, of course, have gained in some respects.

Mr. SMITH. I will ask you whether or not the CIO or the AFL could interfere with your men working in some of the plants over the country.

Mr. MAHON. Do you have reference to any particular example?

Mr. SMITH. Well, take the packinghouse strike in Kansas City.

Mr. MAHON. In Kansas City, during 1946, I happened to be the president of the National Brotherhood of Packinghouse Workers, and the President of the United States sent us a telegram at that time, when there was a dispute existing with the companies over wages, and asked us to continue working due to the boys overseas, and so forth, and saying that he would appoint a fact-finding board to investigate the merits of the dispute, and if we would stay on the job, which he asked us to do, it would be thoroughly investigated. Our unions—as the one you mentioned, the local in Kansas City—conducted an election among its membership there. The election was conducted by three local ministers, as I remember it, and the people in that plant voted on the proposition, Should we continue operations while the President looked into the meat packing situation? These people voted, as I recall, about two to one to authorize us to continue negotiations and to wait for the report of the President's fact-finding board.

The CIO people did not see fit to go along with President Truman's recommendation, and they struck the plants on either side of the plant where we represented the workers. They also formed mass picket lines and prevented our members from going back and forth to work, which they voted to do.

Now, I think what you have reference to is this. In 1948, a year ago tomorrow, the CIO saw fit to take similar action. The AFL and our union had been able to negotiate a contract that was agreeable to our membership with the big packers. The AFL and our union people were working, and the CIO struck the same two plants again, and as I remember it, under the Taft-Hartley law, there was no interference with our people whatever. That was, I believe, the situation that did occur before and after the enactment of the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. SMITH. How many strikes have the affiliates of your union been engaged in in the last year; do you know?

Mr. MAHON. In the last year, only one or two that I know of right now.

Mr. SMITH. Were they of long duration?

Mr. MAHON. No: short duration.

Mr. SMITH. I believe that is all, Mr. Chairman. Thank you very much.

Mr. JACOBS. Do I have any time left, Mr. Chairman? I reserved any time I had left. Was there any left?

Mr. PERKINS. Not my time.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, your unions were certified, were they not, by the Labor Board?

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir; in nearly all cases that I know of. There may have been some that were not, but as far as I know, they were all certified.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all. Thank you.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you, gentlemen.

At this time, the committee will be pleased to hear Mr. Carl Brown, president of the Foreman's Association of America.

Will you state your name and affiliation, Mr. Brown?

TESTIMONY OF CARL BROWN, PRESIDENT, FOREMAN'S ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA, DETROIT, MICH.

Mr. BROWN. I am Carl Brown, of Detroit, Mich., president of the Foreman's Association of America, representing the traffic cops of industry.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce Mr. Gerhard Van Arkel, who was general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board at the time that Board was processing our case.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry; I cannot hear the gentleman.

Mr. BROWN. And any questions you may have about how the Board handled the foremen's cases, I am sure he can answer.

Mr. McNally, on my right, is a foreman from the Murray Corp. of Detroit, who is here to reply to a statement made by a foreman at the Murray Corp.

Mr. Phillips, on my left here, is the vice president of the Foreman's Association.

Mr. BAILEY. You may proceed, Mr. Brown.

Mr. BROWN. Our organization and other supervisory employee groups were on the receiving end of the hardest blows delivered by the Taft-Hartley Act; therefore, we aline ourselves with other organizations advocating repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and the enactment of the Thomas bill, S. 249.

We are interested in the over-all labor legislative program, but as an organization we are mainly interested in one point, and that is to obtain for supervisory employees the same opportunities, privileges, and protection by law in our legitimate union activities as will be granted to other groups of employees under Federal labor laws.

Prior to the enactment of the Wagner Act in 1935, supervisory employees were on an equal basis with other employees in respect to dealing with their employers on matters pertaining to their own conditions of employment either individually or collectively.

Under the Wagner Act it was finally determined by Supreme Court decision upholding a prior decision by the National Labor Relations Board that supervisory employees represented by the Foreman's Association of America were employees within the meaning of the act, and as such were entitled to the same privileges and protection granted by that act to other groups of employees.

During the last few years under the Wagner Act, organized foremen made considerable progress by their collective efforts to improve their own conditions of employment. Foremen were successful in obtaining recognition from several employers and were able to negotiate contracts with their employers establishing practices beneficial to both parties.

With the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act the equality of bargaining power between employer and foreman was destroyed, giving all of the advantages to the employer and leaving none to the foreman. By sanction of the Taft-Hartley Act employers have wiped out most of the gains made by foremen under the Wagner Act, and most employers in mass-production industries are now imposing similar unreasonable conditions of employment upon their foremen as were imposed upon other groups of employees prior to enactment of the Wagner Act in 1935.

Foremen employed by 95 percent of employers, subject to the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, can no longer enjoy full freedom of voluntary association for the purpose of improving their own economic welfare on the penalty of discharge or other discriminatory acts by employers. However, few of the more liberal-minded employers recognize our association as collective-bargaining agent for their foremen, and our relationship with those employers is considered good.

Mr. JACOBS. Pardon me, Mr. Chairman.

You did not read from your text, did you?

Mr. BROWN. No. I read from this additional statement that I have here, of which I have additional copies.

Mr. BAILEY. The witness will proceed.

Mr. BROWN. I have finished with the statement I just read.

It was not a new thing when foremen organized themselves into a strictly independent union and sought to be certified as bargaining units under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act. The National Labor Relations Board developed a policy that clearly recognized foremen as employees under the meaning of the act; and this policy was finally sustained by a decision of the United States Supreme Court on March 10, 1947, in the Packard case.

Possibly because organization among foremen was growing and expanding among diverse industries, various employer-agencies apparently exerted influence upon the Eightieth Congress with a view to depriving supervisory employees of the protection of this country's labor laws in the exercise of their right to organize. This was skillfully accomplished in the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, commonly referred to as the Taft-Hartley law. This act, while reiterating the right of foremen to organize, effectively granted the employer the right to discriminate against foremen who dared to exercise this right.

The foremost arguments presented to the National Labor Relations Board, Federal courts, and the Eightieth Congress by representatives of employers against the lawful right of foremen to maintain equal opportunities and protection as other groups of employees in their collective efforts to better their own conditions of employment are as follows:

Foremen are part of management: There is a great distinction between being management or a part of management and being the supervisory employee who acts as the agent of management. As an agent of management the supervisory employee carries out a predetermined program of translating the plans of management through the activities of those he supervises in producing the goods and products that management ultimately sells or markets.

Second among their reasons why foremen cannot have bargaining rights is that foremen cannot serve two masters.

This is strictly an implication of divided loyalties. Followed to its ultimate conclusion, once a man becomes a supervisory employee, he can have no other loyalty but to his immediate employer. This in effect would deny him the right to join a lodge, church, a labor organization, or even to show loyalty to the interests of his own family, or, in the final analysis, loyalty to his country.

Following quotations were taken from the United States Supreme Court decision dated March 10, 1947, in the Packard Motor Car Company v. National Labor Relations Board case:

> The company's argument is really addressed to the undesirability of permitting foremen to organize. It wants selfless representatives of its interests. It fears that if foremen combine to bargain advantages for themselves, they will sometimes be governed by interests of their own or of their fellow foreman, rather than by the company's interest. There is nothing new in this argument. It is rooted in the misconception that because the employer has the right to wholehearted loyalty in the performance of the contract of employment, the employee does not have the right to protect his independent and adverse interest in the terms of the contract itself and the conditions of work.
> Even those who act for the employer in some matters, including the service of standing between management and manual labor, still have interests of their own as employees. Though the foreman is the faithful representative of the employer in maintaining a production schedule, his interest properly may be adverse to that of the employer when it comes to fixing his own wages, hours, seniority rights or working conditions. He does not lose his right to serve himself in these respects because he serves his master in others.

The third reason offered by employers why foremen should not have the rights and privileges of the act is that foremen act in the interest of the employer. It is our claim that all employees act in the interest of the employer. The Supreme Court decision in the Packard case of March 10, 1947, quotes in part:

> Every employee from the very fact of employment in the master's business is required to act in his interest. He owes to the employer faithful performance of service in his interests, the protection of the employer's property in his custody or control, and all the employees may as to third parties act in the interests of the employer to such an extent that he is liable for their wrongful acts.

No. 4 among the items presented by the employers to deny foremen rights is that if foremen are granted the same rights, privileges and protection as other groups of employees, the result would be industrial chaos.

This time-worn statement has been overworked for decades. Its been used against practically all proposals offered to aid the workingman. And no combination of words in the English language can be composed based upon fact to sustain the charge. It is common practice in several industries for foremen to be recognized as a group appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining, and the owners of those industries make no claim that chaos results from such recognition.

The Railway Labor Act enacted in 1926 extends to supervisory employees the same privileges and protection in their collective efforts as it does to other groups of railway employees, and no claim is made that chaos reigns by reason of such privileges and protection by the operators of that very large business.

Likewise, operators of water-borne vessels make no charge that chaos flourishes in the shipping industry as a result of recognizing mates and engineers for the purpose of collective bargaining. The job duties of licensed officers aboard vessels are comparable to those of foremen employed in land industries.

Several liberal-minded employers recognize the Foreman's Association of America as collective bargaining agent for their supervisory employees. And those same employers make no claim of reduced efficiency of operations because of bargaining privileges of their foremen.

The assertion is so weak that it can best be answered in one terse expression supplied by Gen. Anthony Clement McAuliffe in reply to German demands during the battle of Bastogne: "Nuts!"

The next sections I would like to omit, and have them appear in the record, in order to save time.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

(The material referred to is as follows:)

NEED FOR COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

From the early days of mass production by power machinery to the present decade the foreman was considered either as the channel through which the desires of ownership and management were conveyed to and made effective among the body of workers, or as the representative of ownership and management in the shop. Just before the opening of the present decade the organization of the body of workers into plant- and industry-wide unions demanding the exclusive right of representation for collective bargaining purposes, dealing with employers or groups of employers in organizations that have existed for years, has greatly changed the real status of the foreman.

In the particulars of the day's production the foreman is yet the channel for making effective policies and directions of management as applied to production, but he is a part of neither organized ownership and management on the one hand nor of organized labor on the other hand. The foreman fits between two enormous powers: ownership and management on top; and labor unions, with enormous numbers, on the bottom. The foreman has reason to feel that in the ceaseless struggle between ownership and wage labor the foreman will become a victim unless all foremen are organized to protect individuals and interests common and essential to the position of foremen in modern mass power production.

WHY SUPERVISORY EMPLOYEES ARE ENTITLED TO PRIVILEGES AND PROTECTION BY LAW IN THEIR COLLECTIVE BARGAINING ENDEAVORS.

The Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 placed the supervisory employees of this Nation in the same unreasonable position all other mass production employees were in prior to the enactment of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935. Under the new Federal labor law many employers are imposing the same unsatisfactory conditions of employment upon foremen as were imposed upon other groups of employees prior to 1935.

The general public welfare, most social gains, and improved conditions of employment have been attained through the medium of group discussions, considerations and decisions; but the denial to supervisory employees protection by law in their collective union endeavors has furnished employers with an effective method of preventing foremen from exercising their right to free or voluntary association on the penalty of discharge or other discriminatory acts.

No attempt has been made to include in this statement all that could be said favoring the question of supervision. However, pertinent points are mentioned for the committee's information, and we respectfully request that the committee favorably consider the proposition of extending to supervisory employees the same opportunities, privileges and protection in their union activities as will be extended to other groups of employees in the enactment of new Federal labor legislation.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, at this time I would like to submit for the record a list of cases that we had pending before the National Labor Relations Board that were dismissed because of the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act. This list includes representation cases and unfair-labor-practices cases.

Mr. BAILEY. If there are no objections, the list will be accepted for inclusion in the record.

Mr. BROWN. I will supply each member of the committee with a copy also.

EMPLOYMENT STATEMENT

I HEREBY AUTHORIZE FORD MOTOR COMPANY TO DEDUCT FROM ANY MONEYS DUE OR OWING ME THE SUM OF $3.00 FOR EACH IDENTIFICATION PASS, 50¢ FOR EACH TOOL CHECK, 25¢ FOR EACH LOCKER KEY, AND THE COST OF ANY OTHER EQUIPMENT RECEIVED BY ME WHILE IN ITS EMPLOY, WHICH IS LOST OR DAMAGED, OR, WHICH I FAIL TO RETURN IN GOOD CONDITION (EXCEPT FOR ORDINARY WEAR AND TEAR IN THE COURSE OF BUSINESS) UPON DEMAND.

I UNDERSTAND THAT MY EMPLOYMENT IS NOT FOR ANY DEFINITE TERM, AND MAY BE TERMINATED AT ANY TIME, WITHOUT ADVANCE NOTICE, BY EITHER MYSELF OR FORD MOTOR COMPANY; THAT MY EMPLOYMENT IS SUBJECT TO SUCH RULES, REGULATIONS, AND PERSONNEL PRACTICES AND POLICIES, AND CHANGES THEREIN, AS FORD MOTOR COMPANY MAY FROM TIME TO TIME ADOPT; AND THAT MY EMPLOYMENT SHALL BE SUBJECT TO SUCH LAY-OFFS, AND MY COMPENSATION TO SUCH ADJUSTMENTS, AS FORD MOTOR COMPANY MAY FROM TIME TO TIME DETERMINE.

I UNDERSTAND THAT MEDICAL INFORMATION DISCLOSED TO THE COMPANY'S EXAMINING PHYSICIAN IS NOT FOR TREATMENT AS A PATIENT AND IS NOT PRIVILEGED.

I ELECT TO BECOME SUBJECT TO THE PROVISIONS OF THE WORKMAN'S COMPENSATION LAWS OF THE STATE OF

(EMPLOYEE'S SIGNATURE)

At the bottom of the reverse side of the form, the section entitled "Employment statement" reads, in part, as follows:

"I understand that my employment is not for any definite term, and may be terminated at any time without advance notice, by either myself or Ford Motor Co.; that my employment is subject to such rules, regulations, and personnel practices and policies, and changes therein, as Ford Motor Co. may from time to time adopt; and that my employment shall be subject to such lay-offs and my compensation to such adjustments as Ford Motor Co. may from time to time determine."

Ford Motor Co. foremen are convinced that the adoption of the above conditions of employment by the company was for the purpose of discouraging membership and activity in the Foreman's Association of America and therefore consider it to be a "yellow-dog" contract.

FOREMEN DISCHARGED AT THE AGE OF 65 YEARS

Since the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act the Ford Motor Co. has adopted a policy of discharging foremen upon reaching the age of 65 years, regardless of physical fitness, but no such rule applies to the rank-and-file workers who do manual labor under the foreman's supervision.

THE CASE OF CYRIL M'GUIRE

Mr. McGuire has been president of the Foreman's Association of America, chapter No. 239, Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co., Youngstown, Ohio, since its formation in 1944.

During the last 3 years, McGuire's associate foremen, doing the same or similar work, have received three increases in their salary, but McGuire has received no increase.

While no official of the company has told McGuire that the reason no increase in salary was granted was due to his membership and activity in the association, many foremen have told McGuire that officials of the company openly assert that his activity in the Foreman's Association is the reason why no increase was given to him.

EMPLOYER DISCHARGES 22 OF 25 FOREMEN EMPLOYED BY HIM

The Gerity-Michigan Die Castings Co., of Detroit, Mich., employed 25 foremen. All were members of chapter No. 295, Foreman's Association of America, and the association was recognized as the bargaining agent prior to the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act.

In December 1947, the company discharged Carl Wilhelm, who was president of chapter No. 295, without any explanation—and within 3 months 21 of the remaining 24 members were discharged, and their jobs were taken over by new foremen who were not members of our association.

THE CASE OF ELMER GAYDOSH

Elmer Gaydosh was employed for many years as a foreman by the Republic Steel Corp. of Youngstown, Ohio, and he was president of chapter No. 266, Foreman's Association of America, where other foremen employed by the Republic Steel in Youngstown are members.

About the middle of 1948 Gaydosh was discharged by the Republic Steel Corp. No reason was given by the corporation for the discharge. However, at a chapter meeting shortly after Gaydosh was discharged, the foremen present were unanimous in the opinion that he was discharged because of his activity in the chapter.

MARGINAL MEN OF INDUSTRY: THE FOREMEN

(By Donald E. Wray)

[Article in American Journal of Sociology, vol. LIV, No. 4, January, 1949, p. 298. Reproduced with permission by the Foreman's Association of America]

The industrial foreman today does not not share in the decision-making process which is the core of managerial functions. He is instead a transmitter of decisions which have been made by his superiors, yet the tradition definition of the foreman's position and the current stated norms are based on the assumption that he has decision-making power. The disparity between expectation and experience produces personal conflict and disruption of managerial organization. The size of industrial units seems of less importance in producing this marginal situation than does the concentration of decision-making in top management and the imposition on foremen of rules made jointly by top management and worker unions.

In the voluminous literature on first-line supervision in industry, there are two major concepts which have been used repeatedly in sociological writing in the technical literature of personnel and business administration. The first is that the supervisor or foreman as the first point in a clear-cut line of authority extending from the worker to the highest executive, thus playing the part of the key men of management, the firing line in union-management relations, and the most important link between management and the worker. This concept, variously expressed, rests on the assumption of a unitary system of control and two-way communication; it is at once an ideal and an assumed norm of industrial organization. It minimizes or ignores the impact of managerial specialization and worker unionization.

A second concept, arising from interest in deviations from the normative line concept, views the first-line supervisor as the man in the middle. Emphasis is placed on the fact that first-level management is subject to two sets of demands which are frequently in conflict; the foreman must satisfy both top management and his work force, which is usually organized. The man-in-the-middle interpretation is historical in that it stresses the progressive limitations placed on foremen through the growth of managerial specialization and the increasing pressure of worker unions. Supervision is considered as still within the traditional line organization but operating under severe restrictions.

It is the purpose of this paper to reexamine these interpretations and to suggest an alternative formulation of the position of industrial foremen. Neither concept seems to describe the functions and informal interpretations of supervision which the writer has observed in a number of factories. A few circumstances appear to be of major importance in understanding the role of first-line supervisors: the locus of the decision-making or managerial function; the focal points of union-management and employer-employee relations; the significance of size and complexity in management organization. The last-named has often been used to explain the decline in importance of the foreman in large-scale manufacturing enterprise. Many levels of supervision and the presence of many specialized staff departments restrict the power and authority of the foreman; they also tend to make relationships impersonal and indirect. The converse of this theory would be that foremen in smaller, less formal structures retain their broad powers over shop affairs and therefore are of considerable importance in managerial activity and in worker-management relations.

Unionization of the rank an file is commonly regarded as further limiting the supervisor's freedom of action and as setting up a type of relation between worker and management which parallels, and often conflicts with, the relationship established through the "line." Top management generally takes the position that, in the presence of a union, the foreman is still the primary representative of management, especially with reference to management policy and grievance procedure.

The role of foremen in managerial activity has been the subject of much discussion in recent years. Top management holds that the foreman plays an important part in decision-making, while the Foremen's Association of America states that foremen are mere representatives of management and have no power to make decisions. Restated, the question is whether foremen are active participants in managerial decision-making activity or are simply transmitters of these decisions. Here again the size of a given organization has been considered important, on the assumption that, with increased numbers of persons and a lengthened "line" organization, the share of foremen in decisions will be made smaller. Here, too, the converse would seem to be that, the smaller the organization, the greater the degree of integration of supervisors with active management.

Two cases are presented which afford comparison between a formalized plant with staff specialization and a small factory with a minimum of departmentalization. They are representative of many other factories and are not unusual in the degree of management specialization, efficiency, or disorganization, nor are they instances of exaggerated union-management cooperation or conflict.

Both cases were observed in their day-to-day operations over several months to ascertain the actual patterns of behavior of supervisors, union officials, and top management.

The first is a plant which is part of a network of factories operated by a single company. While it had only 600 employees, it was highly formalized, and staff functions were well developed, so that it possessed the organizational characteristics of larger factories. There were five levels of supervision: general manager, department manager, department superintendent, foreman, and assistant foreman. Operations were highly mechanized, and the flow of materials between departments required good coordination. Consequently the work schedules and techniques demanded planning and engineering.

The rank-and-file union had a company-wide contract with local supplementary agreements. Daily contact between union and management occurred through the grievance process and through a union-management committee which met every 2 weeks. Grievances supposedly started with the foreman and passed to higher levels. In practice, the foreman usually sent a grievance directly to his department superintendent, since "there is no point in bothering with something you can't do anything about." The foremen did handle requests for information, requisitions for equipment, and some personal matters.

Grievances which required technical or policy statements were passed on by department superintendents to department managers and then to the union-management committee. This body included department managers, the personnel director, and occasionally another staff head, and the union stewards and officials. In the committee, grievances were settled and plant policies and plans were developed and interpreted. All union representatives had first-hand knowledge of committee decisions and were active participants; no foreman had ever attended, and department superintendents came only rarely.

The foremen entered into hiring and firing only through the reports they made of worker performance; the power lay in the department superintendent and the personnel department. The supervisors kept records on productions and worker assignment and had little other function.

The second example is a small factory of 75 employees, run by an owner-manager who personified the functions of management. Rudimentary staff activities were performed by a small clerical force which had no real specialized authority. Supervision below the manager was vested in a shop manager and first-line supervisors. Organization, policies, and communication were less formalized than in the first case, though the line concept was present. The concentration of management functions in one person not only eliminate staff departments but reduced the amount of authority delegated to the line.

The union-management relation was defined in an industry-wide contract written by the international union and a manufacturer's association, with local supplements. Grievances and policy discussions were taken up by stewards and officers of the union with the owner-manager and occasionally with the shop manager. The supervisors were not included in any negotiations and were considered unimportant by both parties. The workers and their representatives looked on supervisors as either well-meaning people who had no power or as troublemakers who could be "straightened out" by consultation with top management.

The supervisors were limited to training, checking on work flow, reporting operating procedures, and keeping the necessary records. Hiring and firing and disciplinary problems were handled by the shop manager.

Comparing these two cases, it seems that in neither instance did the first-line supervisors enter into decision-making. In the larger factory, managerial activity was vested in the higher levels of supervision in combination with the heads of various staff units. In the small factory, the concentration of authority in one person led naturally to the exclusion of the supervisors. In both cases the foremen were reduced to the role of transmitter or interpreter to the rank and file. The significance of specialization as an element in reducing the power of supervisors has been fully recognized, but the concentrated authority of the owner-manager in small organizations has not been sufficiently emphasized. This tendency appears to counteract the relative absence of staff controls and is just as effective in relegating supervisors to a nonmanagerial position. The locus of decision making lies either in the owner-manager (in the small enterprise) or in a group of higher-level supervisors in the large organizations.

In each case the contribution of the foreman to union-management relations appears to be a passive one. The real issues are settled between union representatives and higher management, and the foreman is expected simply to conform to the joint decisions of these representatives. In both cases, the foreman is subject to pressure from either union or management; but, ultimately, when agreement is reached, he must follow the joint decision. Action by an individual foreman, which is rejected by workers is viewed, not as a threat to union-management relations, but as a problem to be settled by joint deliberation of union and management representatives—unless it is taken up to illustrate a general issue. The foreman must be viewed as the recipient of union-management agreement or conflict rather than as a positive contributor to union-management relations. This passivity differs sharply from the traditional assumption that the foreman is an active force in determining this relation.

In both these instances the workers were organized. It is likely that, in cases where the rank and file are not organized, the foreman can play a more important role in employer-employee affairs. In the absence of a union, the relation between worker and management resembles the personnel relation, and the foreman can implement personnel policies with considerable freedom. Under these circumstances, first-line supervision can be of great importance in deciding employer-employee relations. Where unionization has occurred, however, the foreman cannot exert much influence on the bargaining relation, though he may implement some personnel policies. Here he is usually limited by the direct activitiy of the personnel department.

Since the general pattern of union-management relations and in many cases the day-to-day differences are settled by top management without the inclusion of first-line supervisors, it seems that it is entirely erroneous to view the foreman as the key man in this relation. He is rather a person who enters secondarily as the implementor of policies which have already been decided, and his success or failure depends on his ability to act on them, instead of on his own positive actions. Any deviation from union-management decisions will bring forth censure from one or both sides, but in no case can the supervisor himself enter into the formulation of the rules under which he works. This activity is vested in the union officials and higher management. The supervisor gets criticism from both management and union, but he is pushed aside when decisions are to be made.

It is also important to note that in larger organizations the decision-making function tends to reside, not in any line supervisor but in a group of persons representing the various specialized functions of management. In many cases this entire group meets when union-management negotiations are to take place. The simple unitary line breaks down and is replaced by a committee type of organization. This same tendency has been noted at the foreman level and was deliberately arranged by Fayol in his famous experiment with "functional foremen." First-level supervision still in most cases requires the coordination of several functions; this is more effectively and efficiently accomplished by one person than by several. However, it is questionable whether the functions which are so correlated are any more important than those which might be delegated to any minor staff employee. In many instances it seems that the lowest line supervisor is of no greater importance than many staff members; in other words, the first level of supervision is no longer a position of special importance.

This discussion suggests that neither the conception of the foreman which insists that he is an integral part of the "line" nor the suggestive phrase "the man in the middle" indicates accurately the nature of the difficulties of his position. The foreman, as is shown in these two instances, is less than a full member of the management lines; he shares with those higher up the responsibility for carrying out policies but does not share in the making of them. Furthermore, his position differs from theirs in that those higher up give orders to people who are identified with management, while the essence of the foreman's job is that he must transmit them to people who are clearly not of management. In short, the position of foreman has some of the characteristics of management positions but lacks other crucial ones. Such marginal positions are common in society, and there is reason to believe that they are especially difficult to occupy effectively and with peace of mind. With respect to management, the foreman's position is peripheral rather than in the middle. The poor fellow is in the middle, of course, in the sense that a person may be the middle one of three in bed; he gets it from both sides.

It is characteristic of such marginal positions that the people who occupy them consider that they are special victims of the disparity between social norms and social reality. Foremen express this in the phrase "They say we are part of management, but they don't treat us that way." The implication is that they feel pressed to live up to the role of members of management, without being given the reward of full participation. This is a common feeling of people in minority or marginal positions. It presents them with a dilemma which results in a good deal of personal conflict. Sometimes they attempt to solve the conflict, individually or collectively, by defiantly adopting an alternative role; in the case of the foreman, that of the worker who may organize a union for bargaining with management. In at least one instance known to me, the presentation to foremen of a training course was an important factor in precipitating the organization of a foremen's union. The course emphasized their importance to and identification with management, thereby sharpening the foremen's consciousness of the cleavage between the expected norm held before them and the realities of their experience.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, most employer organizations and individual employers appearing before this committee have pleaded for the retention of that part of the Taft-Hartley Act which would deny the supervisors of this Nation access to the National Labor Relations Board. The Foremen's League for Education, through Mr. Jeffrey, appeared here last week and stated that it represented approximately 250 industrial concerns. Now, his statement does not differ materially from that advanced by most employers in opposition to the different foremen's plans.

I would like to make a comparison, if I may, of the position of the Foreman's Association as against that proposed by the employers. Mr. Jeffrey, in his statement, and I quote in part, said:

> The league is a nonprofit organization organized for the purpose of promoting educational work among the foremen and supervisors.

On page 268 in his testimony[1] he states that his organization is supported by 250 industrial concerns—> and each industry which subscribes for membership is entitled to remain a member on the basis of $100 per year per member.

And on page 271 of his testimony he said:

> Each company may name its president; it may name its vice president or its director of personnel. We make no claim, Mr. Congressman, that the Foremen's League has no members who are not foremen. That is not true.

Now, from this statement, we find that her is an organization composed of presidents, vice presidents, and personnel directors of these industrial concerns, coming before this committee and purporting to represent them, and in the interests of foremen. And, in the name of education, they claim that foremen are not entitled to the privilege of the act.

On page 267 of his statement, he said:

> The Foremen's League takes no interest in any single question other than the compulsory recognition by management of foremen's unions.

We claim that this organization is just a front for the employers in opposition to the lifting of the ban on the right of foremen to have access to the National Labor Relations Board, and they have no right to speak for foremen at all, because foremen are not members of that organization.

I would also like to compare the position of foremen in industry with that of the professional workers, who have the same privileges as other employees before the National Labor Relations Board. Representatives of the Professional Engineering Societies appeared before this committee on March 10. In their statements, they used the language of the Taft-Hartley Act defining the term "professional employee." Section 2 (12) of the Taft-Hartley Act says that the term "professional employee" means:

(a) any employee engaged in work (i) predominantly intellectual and varied in character as opposed to routine mental, manual, mechanical, or physical work; (ii) involving the consistent exercise of discretion and judgment in its performance; (iii) of such a character that the output produced or the result accomplished cannot be standardized in relation to a given period of time; (iv) requiring knowledge of an advanced type in a field of science or learning customarily acquired by a prolonged course of specialized intellectual instruction and study in an institution of higher learning or a hospital, as distinguished from a general academic education or from an apprenticeship or from training in the performance of routine mental, manual, or physical processes; or

(b) any employee, who (i) has completed the courses of specialized intellectual instruction and study described in clause (iv) of paragraph (a), and (ii) is performing related work under the supervision of a professional person to qualify himself to become a professional employee as designed in paragraph (a).

No such high qualifications as that are required of the foreman.

Among the professional employees are such titles as chemists, architects, design engineers, and scientists, and lawyers. And those professionally trained and professional-minded employees come within the coverage of the labor laws.

Now, it is common knowledge throughout industry that professional engineers, architects, and scientists are most appropriately a part of the management team than our supervisors. Their conditions of employment are not regimented like that of supervisors. Their rate of pay is higher than that of foremen prone to union organization—yet foremen are denied coverage of the labor laws.

The sixth paragraph on page 2 of the brief reads as follows:

A fundamental difficulty with the Wagner Act, as it affected professional employees, was that no distinction was made between professional and nonprofessional employees in spite of the fact that their viewpoints and abilities are inherently different and that their conditions of employment cannot be made subject to a common standard.

We agree with this statement; however, foremen's jobs are standardized, yet they are denied the same protection professional employees have under the Taft-Hartley Act. The last paragraph on page 2 reads as follows:

Professional service, even though rendered by an employee, is predominantly intellectual and varied in character. Constant demand exists for originality and creative thought in the solution of problems presented with each new undertaking. Technical skill is only a part of the equipment of a professional person. There is no yardstick by which creative ability can be measured. Individual talents vary and every person possessing a professional attitude constantly strives to expand his knowledge and improve his abilities in his chosen field to the end of personal excellence, personal advancement, and the betterment of his profession. Strict regimentation of professional employees is incompatible with the maintenance of true professional standards.

The Foreman's Association says that it is in complete agreement with this statement for strict regimentation of professional employees is incompatible with the maintenance of true professional standards. Therefore, the position of most professional employees is on a higher level than that of foremen whose job duties are to a great degree standardized.

Paragraph 2 on page 3 of the brief reads as follows:

To attempt application of the same standard of measurement for services of professional men and nonprofessional men is not in the public interest. The output of professional employees cannot be standardized as can that of manual and skilled labor. It cannot be measured in terms such as the number of brick a man should lay in a given number of hours, the number of cubic yards of dirt that should be moved, the square yards of painting, the amount of type to be set, bolts to be placed, feet of conduit to be laid, or in terms of any other similar unit.

This clearly shows that the professional employees enjoy a greater latitude of discretion and prerogatives in respect to hours worked and shop privileges than the foreman whose area of discretion is blueprinted and latitude confined to his division or department.

Paragraph 3 on page 3 of the brief reads as follows:

The productive output of the professional man is largely that of his mind, while that of the nonprofessional depends largely on his manual skill and dexterity. No law by which professional employees and those engaged in routine, mental, mechanical and physical work must conform to the same regulatory pattern is a just law. It is unjust alike to the laborer, to the nonprofessional white-collar worker, to the professional man, to their employers, and to society.

This statement again points out that professional employees' work is not regimented like that of the foremen—yet foremen are denied the protection under labor laws granted to professional employees.

The succeeding paragraph on page 3 reads as follows:

In spite of all this, prior to enactment of the present law, professional employees often were included against their will in heterogeneous groups and compelled to accept representation which they did not desire in collective bargaining procedure. The results were most unsatisfactory. There was serious effect on the morale of the professional employees and generally poor relationships developed between those employees and labor unions and employers."

Even professional-employee groups recognize the regulatory pattern of the nonprofessional worker and the foreman.

The sixth paragraph on page 3 reads as follows:

We accept the principle of collective bargaining as a right of employees, professional and nonprofessional, but we firmly believe that there should not be any submergence of the desires and interests of professional employees. The background, education, training, and work interests of professional employees and nonprofessional employees are inherently divergent. It is futile to expect that a forced grouping of the professional and nonprofessional employees in any plant or organizaion could possibly form an "appropriate bargaining unit." Under the old law and its administration, such plainly inappropriate groupings were made and, by fiat, were declared appropriate. We do not consider that to have been the intent of Congress.

The background, education, training, and work interest of professional employees and nonprofessional employees are inherently divergent. This statement is self-evident, and points up the high qualifications a professional employee must have in order to qualify as such. No such high qualifications are required of the foreman.

Paragraph 1 on page 4 reads as follows:

One of the first cases decided by the NLRB was Matter of Chrysler Corporation (1 N. L. R. B. 164) wherein, in referring to design engineers, the Board said: "It is true that this work requires a considerable degree of skill and more or less imagination. There is nothing, however, peculiarly personal in the relationship between the company and its many hundreds of engineers. They are in no sense executives. The engineers have need of organized strength in common with all wage earners."

This paragraph refers to design engineers, and the National Labor Relations Board found that those engineers have need of organized strength in common with wage earners, and found that they are in no sense executives. Yet it is common knowledge in the industrial field that working conditions of design engineers are at least on a par and generally above those of foremen, and are more closely related to the management team than our supervisors. The rate of pay for design engineers is higher than that paid to foremen.

Paragraph 3 on page 4 reads as follows:

In Black & Decker Electric Company (47 N. L. R. B. 726) the following unit was prescribed: "Employees in the accounting, cashiers, pay roll, cost, sales, service, production, material control, purchasing, personnel, stores, receiving, shipping, experimental, mechanical engineering, and tool and processing engineering departments."

The mechanical engineer in most industries is not prone to unionization, and in many plants foremen work under the jurisdiction of the mechanical engineer—yet the engineer is considered a professional employee and as such is entitled to the benefits and protection of the present labor law, and the tool processor's job duties and rate of pay and general working conditions are on a par with that of a foreman, but the foreman is denied protection under the act.

The eighth paragraph on page 4 of the brief reads as follows:

The early cases also illustrate the difficulty which confronted the Board in attempting to apply standards for classifying professional employees. The original act contained nothing in the way of definition and the various concepts of professionalism naturally had no firm basis. Without a statutory guide, the application of standards for determining professional status wavered according to the individual concepts of the Board member or the examiner and left the professional public in a constant state of uncertainty.

This paragraph illustrates the difficulty which confronted the Board in applying the Wagner Act to professional employees. The same is true with respect to supervisory employees until the Supreme Court decision in the Packard case in March of 1947 which upheld the Board's decision in applying the act to supervisors.

Paragraph 5 on page 5 of the brief reads as follows:

Any misapprehension that the professional sections would be used to deny collective bargaining rights to professional employees was dispelled by the Board in the Lumberman's Mutual Casualty Co. of Chicago case (75 N. L. R. B. 1132) wherein the Board rejected the argument of the employer that a number of attorneys involved were not employees within the meaning of the act because they were professional employees. The Board's opinion clearly stated the opposition principle to be true, stating: "We are of the opinion, therefore, that the mere fact that the attorneys are professional personnel does not preclude them from being employees within the meaning of the act, and entitled to its benefits, and we reject the employer's contention in this respect." Later in the opinion the Board stated: "That the attorneys have a statutory right to self-organization cannot be denied. If doubt ever existed, it has been removed by the * * * act * * * which defines 'professional employees.'"

This paragraph clearly shows that even attorneys are professional employees and as such have a statutory right to self-organization. It is our contention that foremen are in a greater need of a statutory right to self-organization than attorneys. There are approximately 531 Members of Congress in both Houses; of the 531 there are, I believe, 371 attorneys who in the opinion of the citizens of the United States were best qualified to represent them in the Nation's Capital. Now is it conceivable that the 371 attorneys, prior to their election of last November, were in a greater need of a statutory right to self-organization than shop foremen. It is our contention they were not.

On page 6, paragraphs 1 and 2, read as follows:

To the same effect in Worthing Pump & Machinery Corp. case (75 N. L. R. B. 80) in which the Board states: "* * * the statute itself refutes the respondents contention that employees like the ones in question are to be deprived of employee status because of the nature of their duties. * * *"

These cases effectively dispose of any contention that the collective bargaining rights of professional employees will be destroyed or diminished. In fact, the Board now has ample statutory authority to confirm its position. Likewise disposed of is the misconception that the provisions will operate to the undue advantage of employers. The above cases clearly indicate that although the employers opposed collective bargaining rights for the professional employees, the Board had no difficulty in applying the act to support such rights.

These statements should refute the misconception about applying the labor laws to foremen.

On page 7, paragraph 5 reads as follows:

The professional provisions have not operated to the advantage of the employer or to the disadvantage of nonprofessional labor organizations. The rights of the professional employees have been fully protected and their actual bargaining strength greatly enhanced. As distinguished from "splinterization," the professional sections have instituted a proper and workable solution to the problem posed by employee organizations containing divergent elements.

The rights of professional employees have been fully protected—their actual bargaining strength enhanced. The same statement is applicable to supervisors without operating to the advantage or disadvantage of the employer.

Mr. Chairman, at this time I would like for Mr. McNally, a former foreman of the Murray Corp., to make a statement about the Murray foremen.

Mr. BAILEY. The Chair would like to ask you at this time to hurry along with your presentation, because there may be questions that some of the members of the committee would like to ask. So be as brief as possible.

TESTIMONY OF WALTER McNALLY, WYANDOTTE, MICH., FORMER FOREMAN, MURRAY CORP. OF AMERICA

Mr. MCNALLY. Mr. Chairman and members of the congressional committee, my name is Walter McNally. I am from Wyandotte, Mich. I was a supervisory employee for the Murray Corp. of America from 1935 to 1943. Today I am a shoe retailer. I know whereof I speak, because I am constantly informed of the happenings at Murray by members of management, supervisors and labor and present employees who are my friends.

Last week a man testified before this committee that the supervisory employees of the Murray Corp. of America had nothing to gain through membership in a foremen's union. The person who so testified has presented a completely false account of conditions at the Murray Corp. of America, and I am asking that his testimony be regarded by you for what it is: The words of Murray management presented to you by one of its "Charlie McCarthys"; a man who cannot call his soul his own; a little man, living in a fool's paradise of false security.

I am here because no Murray foreman would dare sit here and tell you the honest facts. Any foreman so doing would be signing his own "pink slip." A foreman daring to tell the truth would be fired immediately. I know this personally, because it happened to me in 1943, after testifying before the House Committee on Military Affairs regarding Howard Smith's bill which would have outlawed foremen's unions.

Please understand that the problem of salary is not to be argued. Murray foremen are among the highest paid in industry today. The salary problem was solved for all Murray foremen, in all of the corporation's plants, when the supervisory employees of the Ecorse, Mich., plant of the Murray Corp. of America successfully organized in 1942.

The problems today of Murray foremen other than salary are the same as those that caused their organizing efforts in 1942—at least as bad—perhaps worse. But the good foremen at Murray today can not successfully organize to correct the existing bad conditions because of limitations put on foremen's unions by the Taft-Hartley Act and the methodical firing of all foremen who potentially could lead such a union.

Many of my friends, well qualified in their particular line of work, have been fired—fired unjustly and replaced by men who would be the humble servants of Murray management, such as the little fellow who testified last week. Here is a partial list of able foremen who have been fired or demoted, solely for the reason that they favored unionization:

Frank Balcom, a very fine supervisor and so regarded by the company until he succeeeded me as president of the foremen's union; Harry Futrell, another able production foreman who was fired after succeeding Balcom as president of the foremen's union; and then systematically the Murray management fired Kenneth Jacobson, Gerald McIntyre, Andrew Archibald, Gobel Hubbard, Harry Hrdlicka, William Allen, Jack Scherer, LeRoy Listan, Vincent Crooks, George Kesler, and others whom I cannot recall at this time. Many of these served the company well.

Mr. Bailey. May I, for the benefit of the committee, explain that under the rules of the House, this committee cannot continue to function while the House is in session in the Committee of the Whole considering legislation. We will have to discontinue the hearing. We have a roll call. It is necessary that the members of the committee go to the floor. So the committee will stand in recess until 2:15. If the gentleman cares to present the rest of his statement for inclusion in the record, we will accept it.

Mr. McNally. You will resume at 2:15, then?

Mr. Bailey. We are resuming at 2:15.

Now, may the Chair inquire whether there are any other presentations from your group, other than Mr. McNally's?

Mr. Brown. Yes. Mr. Phillips has a statement to make.

Mr. Phillips. It will take 6 minutes.

Mr. McNally. Mine will take only about two more minutes.

Mr. Bailey. We will resume the hearing, then, at 2:15 p. m. The committee will stand in recess until that time.

(Whereupon, at 12:25 p. m., the subcommittee recessed until 2:15 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(Pursuant to recess, the subcommittee reconvened at 2:30 p. m.)

Mr. Bailey. The subcommittee will be in order.

At this time the committee will resume hearing Carl Brown, president of the Foreman's Association of America and his associates.

I believe one of the gentlemen was reading from a manuscript when the committee recessed.

TESTIMONY OF WALTER McNALLY—Continued

Mr. McNALLY. I will take up where I left off, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. You may proceed.

Mr. McNALLY. I had just finished giving the names, individually, of the men who were fired by the Murray management, and there were others whom I cannot recall at this time.

Many of these had served the company well for over 20 years.

There were only 65 of us in 1942; not many of those top-flight supervisors are left now at Murray-Ecorse. The cruel ruthless Murray management has pretty well taken care of them. These fired foremen were invariably replaced by men from the outside—none of whom had any previous experience or knowledge in the manufacture of automobile frames. Murray hasn't fired all of the foremen who were members of our organization, but I do predict they will all be let go just as rapidly as the outsiders can be trained to run their jobs.

Why is Murray firing the old foremen and replacing them with inexperienced, inefficient help? The answer is that Murray, along with other parts suppliers and auto manufacturers, generally have set down a policy that they will have nothing to do with a foreman's union. These old foremen are union-minded.

When the Murray-Ecorse Supervisors' Association was accepted by the corporation as the bargaining agent for its foremen in all matters pertaining to rates of pay and working conditions harmonious relationships were enjoyed universally throughout the plant.

Foremen who prior to unionization had not been cooperative became helpful to one another; the workers under the foremen took a completely different attitude toward us, and became trusting, rather than distrustful and suspicious; management, too, assumed a new attitude; and wholly the atmosphere was cleansed of the treachery and political intrigue which had existed and been the prime factors in determining promotions, demotions, and firings. These are the facts, contrary to the mouthings of the Murray management and its spokesmen.

The Taft-Hartley Act made it possible for the foremen's union to be smashed, and now the corporation has returned to the old system of political alliance in determining who shall and who shall not be given honest, proper demotion or promotion. As an illustration, one of the general foremen states—

> Now I've got seven new foremen under me, each backbiting and stabbing the other in the back; my department record is bad; I could have complete efficiency if I only had two of my old foremen back.

The Murray mouthpiece who appeared last week before you asked how he could maintain discipline and production standards if he was in the same union with his subforemen. Let me answer by saying I had many more foremen working under me than he has, and we had efficiency, we had discipline, we had everything that makes job performance easy; knowledge, ability, and cooperation. He will never get that under the system he so weakly has subscribed to. He said he manages his department. Why, that poor fellow has no more knowledge of dollar distribution than the lowest laborer under him.

Gentlemen, I could continue a long time on the fallacies of management's proposal that foremen should not be given the same rights granted all Americans under the Constitution, but time is short and time is valuable. I honestly urge you, you who have the power to change the laws and give these foremen their freedom, free them from fear of their jobs; give them the same rights allowed any other group. The past Congress took these rights away by passage of the unfair Taft-Hartley Act. You can correct the injustice which the Eightieth Congress performed.

Thank you.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe one of the other gentlemen has a presentation?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to preface my remarks by saying the only reason I am here is because Mr. Herman L. Weckler, vice president and director of the Chrysler Corp., has recently broadcast a statement in which he claims to have submitted to both the Senate and House Labor Committees.

My membership insisted that I come down in my own humble way and endeavor to answer the statement of Mr. Weckler as to what the true position of foremen is in industry today.

TESTIMONY OF GEORGE C. PHILLIPS, FOREMAN, CHRYSLER CORP., DETROIT, MICH.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, my name is George C. Phillips; I am a foreman in the Dodge Division of Chrysler Corp., located in the Detroit metropolitan area, and am first vice president of the Foreman's Association of America.

I left my work in the shop last Friday in order to appear here on behalf of organized foremen, and hope to be able to return to the plant on Tuesday. I have worked in factories since I was 12 years old, and have been with my present employer since 1924, and have been a supervisor since 1933.

Foremen at Dodge Main do not hire their own help—the help is brought in by the employment department. The rate of pay the new employee will receive is determined by the classification in which he is hired. The number of employees assigned to a group is determined by the amount of money allocated by the time study department for the production or assembly of a given number of pieces. The equipment to be used in manufacturing or assembling the product is determined by plant engineering. The tools to be used are specified by the master mechanics' department. Quality standards are controlled by the inspection department. The final interpretation of the contract between the employer and employees, other than supervisors, is the function of the labor relations department.

It will be readily seen from the foregoing that the foreman in carrying out his numerous responsibilities is compelled to meet many conditions which he has little, if any, part in setting up. He may not hire the men or women needed but he is responsible for their training and behavior. He may after a reasonable trial recommend that they are unsuited for the type of work in his group or department. He does not have any part in setting up schedules but he must meet them. He does not set the wages of the worker or the price allowed for making or assembling the product, but he is responsible for reconciling the two factors in terms of efficiency. In other words though, wages and salaries are fixed quantities. The mass-production foreman is practically operating on a piecework basis.

The foreman must endeavor at all times to keep his people satisfied under, or should I say despite, conditions which he had no hand in setting up. He must report equipment failures and tool wear, check his working area for air, steam, or water leaks, keep absentee records of his people, keep a daily absentee chart, make a daily efficiency report and a weekly absentee report. He may discipline his people in a manner prescribed by others, usually the labor relations department.

Though the foreman does not control quality standards, he must maintain them. As an agent of management, the foreman fulfills his many responsibilities and through cooperation with other foremen usually meets most, if not all, of the varied requirements of management. In a large mass-production plant, cooperation is essential to the success of the undertaking, and it is my experience that since Dodge foremen have been organized, cooperation has increased greatly and benefited both foremen and management.

Much has been made of what is done for foremen by management. Allow me to make a comparison: The rank-and-file workers have access to group insurance and hospitalization at their own expense; they have six paid holidays per year; if they work on a holiday they receive an additional day's pay; they receive 2 weeks' pay in lieu of vacation and may take a vacation if they so desire; they do not receive sick pay and are replaced during their absence, and they have no retirement plan.

Foremen have access to group insurance and hospitalization at their own expense; they have six paid holidays a year; if they work on a holiday they do not receive any additional pay; they receive limited sick pay and are not replaced during their absence—thus after the limited sick pay expires the company is saving their salary. Foremen receive 2 weeks' vacation with pay; they are not replaced while absent—their task is covered in some fashion by other foremen.

Rank-and-file workers receive time and one-half for all overtime, double time for Sunday; foremen are not paid for overtime except Saturday for which day they receive the equivalent of 30 percent of a week's salary, roughly, time and one-half. Foremen do not receive any pay for working Sunday, but are told they may take a day off later on.

Foremen do have a retirement plan to which they subscribe a small amount of the cost; the amount each foreman may receive on retirement varies. In my particular case, if I live to the retirement age of 65 years, I will have been with the corporation 37 years and expect to receive $10 per month.

Much has been said about the prestige and dignity of the foreman's position. These qualities are not conferred by the position, they are inherent in the person and are at times impaired by some unfortunate act of management such as occurred in 1948, when the rank and file were out on strike and foremen were put to work emptying trash from wagons and shoveling it into the incinerator. Incidents of this nature do not help the foremen to command the needed respect of the people who work under them.

Under the Taft-Hartley law foremen have the right to organize, but are denied protection of that right under the law when they attempt to exercise it. I am convinced that foremen must have protection under the law in their efforts to organize in order to take them from under the dark shadow of economic insecurity which ever hangs over them as they go about their daily tasks, knowing deep down in their hearts that should their very livelihood be threatened by the action of management there is no available grievance machinery through which they can seek relief, nor is there any proper court to which they may appeal for redress against any improper action of management.

I will conclude by saying that during my 16 years as a supervisor I have never had reason to believe that I am a part of management—I am an agent thereof. I am convinced that foremen, if given protection under the law for their right to organize in a boni fide foreman's union and bargain collectively with their employers, or matters relating to their own well-being, will prove to employers that organized foremen are a boon to industry, and definitely will not create the chaos so fearfully predicted by the manufacturers' representatives.

I thank you.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Brown, the chairman would like to inquire of you at this time, in view of your position as president of the Foreman's Association of America, do you or your foreman's group desire and need collective bargaining?

Mr. BROWN. That is true, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. To what extent do you have collective bargaining?

Mr. BROWN. It is not widespread, but in spite of the Taft-Hartley Act most of those employers have recognized the association prior to the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act and do recognize it today; and, I think, there is a significant point there inasmuch as no employer recognizing the association as the collective bargaining for their foremen, has appeared before this committee in opposition to lifting the ban on supervisors' right to organize and bargain.

Mr. BAILEY. The opposition to your foremen's union appears to be coming from the large corporations; is that true, in the main?

Mr. BROWN. It is coming from large corporations and from individual employers. However, Kaiser-Frazer Corp. is considered a large corporation, and they recognize us as bargaining agent for their foremen. In fact, if I may, I would like to cite for the record the testimony offered by Mr. Harry Morton, industrial relations counsel for the Kaiser-Frazer Corp., before the Senate Labor Committee last month. It reads as follows:

> I am industrial relations counsel for Mr. Kaiser and for all of the companies which he controls or manages, among them being the Kaiser-Frazer Corp.
> I came here at the request of Mr. Carl Brown, president of the Foreman's Association of America, and not as a prophet, a teacher, or to give you any advice, but solely to tell you in an honest manner just what the relations of our company and his association have been.
> I think the Foreman's Association is entitled to it, and I appear here as a representative of the Kaiser-Frazer Corp. in that respect.
> I have not prepared any statement. Unionized foremen are nothing new to us. We are engaged in quite a varied number of enterprises. One of our earliest was construction, the construction of large dams and bridges. During the war we operated a number of shipyards, aircraft factories, and so on. We still have a lot of various plants in operation. In construction all of our foremen are members of unions, members of particular unions in which the workers were members. During the war in our shipyards, the foremen—that is, the first-line supervision, the lead men—belonged to the union, and the foreman immediately above them likewise belonged to the union. I think it is a well-known fact that during the war we had around 250,000 people in the yards, and we had neither any work stoppage or labor conflicts. The only work stoppage that took place at all was the stoppage which lasted no longer than about an hour, and it was a jurisdictional dispute where a group of employees undertook to organize another union, and it failed.

The first experience we had with the Foreman's Association of America was at the aircraft factory known as Kaiser Fleetwings at Bristol, Pa. The Foreman's Association was certified by the Board.

We contested before the Board the inclusion of general foremen in the certification. The Board did certify general foremen, as well as foremen. We have never formalized a contract with Kaiser Fleetwings. We have gone along from the time of the certification until now on an exchange of letters of understanding. We have never had a dispute, and we have never had a difference of opinion.

The next experience that we had with the Foreman's Association was when the National Labor Relations Board on October 14, 1948, certified the association as the representative of foremen and general foremen at the Willow Run plant. At Willow Run at peak, we had 500 foremen—540 foremen, and general foremen, and we have now 375, the balance being temporarily laid off. We negotiated our first contract on December 2, 1946. That contract does not contain——

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to say to the gentleman at this time that you are talking on my time, now, you know.

Mr. BROWN. I am sorry.

Mr. BAILEY. I have one more question to ask you, and my time is just about up.

Mr. BROWN. I am sorry. I did not realize that.

Mr. BAILEY. Can unions composed solely of foremen be effective in dealing with their employers?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, that has been our experience, Mr. Chairman. It has been said that unions of solely foremen cannot be effective without the aid of other unions. That has not been our experience. We are an independent association composed solely of supervisors, and are in no way affiliated with any other union, and we have been able to negotiate equitable working conditions with the employers who recognize our association.

Mr. BAILEY. Your trouble appears to be that you do not have any recognition, or do not get any recognition from the National Labor Relations Board: is that true?

Mr. BROWN. The Board is prohibited under the Taft-Hartley Act from handling any of our complaints, either representation cases or unfair labor practices.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe that is all.

Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. I will yield you some time, Mr. Chairman, if you want it.

Mr. BAILEY. Go ahead, if you have some questions.

Mr. JACOBS. I do not know whether I understood the gentleman correctly, or not.

What did you say your pension would be after you had worked for what? 37 years?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I expect to receive $10 per month. That is the language of my statement.

Mr. JACOBS. What company do you work for?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Chrysler Corp.

Mr. JACOBS. How many foremen are there in Chrysler Co.?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I would say they have 3,000 foremen in the country, and in the plant in which I work there are over 700.

Mr. JACOBS. When did this pension arrangement first obtain?

Mr. PHILLIPS. It has been going on for some time and, I believe, historically was established after the death of Walter P. Chrysler, who left in trust a certain sum of money to be devoted for that purpose.

Mr. JACOBS. Did you bargain on that?

Mr. PHILLIPS. No.

Mr. JACOBS. When did you hire to Chrysler?

Mr. PHILLIPS. 1924.

Mr. JACOBS. Was anything said about a pension at that time?

Mr. PHILLIPS. No. I hired as a worker at that time. I was placed on supervision in 1933.

Mr. JACOBS. Was there anything said about a pension at that time?

Mr. PHILLIPS. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Has Chrysler ever recognized the Foreman's Association?

Mr. PHILLIPS. Only by remote control.

Mr. JACOBS. What is the relative pay of your highest 10 percent production workers, as compared with your lowest 10 percent of foremen?

Mr. PHILLIPS. The Chrysler formula establishing the pay of the lowest level of supervision, according to Mr. Herman Weckler, was that they shall receive not less than 25 percent more per hour than the lowest of the group which he supervises; not the highest man.

In my group it is $1.56 an hour.

Mr. JACOBS. So you get 25 percent more than $1.56?

Mr. PHILLIPS. That is straight time: yes. Pardon me, mine is not straight time; it is on a salary basis, but if you are absent for any other reason except an excused reason then they break it down on an hourly basis of 2,080 hours per year.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Brown, do you know how many foremen there are in General Electric?

Mr. BROWN. I do not know the exact figure, but in the plants that are organized, in which we are familiar with the ratio of foremen to employees supervised by the foremen, is about 1 to 20 and, I think, that the figure for General Electric would run perhaps around 7,000, because of the fact they employ about 20,000 more employees than the Ford Motor Car Co. does, and they have 6,500 foremen.

Mr. JACOBS. The reason I asked is because the General Electric has a questionnaire out, and I wrote and asked them a number of questions, and among the questions I asked them was how many foremen they had, and the answer I got stated, "It is true that in some of our plants there are a large number of foremen."

That is the only answer I got. I just thought you could give me some information.

Mr. BROWN. I believe 7,000 would be a fair figure.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Velde?

Mr. VELDE. I am sorry I was not here to hear your testimony, Mr. Brown.

How many members are there in your association?

Mr. BROWN. In good standing, today, I would say there are 20,000 members. I do not have it up to date, or I do not have the up-to-date report, but I believe that would be within a few hundred either way, of 20,000.

Mr. VELDE. Are those all foremen at the present time, and hold jobs as foremen?

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. VELDE. Do you know how many there are, the total number of foremen in the country?

Mr. BROWN. I would say there are in excess of 2,000,000 that are not part of management.

Mr. VELDE. When you say they are not part of management, do you mean that in your organization they are the only ones that are not part of management?

Mr. BROWN. Not our organization, no; maybe I do not understand your question.

Mr. VELDE. You claim to be a part of management?

Mr. BROWN. I mean this, that the supervisors that we represent, and who belong to union organization, are supervisors whose jobs are blueprinted for them, and they have no job in formulating policy. They act the same as a traffic cop does, just carrying out the rules.

Mr. VELDE. But there are some—and I think you said chiefly in the smaller plants—who are actually a part of management?

Mr. BROWN. If they are, they are not eligible for membership in our organization.

Mr. VELDE. How do you distinguish those who are eligible and those who are not eligible?

Mr. BROWN. Because any supervisor who has the authority to assist in formulating the employer policy is not eligible for membership in our organization.

Mr. VELDE. You mentioned the Taft-Hartley Act prevents the organization of foremen. You are in favor of lifting that preventive measure so that foremen could organize and become subject to collective bargaining?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, with the same access to the National Labor Relations Board as other groups of employees.

Mr. VELDE. Do any of you gentlemen hold a card with either the CIO or the AFL unions?

Mr. BROWN. I do not, and I do not know any member of the association who does. At one time I was a member of the UAW-CIO, and when I was promoted to supervision I immediately took a withdrawal card.

Mr. VELDE. What are your wages as compared to the highest union man in your plant?

Mr. BROWN. I do not happen to be working in the plant. I work for the association, but our records——

Mr. VELDE. I do not mean to ask you particularly. Any of the other gentlemen could answer.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I can only give you the figures for my own plant. I would not undertake to give you the figures as to what Ford Motor Car pays. The Chrysler formula of the lowest level of supervision is they shall be paid not less than 25 percent more than the weighted average of the group, as I explained to Mr. Jacobs.

In other words, we have a range from $1.55 to $1.65, within the structure of my particular group.

Mr. VELDE. Is that on an hourly basis?

Mr. PHILLIPS. That is on an hourly basis. Of course, I am paid on salary, but that is the way my differential between the hourly rates and my salary is computed.

Mr. VELDE. Would you have any purpose in mind of organizing to get higher wages, or what would be your purpose in desiring to organize?

Mr. PHILLIPS. That would be one reason, and one reason only. The chief reason in my mind, and at my age, is that I would like to have some feeling of security in my position.

Mr. VELDE. We cannot blame you for that. We all want that. But you would not be able to retain any of the rights of management and become a part of management.

Mr. PHILLIPS. No, I would not.

Mr. VELDE. I think that is all.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Chairman, if I may, just to enlarge a little bit on the question you asked about the differential in pay received by the lowest level of supervision, and the people that they supervise:

Our records show that the Chrysler's first level of supervision receives a much higher differential than the average is for other foremen in other industries in other plants. In some cases where overtime is worked, while the foremen work the same amount of hours as the people they supervise, because of the overtime paid to the people that the foremen supervise they receive more take-home pay than the foremen do.

Mr. VELDE. Is that true in very many cases?

Mr. BROWN. That is true in several cases, yes, that we know of.

Mr. VELDE. Do you have any specific examples?

Mr. BROWN. Yes, one happens to be the Midland Steel Corp. of Detroit. Up until about 2 months ago the foremen there were on hourly rates, the same as the people they supervised, and they got anywhere from 10 to 25 cents an hour more than the people they supervised, but recently they have been placed on a salary.

Now, when they work Saturdays and Sundays the foremen get no extra pay, but the people they are supervising get the overtime pay, which makes the take-home pay at the end of the week much greater than the foremen.

Mr. VELDE. I think that is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. I wanted to ask just one question.

I notice you say here:

> By sanction of the Taft-Hartley Act employers have wiped out most of the gains made by foremen under the Wagner Act, and most employers in mass-production industries are now imposing similar unreasonable conditions of employment upon their foremen as were imposed upon other groups of employees prior to enactment of the Wagner Act in 1935.

Would you mind enumerating those conditions?

Mr. BROWN. One of them I mentioned here is that foremen are now being required to work overtime through the week, on Saturdays and on Sundays, and at no additional pay. They get the same salary as if they were working the straight 5-day week, and another thing, employers are discriminating——

Mr. MCCONNELL. The Wagner Act corrected the condition you are speaking of?

Mr. BROWN. In this respect, that foremen under that act had the right to organize and bargain with their employer, and under the Taft-Hartley Act foremen do not have any access to the National Labor Relations Board, either on representation cases or on unfair labor practices.

Section 14 (a) of the act—while it has been quoted time and time again—at least part of that section, which says:

> Nothing herein shall prohibit any individual employed as a supervisor from becoming or remaining a member of a labor organization—but they stop here, and it says:

> but no employer subject to this act shall be compelled to deem individuals defined herein as supervisors as employees for the purpose of any law, either national or local, relating to collective bargaining.

That has been determined by the courts. That was the intent of Congress, that the employers discriminate against foremen because of exercising their right to become members of a labor organization, and that happened in the Edward G. Budd Manufacturing Co. case before the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals (169 H–22 571), and I quote, in part:

> We believe it is clear that Congress intended by the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act that employers be free in the future to discharge supervisors for joining a union, and to interfere with their union activities.

And since that time employers have stepped up their activities in demoting or discharging or otherwise committing adverse acts affecting supervisors because of their membership and activity in our association.

Mr. McConnell. They are the conditions you refer to here?

Mr. Brown. That is right.

Mr. McConnell. Thank you.

Mr. Bailey. Thank you, gentlemen.

Mr. Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers of America.

You may state your name and affiliation for the record.

TESTIMONY OF JOSEPH A. BEIRNE, PRESIDENT, COMMUNICATIONS WORKERS OF AMERICA

Mr. Beirne. The name is Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers of America.

In conformity with the committee's rules I have submitted a statement which I do not intend to read, but which I will summarize for the committee.

The Communications Workers of America is the dominant labor union in the communications field, having a membership of 175,000 members, and representing telephone workers to the extent of some 230,000.

Our membership is scattered all over the United States, and I dare say in the communities from which all of you gentlemen come there are telephone workers who, in whole or in part, belong to the CWA. We represent all branches of the telephone industry.

We understand that this hearing is for the purpose of securing testimony and comment on H. R. 2032, and we specifically limited the prepared statement presented to the committee to endorsing the approach and the method employed in H. R. 2032 to restore this Nation's policy in labor-management relations to the philosophy of the Wagner Act, to comment regarding the closed-shop issue, to suggesting additional language to provide equal treatment for independent union organizations in the application of the Labor-Relations Act, and to strengthen the authority and powers of the emergency board created under section 302 of the bill before the committee so as to allow the summoning as additional parties to its proceedings before that Board any company, corporation, labor organization, or individual, which appears to control directly or indirectly, or to be responsible, in whole or in part, for the policies, activities and decisions of any of the parties to the dispute through ownership, stock ownership, stock control, membership, association, affiliation, or any other similar devices or agreements.

I would like to spend most of my time commenting upon the improvement we suggest as to the authority of the Emergency Board created in section 302.

Although we would like to see the Congress adopt what has been called by the press "the administration's proposal," we fear, as the result of having read the newspapers, that it would be rather difficult to expect such a bill to be passed as written. We are hopeful about it being passed as written, but are practical enough to suggest strongly to this committee that if it is not passed in Congress as written that more than passing consideration be given to our proposal to strengthen the Emergency Board.

Sorrowfully, we are led to believe as the result of reading the newspapers, that the Republicans—who have demonstrated in past Congresses what I consider to be the foe of the American people—are able to put across at least in the public press the kind of ideas which we have found out as the result of a survey of our own membership; and is being more than passingly considered by the average citizen, and we feel that the folks who won the election last year have not been as active or as persuasive in getting across the facts surrounding the Labor-Management Relations Act to the public.

We recommend strongly if the proposal before Congress is not adopted as written that you consider our proposal, and we will point out a few statistics to this committee which we think are rather impressive, and which we think give us the opportunity to have a pretty fair idea of what the average thoughtful American citizen believes in. And the statistics I would like to quote for the benefit of the committee is that 1 out of every 90 United States employed citizen-worker is employed by the Bell system, and if you exclude Government and agricultural workers, 1 out of every 52 United States workers is employed in the Bell system, and we feel that 1 out of 52 workers is a pretty persuasive number of people.

We feel further that with the turn-over we have in the industry that you cannot turn around very often in these United States without meeting a telephone worker.

Impressive also is the fact that the Bell system is a $10,000,000,000 organization, and has a labor-relations practice of a $10,000,000,000 corporation.

We mention their wealth only to impress upon the committee the fact that the views of the telephone workers, based as they are on actual experience in the industry, should receive more than passing consideration.

I might add also that the particular industry in which our members work is interlocked through corporation directorship with such organizations as the first national bank, the General Electric Co., the Westinghouse Electric Co., the United States Steel Corp., the Chase National Bank, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.

The influence of a company such as the Bell system permeates our agricultural and economic life here in the United States. We feel that the Taft-Hartley Act has produced a state of uncertainty in the labor relations field, and the scope of collective bargaining has been limited by it.

It is our opinion some of the important reasons why the Taft-Hartley Act should be repealed—and we are not one of those who feel that the act should be repealed just because it has the names of Taft and Tartley—is that it places unreasonable restraint on many phases of collective bargaining. The check-off, for example, has been hedged with unnecessary procedural requirements and penalties to the detriment of harmony between labor and management. The law removed the subject of welfare funds from collective bargaining and surrounded it with rigid rules, limiting purposes and administration under penalties including the use of the injunction to prevent violations.

The principles of equity law and the laws of the various States are sufficient to protect such trust funds and the administration thereof without the necessity of the additional limitations imposed by the Taft-Hartley Act.

The Taft-Hartley Act diluted the collective-bargaining power of unions whose contracts provided for reopening on wages during a contract period, by prohibiting strikes for 60 days following the notice of reopening or—and I quote—"until the expiration of such contract, whichever occurs later."

The result of this particular provision in our industry where we have long-term contracts was to expose the telephone workers to negotiating with the gigantic Bell system—as I believe I explained before—without being able to suggest that if a worth-while contract is not forthcoming the workers may wish to exercise their privilege to withdraw their labor, and the result of the application of that law in our industry just last year was to make it necessary for our union to negotiate for more than a 10-month period, and finally accept wages which I am sure the workers would not have accepted had they been able to let the companies properly know their dissatisfaction with the terms the company was able to impose because it had a law to help it.

Following the brief description I gave of the Bell system before, I want to emphasize that that particular organization then needs no law to give it equality and it needs no law to help it in negotiations. I can assure you, after having more than 22 years of service in the industry, that they are big enough and wealthy enough, intelligent enough, ruthless enough in their dealings with their employees, to require no aid from the Congress of the United States.

The Taft-Hartley Act also revived the evils of the labor injunction as an instrument to settle labor disputes. The abuses incident to the use of this legal device have been recognized in the past by Congress and outlawed in the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

The use of the injunction by the Board is made mandatory under the act against unions in unfair labor practice cases involving secondary boycotts, even where the object of the workers is considered to be socially and economically desirable.

The relations between employer and employees are kept in an unsettled and confused condition by the numerous elections provided under the act, and are, namely, representing elections, union-shop elections, and the last offer of the employer. The result is bound to be confusion instead of a condition of stability and confidence which is so necessary to free collective bargaining.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act the employer, even though not faced with conflicting claims for recognition, may petition for an election at a time most advantageous to himself and on the strength of a no-union vote obtain a year's freedom from union organization.

Also, the Taft-Hartley Act denies the right of reinstatement to striking workers, and the right to vote in representation elections, while granting a vote to strikebreakers, to break the strike and oust a union by hiring sufficient nonunion strikebreakers. Such a procedure can never produce stability and free collective bargaining.

The secondary boycott provisions in the Taft-Hartley Act are so broad and extensive as to prohibit activities which are regarded as justifiable for the purpose of protecting the standards of union members in the industry.

These and other objections which might be detailed have the effect of weakening collective bargaining, if not to destroy it altogether in some situations. Situations which, incidentally, the CWA ran into within the last 12 months, a situation which caused one of the divisions to go out of business as a result of management applying provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The CWA is of the opinion that the present ban on the closed shop should be removed, and that the necessity for conducting elections among employees to secure authorization to enter into a union-shop contract, should be eliminated.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding, the attention of the committee is directed to the union security conditions existing in the telephone industry. There are no closed-shop agreements, insofar as we know, but there are a few union-shop agreements with independent companies, but only one, however, with the Bell companies.

There have been a substantial number of contracts providing for maintenance of union dues. The greater portion of the contracts, however, provide only for voluntary dues-deduction systems upon presentation of a proper authorization or assignment by the union member to management.

The provisions of section 8 (a) (3) of the Taft-Hartley Act prohibiting closed shop, and permitting a diluted form of union shop under narrow conditions, go far toward eliminating or denying the union security concept on which labor has to some extent relied for the maintenance of union conditions.

There have been conducted union-shop elections under the Taft-Hartley Act among several divisions of CWA. In some of these elections the union failed to secure the necessary majority vote of all the eligible employees, but did receive in every case more than a majority of the votes cast. This situation points up a curious result under the law, namely, that the requirement for union-shop authorization—meaning a majority of the employees eligible to vote—is stricter than the requirement for designation as bargaining representatives, which only calls for a majority of the votes cast.

The union is authorized to be the bargaining representative, but cannot fully bargain on all matters affecting the terms and conditions of employment, such as a union shop, because of this requirement of authorization by a majority of all the eligible workers in the bargaining unit.

I might say here that within the last year the CWA has had 12 elections on the union-shop question, and 4 of them were lost as a result of the law's requirement; yet, as I mentioned, in the vote—in the 4 which were lost—the great majority of the people who voted, voted in favor of the union shop provision.

We would like to mention, or emphasize to this committee that if changes are made in what is called the administration's proposal, that some thought be given to a continuation of that part of the Taft-Hartley law which provides for equality of treatment of independent unions with AFL and CIO unions.

We respectfully suggest that section 9 and section 10, paragraph (c), of the Taft-Hartley law, be continued in any new proposal that might be made.

Much has been said and written with respect to the merits and objections to industry-wide bargaining. We do not propose at this time to add generally to this picture, but believe that the committee should be informed with respect to the bargaining situation which exists in the telephone industry.

When the expression "the telephone industry" is used, the public immediately thinks of the Bell system or the group of companies associated with the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. The Bell system operates in every State of the Union and enjoys a monopolistic place in the industry. In fact, some 90 percent of the telephone business of the country is enjoyed by the Bell system, leaving the balance of 10 percent to be divided among more than 6,000 small companies unaffiliated with the American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

In the Bell system the basic wages, hours of employment, conditions of employment, pension rights, sickness, disability, and death benefits, operating practices and methods are all controlled by the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. through agreements, stock control, ownership, interlocking directorates, and other monopolistic corporate devices.

The National Telephone Panel, which was established by the War Labor Board and became the National Telephone Commission, had this to say about the Bell system:

> The over-all wage structure of the Bell system reflects the centralized policies of the A. T. & T. Co. The unifying influence of the A. T. & T. appears in the close similarity of most nonrate aspects of the way structures of the various associated Bell companies. Each Bell company, for example, has the same four major operating departments. Further, these same four departments in all companies carry almost identical job or task titles, and task routines. This same unifying influence is evident also in the existing interrelation of Bell system wage rates, not only among departments and specific jobs of each company but, likewise, among the total wage-rate structures of the companies themselves.

I might say that this particular agency of the Government was made up of two representatives of labor, two representatives of industry, one of whom was a vice president in an associated company in the Bell system, and two representatives of the public. The quotation which I have hereinbefore read was unanimously agreed to by the six members of the Telephone Commission.

Even in such local matters as union recognition and union dues deduction authorizations, the control of the A. T. & T. Co. over the Bell system companies is apparent. When the Communications Workers of America succeeded the National Federation of Telephone Workers in 1947, the autonomous local unions affiliated with the national federation became chartered divisions of CWA. It should be explained that the CWA was sponsored by NFTW, its constitution was developed over a period of years by NFTW committees and conventions and it was approved through membership meetings and referenda among the members of the unions affiliated with the NFTW.

The Bell system companies under the direction of the A. T. & T. Co. uniformly refused to recognize the CWA divisions, after the formation of the CWA, as the bargaining representatives of their members and refused to disburse to such divisions the moneys covering dues of their members, which the companies continued to deduct from the wages of the employees under the terms of dues deduction authorizations and assignments of the individual workers pursuant to collective bargaining contracts, until the divisions secured new membership cards or new dues deduction cards. The CWA believed that the position of the Bell companies was erroneous. It was a question of whether to engage in time consuming litigation or to comply with the demand of the Bell companies. Confusion was rampant. Charges and countercharges appeared on every hand. It is a tribute to the telephone workers that they did not succumb to such union-destroying activities, but at great financial cost, sacrifice of personal time and energy, the new cards were obtained. The whole process proved nothing insofar as union representation was concerned and was merely another example of the control of A. T. & T. Co. over the Bell system companies and its paternalistic attitude toward its employees.

This control, however, is not of such character as to divest the individual companies of the Bell system of their corporated identities or of their characters as employers. Each company is recognized in the eyes of the law as an employer even though the discretion of the management of that company is controlled by the parent corporation.

Collective bargaining between our divisions and individual companies of the Bell system has produced the expected results, namely, that no basic change in wages, hours and working conditions are made without the sanction and approval of the company. This condition has resulted in the need for bargaining on a Bell system basis between our union and the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. with respect to matters designated by the local member unions as items for national bargaining.

In 1946, after our local affiliates were unable to secure agreements with the local companies of the Bell System and a Nation-wide strike appeared imminent, national bargaining produced an acceptable agreement and work stoppages were thus prevented.

A few words about the Bell system plan for employees' pension, disability and death benefits will further demonstrate the need for bargaining on a Bell system rather than on a local basis. Each company of the Bell system has its separate plan for employees' pension, disability and death benefits. The provisions and benefits of these several plans are exactly alike and by agreement with the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. must conform with the plan established by the American company,

This means that the individual telephone company cannot change its plan for employees' pension, disability and death benefits unless the change first is made in the plan of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. Local bargaining under such circumstances is futile and productive of industrial unrest.

Local bargaining will produce local disagreements and local work stoppages. In some industries local work stoppages may be insulated from the national or industry picture, but this is not true in the telephone industry. Each community is so inextricably bound up by the wires of the telephone system with other communities that the effect of local work stoppages cannot be confined to any given local area. It is safe to predict that so far as the telephone industry may be concerned, any requirement of law that bargaining must be local will produce less industrial peace and will provoke more service interruptions than industry-wide or national bargaining.

In March 1947, the National Federation of Telephone Workers which was succeeded by the CWA in June 1947, sought to coordinate the bargaining activities of its affiliates under a voluntary policy committee arrangement in an effort to secure some uniformity of wages, hours of employment and other conditions of employment. It was immediately accused of attempting to bargain on a Bell System basis by the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. and the companies associated with the Bell system. No bargaining consequently resulted at either local or national levels. It was necessary for the affiliates of the NFTW and other telephone unions bargaining with companies associated with the A. T. & T. Co. in the Bell system to conduct a strike for a period of some 42 days before new contracts were negotiated.

In 1948 the CWA made no attempt to bargain on a national or system-wide basis. For nearly 10 months its divisions were required to bargain for new contracts. Some divisions succeeded after these many months in reaching agreements, but others have not been successful. The pattern of each conference is the same. The arguments, proposals and stalling tactics reveal the direction and instruction of the centralized management policies of the A. T. & T. Co. A proposal by the management of one company is parroted within 24 hours by the managements of all other companies within the system.

How can there be any real collective bargaining under these conditions unless the unions join together and bargain with the parent company? But the A. T. & T. Co. protests that it is not the employer and bargaining should be carried out at the local company level. How long will the puppet master continue its activities beyond the veil of corporate entities. These are not the cries of a frustrated union, but represent conclusions which are supported by an abundance of factual evidence.

To forbid collective bargaining by law by a labor union on an industry, national, or system basis, or to forbid a labor organization from coordinating, cooperating, or unifying its demands with respect to more than one employer is to perpetuate the corporate control with which we are faced in the Bell system.

The American Telephone & Telegraph Co. will continue to control the discretion of the local telephone companies associated with the Bell system while refusing to bargain on a system basis on national items. Such a situation cannot produce industrial peace, but only chaos or servitude unless the law requires, or at least promotes, national bargaining for integrated industries, such as the Bell system.

We are not at this time attempting to persuade this committee that it should amend the law to provide for industry-wide bargaining, even though we believe it would be desirable in the Bell system, but have stated our experiences as a background for a suggested amendment to the powers granted to the emergency boards created under title III of the bill which is before the committee under "national emergencies."

It is our belief that similar situations with respect to collective bargaining exist in other industrial empires in in this nation and that it would materially aid and assist in the settlement of disputes which are found by the President to constitute a threatened national emergency if the "emergency board" was empowered by law to summon as additional parties to its proceedings those parties, corporations, etc., which control directly or indirectly the policies, activities and decisions of the principal parties to the dispute.

We, therefore, recommend that section 303 of H. R. 2032 be amended by adding thereto subsection (b) which shall provide, as follows:

> Any emergency board appointed under this section, on its own motion or at the request of one of the parties to the dispute, shall summon as additional parties to its proceedings any company, corporation, labor organization or individual which appears to the Board to control, directly or indirectly, or to be responsible, in whole or in part, for the policies, activities and decisions of any of the parties to the dispute through ownership, stock ownership, stock control, membership, association, affiliation, or other similar devices or agreements.

It is our opinion that inclusion of the powers contained in our proposed amendment will better enable an emergency board to find an area of settlement in disputes involving the industrial empires of our Nation.

Further, in connection with the powers of the emergency boards, we endorse the policy which provides that such boards shall not only investigate the dispute, but that they shall explore the area of settlement and give the parties the benefit of their considered disinterested judgment by suggestions for settling the controversy. Such assistance will produce a result based upon free collective bargaining.

We urge that the committee give consideration to our proposal to strengthen the emergency section of H. R. 2032. We say offhand that if the bill as written is not amended or if the amendments are not considered for it, would forego urging the committee to adopt our proposal. However, if amendments are to be contemplated by this committee or other committees or by the House, then we sincerely urge that the committee give full consideration to the proposal we make which would strengthen the act, and which would provide a better area, or field, for collective bargaining.

On behalf of the CWA, I wish to thank this committee for giving us the opportunity to testify.

That concludes my statement.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Beirne, I am not going to attempt to question you on all of the things that you covered in your statement. One thing that intrigues me, and one with which you perhaps have had some experience, is that portion that deals with the "last offer." We had some testimony here from employers previously that they had taken polls or sent out sample ballots on the "last offer." One of them I remember particularly. I think it was 6 weeks or more after the cessation of work. They had rather gratifying results, and the employees, by about 11 to 1, were supposedly anxious to go back to the "last offer."

I want to cite an example that I know about. An employers' association of 400 or 500 members figured in this. A Nation-wide strike, or lock-out, occurred and the employers declined to make any offer. They held to that position for a number of weeks until, through the statements in the press, they were accused of bargaining in bad faith, or not in good faith, and public sentiment, I think, agreed with that. Yet the merchants and people who were losing hundreds of thousands of dollars in sales because these thousands of employees had no purchasing power from wages. Their chamber of commerce or some other trade organization prevailed upon their organization to start bargaining in good faith, so they made an offer of 2½ cents an hour for the unskilled people and 5 cents an hour for the skilled mechanics. And they stuck to their position about 5 days, I believe, and finally the strike, or lock-out, was settled on the basis of 15 cents an hour, which is quite a far cry from their first position of no offer and quite a different situation from their first and last offer, apparently, of 2½ cents and 5 cents an hour.

Their position all through the 50-some days was that after they had finally made the offer of 2½ cents and 5 cents an hour, that was their last offer. The employees were without funds to continue the strike, and I presume if they had sent out such a ballot, or such a poll, that many, many of them would have been forced to accept that last offer of 2½ cents or 5 cents an hour.

However, as I have stated, the thing was settled on the basis of 15 cents an hour. So it seems to me that I remember the position of the telephone workers and the telephone company in their strike 2 years ago, I think it was, where the company stuck pretty consistently to a "last offer" position.

Do you care to enlarge on that?

Mr. Beirne. In the strike that took place, it was in 1947, the general facts you just outlined could apply to the telephone industry. The strike was started on April 7. On April 6, in spite of the good efforts of the Conciliation Service and other interested agencies, every telephone company in the Bell system maintained the position that we were entitled to no increase whatsoever. And everyone of them went one step further and proposed arbitration. Every telephone company throughout the United States advertised in the newspapers their arbitration offer.

We were not reluctant to arbitrate, but we were faced with 26 different arbitration proposals, each one of which came out from a different Bell company and was geared to the various State rate commisions. They wanted to make the State, either through the governor or through the rate commission, a party to the arbitration on wages, a device, which we accused them—and we still sincerely think that they had it in mind, even though they may protest—a device to help them get additional revenues by having their rates increased, and making the State a party to the increase that we would get in wages.

On April 6, the day before we went on strike, they still maintained we were entitled to no wage increase. And 42 days later, the last of the strike in our industry was settled with a 9.5 average increase, with increases that ranged in dollars—the average hourly rate in our industry is not too good a base, because of the hours involved and the different kinds of shifts we have, being a 24-hour-a-day industry. The increases in dollars amounted from $2 to $5 a week.

As you pointed out—and I thoroughly concur in that—after the workers had spent weeks and weeks on strike, the union and the members want to get back and earn a week's pay. To begin with, no worker wants to go on strike. No union wants to go on strike. And after the strike was on for weeks and weeks and weeks, there is a natural reduction, let us say, in the amount of stick-to-itiveness that a worker has. There is a gradual weakening on their part to accept, and after 42 days, if we had not reached the kind of agreement we did reach, which we considered at the time satisfactory, in view of all circumstances, I dare say a company offer of, rather than an average of 9½ cents, an average of 5 cents, might be taken by the workers. To me it would be an unfair approach to the settlement of an industrial problem, because when it comes to establishing a rate of pay, things become either fair or unfair. And in these "last offer" votes that might be sought, you can expect a company, just as with a certification election, to wait until things are ripe for them to make proposals of the kind we are talking about and thereby, I think, deny workers what they are justifiably entitled to as a result of their labor.

Mr. Irving. In other words, a company with the resources of the company you are talking about can economically stand a strike a whole lot longer than the employees, who may or may not have enough savings to keep them going for weeks and months. It is an easy way to break the strike under those conditions, and yet what is indicated by some to be a fair way. They send out and ask members if they want to go back to work on this "last offer," over the better judgment of the union officials who are holding them out against their will—that is the way it would appear. Sometimes dictatorial union leaders do hold the employees off the job when the employees want to go back to work. Those cases are rare however.

Mr. Beirne. I might hasten to say that I still have to find, and I have been in the business of representing workers for 12 consecutive years—that dictatorial labor leader of which you speak. I have heard him mentioned. I have been profoundly impressed with the accusations that I have heard, of the dictatorial power of a labor leader. I still have to meet the first one who has such power. Maybe they do exist. Maybe I did not meet them. I know it is not true in our organization. It is not true in the organizations of men who have jobs like myself that I have had the pleasure of meeting in the last 12 years.

Dictatorial policies and dictatorial practices, so that everyone can get his sights set straight, are on the side of the employer and not on the side of the union. That I can say from experience to be an honest, true, and factual statement.

Mr. IRVING. What I was saying was that that was the reason advocated for putting that "last offer" provision in the present labor law, as I understood it.

Mr. BEIRNE. That is right. It is an improper premise, and therefore the conclusion cannot be anything but improper.

Mr. IRVING. Do I have any more time?

Mr. BAILEY. I will extend you 5 minutes of the time that was reserved, if you care to ask additional questions.

Mr. IRVING. I want to say that the example that I cited was a factual proposition. It was not theoretical or hypothetical. It actually occurred. I want to make that point clear, and I think yours is clear, too. If I remember correctly, you had an offer of $3 a week, or such a matter, and they did not budge from it for a long time, particularly in my district.

Do you have any specific examples of the attitude toward free speech?

Mr. BEIRNE. Yes. I was asked that question by the Senate committee, and I took the time right after testifying before the committee to dig into some of our files, and not get too far away from home, in case there should be some skeptics who would want to check the facts.

Let me make the general statement that when the Wagner Act was amended by the Taft-Hartley Act for the purpose of giving free speech to employers, it was made the kind of issue that no one who would be fair-minded could find any fault with, because everyone wants everyone else in America to have free speech. And I just repeat that a $10,000,000,000 corporation, scattered out as it is throughout the United States, having the kind of impact that it does on our way of life, as you can well see from the statistics I quoted as to its extensiveness, does not need the kind of free speech that permits it to break unions. And I went into our files and found one right here in this territory.

On the occasion of this particular letter that I have in front of me—a letter from the general traffic manager of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. of Baltimore which operates in Maryland—was occasioned by the decision of the union which represented the operators to become a part of the CIO, or a part of the CWA. An NLRB election was scheduled to determine the wishes of the employees in the matter. Shortly before that NLRB election, the general traffic manager, who by virtue of his position has influence in the company, sent out a letter in which he said, among other things—I could read the whole letter if you want, but the nub of his exercise of free speech for the destruction of unions is found in this one sentence, which I will read. This is addressed to all employees. He says:

I hope that all of you will vote, because I believe the majority of the employees in the traffic department—and that was the only department voting—would prefer to have a local union rather than a national union.

Now, in that sentence, of course, he is, to begin with, their boss. And he is telling them, in no uncertain terms, that they should vote for neither the CIO nor the CWA, but keep a nice, chummy local union in existence.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. IRVING. I have one more point.

Mr. BAILEY. I will yield you two more minutes of my time. I just want to ask the gentleman one question. You may have two more minutes.

Mr. IRVING. In presenting the example that I stated, I overlooked to say that the employers formed sort of a closed shop before they came out with this offer of nothing. They got all the members of the association to agree that if anyone violated or broke down, they would forfeit $2,000 apiece. And then they went further than that. They got some of the other companies that were not members of that association to agree to the same thing. Well, they actually had themselves over a barrel, and it was very much of a problem for the employees or the unions representing the employees, because no one wanted to forfeit $2,000 to that group. Nobody wanted to break down, for they did have a closed shop amongst members of their own association, and others from various industries in the territory that were not members of this proposition. That also was exposed through the columns of the newspapers, rather hesitantly, or unwillingly. It took quite a little while to get those facts into the press.

Then, of course, public opinion and the fact that other employers were losing a great deal of money because they could not sell any goods to the people who were not working finally brought about this settlement at 15 cents an hour, which was actually far above the "last offer." The other had been a phoney "last offer." I think that is the case in most of the "last offers."

It seems rather ironical to me that an industry can pay 15 cents an hour finally after first claiming inability to pay anything, only to admit later it is able to pay only 2½ cents an hour. It just seems a whole lot better the other way. I think myself that the strike could have been settled for 9½ cents an hour, or maybe 10 cents an hour, if that had been their offer on the second offer, and the men would have lost very little time, possibly 2 or 3 days. But losing so much time, they could not very well settle for less than what they got, and then perhaps they did not get the amount of loss for a period of a year.

That is all, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Beirne, I was quite interested in the statement you made a moment ago. Were you here this morning when I questioned Mr. Brown?

Mr. BEIRNE. No.

Mr. JACOBS. I was interested in the statement that you made a moment ago that you had never known of a labor union leader who you thought was dictatorial. You live in Baltimore, do you not?

Mr. BEIRNE. No; Chevy Chase, right outside of Washington.

Mr. JACOBS. Chevy Chase. Are you familiar with the difficulties that the carpenters' union had in Baltimore 2 or 3 years ago?

Mr. BEIRNE. I remember reading about it in the newspapers.

Mr. JACOBS. Would you say that where an international union had denied a local union the right to elect officers for a period of 16 years, where the local had frequently petitioned for the right to elect, and where the terms of the contract had never been submitted to the membership vote, but the administrator appointed by the International President made a contract, would you say that was rather high-handed tactics?

Mr. BEIRNE. I would say unqualifiedly, that would be high-handed tactics.

Mr. JACOBS. I happen to be a person who has represented labor quite a bit, and I have run into a number of instances of that kind.

Your organization, I take it, elects its officers.

Mr. BEIRNE. Every 2 years.

Mr. JACOBS. Then after organization, would you have any objection to a provision in the labor law that required the election of officers? It would not affect you any, would it?

Mr. BEIRNE. It would not affect us any. But what I hasten to point out to you is the thought embodied in such an approach would be something like this Communist affidavit. It would be in general about the same kind of thought you now get thrown at you, thinking that anything the administration comes up with will be prolabor, and therefore anticompany.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us look at it this way. I think I can——

Mr. IRVING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACOBS. I will yield to a question.

Mr. IRVING. I wanted to explain when I referred to the dictatorial powers of unions that that was the comment that was made by another witness.

Mr. JACOBS. By another witness.

Mr. IRVING. In regard to this "last offer" proposition. It had nothing to do with elections.

Mr. JACOBS. I understand.

But let us look at it this way. I understand that, in general, the employer has more economic power than the unions. I think we have about 51 companies in this country that have over $1,000,000,000 in assets, the smallest of which is four times the assets of the 32 largest international treasuries of the labor unions. But we do know that an organization of men in a labor union does acquire power that is much greater than that of the individual members. We know that, do we not?

Mr. BEIRNE. Yes. That is usually spelled out in the Constitution.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. The Constitution, under the law, is a contract. Do you not think that if elections are denied local unions, when the Constitution provides for such elections, that then there should be some simple remedy for a local union to get an election and have its own officers rather than to have the head of the national union appoint someone to remain with them, let us say, for a period of 15 to 20 years? Where would that hurt anyone?

Mr. BEIRNE. I can only speculate.

Mr. JACOBS. You have not had experience with those?

Mr. BEIRNE. No, never. Never have I experienced that, and in my speculation it would be hard for me to conceive of a group of workers who were together in a union not being able to get an election of their own officers.

Mr. JACOBS. I think probably with the government of your organization, it would be hard, but yet you may take it from me that those things have occurred. I have litigated those questions myself, and I know that they have occurred. And it seems to me that those unions which operate democratically would certainly have no objections to a provision that the officers should be elected. At least, that is the way it seems to me.

Now, I will go to another subject. You have not had any experience along those lines; so I suppose we cannot develop much that is helpful.

Mr. BEIRNE. My only thought is, sir, that you take a look at the other side of the picture, because putting into the law that the unions must elect their officers is leading to the inference that these unions are the racketeering sort of outfits that do not have democracy in their set-up. And on the other side of the picture, we find, in the Bell system, for example, that at the last stockholders' meeting—now, $10,000,000,000 is a lot of money, and that is your money and my money. If you belong to the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., the Equitable Life, or the Sun Life, part of your money is supporting the Bell system. And there is a lot of American people's money tied up in that. At the last stockholders' meeting, 12,607,000 votes were cast. There were 12,603,000 which were by proxy. That is the one fellow going into his vest pocket and pulling out all the votes that the ward-heeler tells you he has in his vest pocket. He actually pulls them out at the stockholders' meeting. And yet that is all right in our way of doing things, and we do not want to regulate corporations in how they should conduct their elections.

Yet it seems to be all right to suggest that we should have regulations on the elections in a union, whereas in my belief, the functioning of a union in matters of this kind should be left to the members.

Mr. JACOBS. I think we could agree upon this, could we not, that if there are abuses in any type of organization whereby the individual cannot protect his own individual rights, it is all right to regulate them? Do we agree on that, whether it be a corporation or whether it be a union?

Mr. BEIRNE. Yes; we can agree on that very readily, provided we do not get into the field where in order to wipe out a few abuses we put the monkey on the back of the majority, or we put the burden of guilt, I might say, on everybody else's shoulder.

Mr. JACOBS. It is not a question of trying to put the burden of guilt on anyone at all. I think you agreed a moment ago that it would not affect your union, because you do it, anyway; is that not right?

Mr. BEIRNE. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, then, if there are organizations where they do not elect their officers, why would your union object to a provision requiring that they do elect officers?

Mr. BEIRNE. For the same reason that we objected to the requirement for signing a non-Communist affidavit. We were about the first union in the United States to sign that affidavit. From our standpoint, we did not care. We could stand up publicly and say that we are not only not Communists, but will ferret them out and, in a democratic process, try to put them across the barrel so that they wind up where they belong, in the cellar. But we objected to being forced by law to sign that thing. And our objection was based on what actually has happened. The law has planted a seed in the minds of the people of the United States, or some of them, at least, that unions are infiltrated with Communists, and planting that seed was wrong, even though we jumped right in and signed the non-Communist affidavit.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think that the worst thing about your anti-Communist affidavit was that for those unions where all officers did not sign and possibly where they could not all sign, the net effect of it was that they immunized the employer from his unfair labor practices? Do you not think that was the real substantial thing?

Mr. BEIRNE. That was one thing that caused a hardship on workers.

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. BEIRNE. That is, officers taking a position on principle, which I admire them for having taken.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, then, we get back to the matter of democratic elections. You say that there were 4 union security elections lost out of 12, I believe, if I am correct.

Mr. BEIRNE. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. And that was because all the votes that were not cast were cast against the unions during the election, or counted against them.

Mr. BEIRNE. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. But you would have won those four if it had been on a majority of those that voted?

Mr. BEIRNE. Right.

Mr. JACOBS. In that respect, you think it is rather undemocratic?

Mr. BEIRNE. Well, it sets up two standards right within the one law.

Mr. JACOBS. I might not be here today if all the people in my district who did not vote had voted for my opponent.

Mr. BEIRNE. That is right. It is not according to our system. I might say that in Indiana——

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman has one minute of his time left.

Mr. BEIRNE. I might say that Indiana is one of the places where we lost an election, although 58 percent of the people who voted, voted for the union shop.

Mr. JACOBS. Was that in Indianapolis?

Mr. BEIRNE. That was the whole State. We represent all the telephone workers in the State.

Mr. JACOBS. You folks invoked the so-called compulsory arbitration law in Indiana on a couple of occasions?

Mr. BEIRNE. Yes. We invoked it just this year.

Mr. JACOBS. You did not like it?

Mr. BEIRNE. That is a sad experiment for the previous administration of Indiana.

Mr. JACOBS. I understand that it has been used quite a bit as propaganda that you did invoke it, but I understood the reason that you did was that you had no other remedy; is that correct?

Mr. BEIRNE. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Beirne, you have been dealing with the Bell system for a good many years; so I think you could say that as a corporate organizational structure, it is probably the most complicated in the world, is it not?

Mr. BEIRNE. I do not know too much about other corporations, but I know that the Bell system is terribly complex.

Mr. BURKE. I take it from their national advertising, such as the Saturday Evening Post, Life magazine, and so on, though, that it is pretty closely knit, even though it is a pretty complicated organization. I remember on one page it showed pictures of the presidents of the various subsidiary corporations, all on one page, or in one spread, and intended to point up that within this Bell system, this complicated organizational structure, things were pretty rosy as far as advancement was concerned. So the $10,000,000,000 that you speak of can be pretty well charged up as wealth of one corporation, generally; is that not true?

Mr. BEIRNE. It is one corporation: I might point out, I have in front of me a listing of all the companies in the Bell system, and most of the companies are 100 percent owned by the A. T. & T.

Mr. BURKE. I was pretty sure that that was the condition.

Last week, we had some testimony here that, using wealth in number of dollars as a measuring stick for power pointed out that some 32 unions in this country possessed somewhere in excess of $200,000,000, probably, in round figures, we will say, a quarter of a billion dollars. Now, those 32 unions were of all affiliations. And generally you would say there was no financial connection between the independents and the AFL and the CIO, and between the AFL and the CIO itself, or between any of those groups generally. They are not intertwined in a corporate set-up, but are 32 unions. Those are international unions, by the way. And you understand union organization generally. International unions are autonomous so far as the running of their own affairs and setting up of their own treasury are concerned.

This one corporation, then, is in possession of wealth which, if used as the measuring stick of power, as it was used in this testimony last week, is in excess of 40 times the amount of 32 national and international unions put together. That would seem to indicate that the corporate power is still pretty much overbalanced as far as the quality of power between unions and corporations is concerned. Would you not thinks so?

Mr. BEIRNE. If the measuring stick is $1,000,000,000, I would say it would be academic, almost, to argue that they are not in control of anything that might be looked at as being a possible balance. I mean, there is so much control in the corporation that you cannot say there is even a possibility of balance if the dollar sign is the measurement of the control.

Mr. BURKE. The dollar sign was used as the measure of control in this testimony.

Mr. BEIRNE. I can assure this committee that we do not have anything that represents anywhere near a healthy fraction of $10,000,000,000.

Mr. BURKE. Either $10,000,000,000 or $10,000,000?

Mr. BEIRNE. Yes.

Mr. BURKE. Thank you very much.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. WERDEL. No questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Velde?

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Beirne, you made a very interesting statement. At least, I thought you did, and I wanted to find out for sure that you did make the statement that the Republican Party is the foe of the American people. Is that substantially the statement you made?

Mr. BEIRNE. I believe you will find that is my opinion.

Mr. VELDE. Oh, yes.

Mr. BEIRNE. An opinion that has been borne out. That is an opinion that I have based upon observing the activities of the Republican Party for a number of years.

Mr. VELDE. I presume you are referring chiefly to the voting on the Taft-Hartley Act. I did not vote for the Taft-Hartley Act myself. I was not a Member of the House.

Mr. BEIRNE. No. My measuring stick is not the Taft-Hartley Act at all. I have no single measuring stick. There are many things which affect us as citizens and by which you folks in Congress, by your actions, may affect us. The philosophy I hold to, is the long-talked-of and much-talked-of human rights, contrary to that which the Republican Party somehow or other always seems to stand for, namely, property rights.

Mr. VELDE. You must be a Democrat, I presume.

Mr. BEIRNE. I do not know what you would call me. I am not registered at the moment. I voted for President Truman, however, and the Democrats in my district.

Mr. VELDE. I would assume so.

Mr. BEIRNE. I say that without feeling that it is any violation of my right as a citizen to a secret ballot.

Mr. VELDE. If you say that the Republican Party is the foe of the American people, I think there are quite a few people who do not know that. I think it is your duty to warn them of the fact, because there were at least 22,000,000 who do not know anything about that, and probably it would be a good idea to come out in the open and tell all the people that the Republican Party is the foe of the American people.

Mr. BEIRNE. I tried to make my contribution to that.

Mr. VELDE. Another statement you made is that the Communist clause in the Taft-Hartley Act planted the seed in the minds of the American people that the labor unions were infiltrated with Communists. Do you know, as a matter of fact, that they are not infiltrated with Communists?

Mr. BEIRNE. I know the CWA is not.

Mr. VELDE. What about the rest of the unions?

Mr. BEIRNE. I will be an expert witness for the committee on the CWA. Now, I have read, just the same as, most likely, you have read, and I may have had a little better privilege being closer to some of the labor people, and I know that a lot of this guff about unions being infiltrated with Communists is getting too big a play, bigger than the number of Communists in this country or in the labor unions would warrant. And as far as the CWA is concerned, I could make a statement which I think is factually correct, that there is not one officer who is a Communist or who sympathizes in the direction of anything that the Communist Party stands for.

Mr. VELDE. Do you happen to know Mr. J. Edgar Hoover?

Mr. BEIRNE. No. I have heard of him. I do not known him.

Mr. VELDE. Do you think he knows what he is talking about?

Mr. BEIRNE. Yes. I have great respect and admiration for the gentleman.

Mr. VELDE. When he said that the chief method which the Communists use to gain power in this country is by infiltration in the labor unions, do you think he is telling the truth? Or is Mr. Hoover giving us a bill of goods?

Mr. BEIRNE. Are you making a direct statement? Is it that he said they endeavored to get their power by trying to infiltrate in labor unions?

Mr. VELDE. Perhaps I should be a little fair with you. Up to 3 years ago, I was a member of the FBI, and a special agent investigating the Communist situation.

Mr. BEIRNE. I would say that the Communists tried to get into the labor unions, which only points out the democratic set-up of labor unions.

Mr. VELDE. And you think that they do get into the labor unions?

Mr. BEIRNE. Surely, they get in as members.

Mr. VELDE. Do you think that they do not get into positions of power, as the president and secretary and business agents?

Mr. BEIRNE. I assume they would try.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Beirne, if you think that, you are absolutely wrong, because I know better, and so does Mr. Hoover.

Mr. BEIRNE. I know they are not in the CWA.

Mr. VELDE. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Beirne, you made in your extensive statement there reference to the fact that section 303 of the pending bill H. R. 2032 should be amended by the addition of a subsection. Did the committee understand you to say there that the emergency board as proposed under section 303 is limited in its power to subpena witnesses? Is that the impression you meant to give?

Mr. BEIRNE. No. It is not the power of subpenaing witnesses. Our proposal is to make interests which do control that a party to the procedure.

Mr. BAILEY. As you read section 303, is it faulty in that this emergency board would not have the authority, for instance, to call in for questioning these affiliates of your telephone company? You mentioned the First National Bank of New York and the Chase National Bank and the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. and the A. T. & T. itself, for instance, if it was the case of the Bell Telephone pending before the emergency board. But you mean they would not have authority to go into the ramifications of this?

Mr. BEIRNE. No. They could summons them as witnesses, but could not make them an actual, participating party to the negotiatons.

Mr. BAILEY. Is that why you were suggesting that this should be amended, so that they could be made a party?

Mr. BEIRNE. That is correct. That is our strengthening proposal: In other words, we say this: The local management with whom we deal and who therefore would be the party to a dispute when this board comes in to mediate—and it is set up, first, to mediate—is not the representatives of the company who can make decisions or who can make recommendations for decisions that will stick, but rather, if the dispute took place, let us say, in Illinois, the real negotiator is in New York City, in the A. T. & T., and nobody can get to him. Now, the emergency board, we say, should have its hand strengthened by this amendment that we propose, by being able to make the real policy makers of the company come in to the actual negotiations when we try to mediate.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, I think I understand your proposal.

Do the parties appearing with you have any briefs to file?

Mr. BEIRNE. No. They are associates of mine.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you very much for your appearance. The committee was pleased to have you come.

Mr. BEIRNE. Thank you.

Mr. BAILEY. The committee at this time will be pleased to hear Mr. John M. Brumbaugh, representing the eastern conference committee of the Independent Engineering Organizations.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN M. BRUMBAUGH, SPECIAL REPRESENTATIVE, EASTERN CONFERENCE COMMITTEE OF INDEPENDENT ENGINEERING ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee——

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, before you commence, I have an answer that I received from the General Electric Co. to the letter that I put in the record the other day. And in fairness, I would like to put their answer in the record.

Mr. BAILEY. Since we have already started the appearance of this witness, would you object if it was entered in the record at the close of this hearing?

Mr. JACOBS. No.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well.

You may proceed, Mr. Brumbaugh.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. My name is John M. Brumbaugh. I live at Lansdowne, Pa. I am an electronics engineer, and I am employed by the Radio Corporation of America, Camden, N. J. My expenses and time in connection with this appearance are paid for by the groups which I represent.

I am the past president of one of the 14 engineers' unions which I am now representing in this testimony. I would like the committee's permission, if I may, to digress from the writen statement which I presented, and I would also like their permission to submit a revised and corrected printed statement from the one I presented before, because since that time a number of other groups have joined us in this request.

Mr. BAILEY. If there is no objection, we will accept it at the proper time.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. You may proceed with your statement.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I am here specifically to request and to recommend that sections 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) of the Taft-Hartley Act be carried over into the new National Labor Relations Act of 1949. I am not authorized by the groups I represent to speak on any of the other proposals of this legislation.

I have in my possession for examination by the committee official representation authorizations from 14 independent, certified engineers' union covering more than 7,300 engineers employed in industry. All of these groups have considered this matter very carefully, and they decided that it was of such vital interest to themselves and to their colleagues in industry and to the public that they should send one of their members to speak for these provisions.

I will not burden this committee with the organizations' names. They are listed in the printed testimony. Suffice it to say that these organizations are widespread over our country. There are six in the far West, two in the central part of the country, and six here in the Northeast. 7,300 may not sound like a very impressive number, but it is a good percentage of the engineers in industry, and we believe that it is a good majority of the organized engineers in industry; and we believe that it is the group who can really speak with the least prejudice for the large group of unorganized and therefore inarticulate engineers in industry.

Therefore, in addition to these groups which I represent directly, I would like permission to mention others who, as a matter of record, are known to concur with us in this appeal.

Several other bargaining units with about 400 engineers have requested similar representation but have not supplied their official authorization. There are at least nine other independent bargaining units with at least 3,000 engineers, all of which are known by us to share our views on this issue, because of their membership bulletins and other contacts that we have had. This makes at least 10,000 engineers in existing independent bargaining units, and we know of at least 2,500 others who expect to be certified in the future and who also concur with us.

In addition to these collective-bargaining groups, we know of at least 6,000 engineers in industry in noncertified bargaining groups, or in independent organizations, who are also in accord with us in this appeal. Among these are about 2,500 engineers in the Bell Telephone laboratories and at least 1,500 in several engineers' associations in the General Electric Co., 200 at the Humble Oil Co. at Baytown, Tex., and a number of others.

This makes a total of at least 18,000 engineers in industry, of which more than 10,000 are in certified-bargaining units, in groups which are known to favor strongly the carrying-over of sections 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) of the Taft-Hartley Act to the new Labor Relations Act.

There are also some tens of thousands of unorganized engineers in industry who have no real representative because they have not even joined their technical societies, that is, their professional societies of engineers. However, we believe that the views of these groups on this issue have been rather well expressed by the technical societies in the testimony which have been given by Mr. E. Lawrence Chandler of the Engineers' Joint Committee, and they also advocate retention of these sections.

As you doubtless remember, section 2 (12) explains what is meant by professional personnel as that designation is used in the stipulations concerning the appropriate grouping of employees into collective bargaining units.

Section 9 (b) (1) provides that no group of such professional employees, or professional personnel, shall be included in a proposed mixed bargaining unit unless a majority of that professional group so chooses.

To the groups which I represent, these sections give the following very vital provisions. Engineers and scientists in industry, who, as a naturally distinct group in any company, may find it advantageous to form a bargaining unit of their own, are guaranteed the right, first, to form such an independent unit; secondly, as a second alternative, to form a second unit and affiliate with an established labor union; as a third possibility, to go into a mixed unit with labor organizations; fourthly, to refrain from bargaining activity.

We believe that the right to those choices is essential to the furtherance of proper and advantageous collective bargaining among all engineering groups in industry and among all other industrial groups.

We believe that such proper bargaining is essential in the public interest, so that our economic order may be preserved and improved.

Testimony favoring these same sections, 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) has been presented by Mr. Chandler, as we have mentioned before. It has been charged in previous testimony and in previous hearings that these societies are primarily technical in their function and their officials are drawn largely from the top management personnel of large corporations, and that they should not, therefore, speak for employee engineers.

We agree that there is some basis for questioning the appropriateness of any representative of these groups as a spokesman on economic matters for engineers in industry. However, many engineers in our groups are members of these societies, and it so happens that we do agree with Mr. Chandler on retention of these sections, as we do in many other noneconomic issues.

Moreover, we believe we have some good reasons in addition to those of Mr. Chandler for retention of these sections. On the other hand, in fairness to our groups and to many other engineers in industry, we cannot avoid stating that the only engineering representatives whom we expect to speak for omitting these sections from the act must be considered as authorized by only a small minority of the engineers in American industry. In a study made in 1947 for the Industrial Relations Counselors, by Prof. Herbert R. Northrup, who is professor of industrial relations at the New York School of Social Work, the following was reported:

The International Federation of Technical Engineers, Architects, and Draftsmen, which is an A. F. of L. affiliate, was founded in 1918, and in 1947 it had 6,200 members, 8.5 percent to 10 percent of whom were engineers, or a maximum of 620 engineers.

Now, we are rather sure that they could not have more than twice that many today, or a probable maximum of about 1,200 bona fide engineers. The same study by Professor Northrup said that the United Office and Professional Workers, a CIO affiliate, had about 10,000 workers at that time, with approximately 10 percent, or 1,000 engineers. Here again, we are rather sure that the number has probably not doubled to the present date, and this would give a probable maximum of 3,200 engineers in these two groups who are probably the major proponents of dropping the section in question from the act.

We cannot avoid contrasting this probable 3,200 with the 18,000 cited above.

We also point out that the sections in question do not detract in any way from the rights or from the bargaining efficacy of these affiliated groups. On the contrary, we find that they make for more satisfactory and effective bargaining units generally, since groups are thereby free to form into whatever type of mixed or homogeneous units they may find desirable and efficacious.

The groups which I represent do not wish to testify against the interests of the large labor unions. On the contrary, some of our groups share with the progressive leaders of the labor movement, as well as with an increasing number of respected citizens, such analytical thinking. We share with these a good deal of apprehension over the future course of our democratic free enterprise unless reforms are made within that system which will promote the development of the individual worker as an individual, as a citizen.

Our groups are, therefore, not antilabor. We hold that collective bargaining by engineers is in the long-term interest of these large labor unions, and that a free choice of appropriate units, as provided by the sections which we advocate, is the only basis upon which most engineering groups have actively participated in the bargaining activity, and we petition the Congress they do not create obstacles to this free choice and thereby hinder the development of proper collective bargaining in our economic system.

Most of the engineers in our groups believe that labor organizations are just as essential for the proper operations of our economic system as are corporate organizations, but they believe that in our interest and in the public interest the engineer should have the choice of maintaining an independent status within the labor movement. As established bargaining units most of our concern is for the large groups of our colleagues in industry who are as yet unorganized, and thus have no duly authorized spokesman on such matters, and our concern is they shall have a free choice as to the most advantageous and effective bargaining unit available, whether it be in combination with other groups or not, or a choice not to bargain at all if they deem this to be in their interest.

It has been argued on behalf of the engineers in industry that they have only the same problems as other plant groups and, therefore, they can have no need for separate bargaining groups even if they wish them. This argument shows almost complete disregard for inherent differences between industrial groups and for their individual functions, their individual interests, and more important, their individually effective approaches to collective bargaining.

It is true that engineers and scientists in an industrial plant have certain group problems which, more or less, parallel similar problems of other groups, which it is equally true and also evident that engineers and scientists in an industrial plant, by the very nature of their work and of their functions, are certainly a more separate and distinct group than are various separate craftsmen, such as carpenters and steam fitters and electricians, and so forth, who work in the same plant.

As such a separate group, characterized by unique functions, unique interests, and unique capabilities, rather than ban the desired prerogatives, there should also be accorded the right to several choices of action:

(1) To set up a separate and distinct bargaining unit, if they so desire, which bargaining unit should be affiliated with a labor union, or independent, as they so desire.

(2) To enter a mixed bargaining unit, along with the draftsmen, technicians, and so forth, if they so desire.

(3) To set up a noncertified bargaining group.

(4) Or to abstain from collective bargaining if they so desire.

Sections 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which sections we want retained, permit engineering groups any of these choices. It is not true, as has been implied elsewhere in previous hearings, that these sections enforce the separation of engineering and drafting and technician groups. Such combination groups are one of the above choices permitted by these sections, and such mixed groups must be certified under these sections as appropriate bargaining units if the groups so desire.

Collective bargaining by engineers has progressed and has expanded under these provisions for which we are requesting continuance. The large and increasing number of existing, active, independent bargaining units of engineers is, in itself, an attest to the need for these provisions. And in this regard it should be remembered that these provisions infringe upon no one's choice of action with respect to collective bargaining.

A few of our colleagues engineering groups have chosen to go into fixed bargaining units, which are CIO or AFL affiliates, because they have found this to be more advantageous in their situation, and we certainly can have no objection to this, and it is one of the choices offered by these sections.

However, before these sections were enacted many engineering groups were really deterred from bargaining because of their inability to get certification from local NLRB agencies for what they considered to be an advantageous and appropriate unit.

Moreover, other engineering groups were then forced, against the will of their majority, into bargaining units wherein the bargaining interests of the engineers were subjugated to those of a larger majority. In most cases, the engineering groups atrophied in the bargaining function. They either disregarded the activity completely, or went to great effort and expense to be excluded from the unit. Such occurrences have strongly prejudiced some engineering groups against the labor movement in general, and this does not appear to us to be in the public interest.

Correction of such inequities by these sections to 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) has resulted in improved relations for all concerned, and has promoted bargaining among engineers, and has not deterred in the least those groups of engineers, draftsmen and technicians who have found it more advantageous to combine in their bargaining activity.

And so we ask why these sections should be omitted from the new law, since they are so eminently reasonable. We believe they should be retained since they are, in the light of experience, so conducive to the orderly development of collective bargaining. These sections do no harm to any group, and we believe they are of real benefit to all industrial groups. We ask nothing new; only for the retention of something which has proved to be, from experience, good.

That concludes my testimony. I wish to thank the committee on behalf of the participating groups for this opportunity to testify.

Mr. BAILEY. Br. Brumbaugh, I believe you can save some time for the committee, and obviate the necessity for individual members of the committee asking you questions if you will answer this one direct question.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Your primary purpose in appearing before the committee is to contend that your engineering groups will lose their independent status because of the failure to carry over into the proposed new legislation sections (2) (12) and 9 (b) (1) that are in the present Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. That is not our primary consideration. We think that, as applied to organized units, it is clear there is a possible danger of that, but our primary concern, sir, is for groups who are not yet organized, that they shall have the choice—as many of our groups have had—as to whether or not they wish to affiliate with large unions voluntarily, or perhaps be absorbed by large units against their will, as had happened in some instances before the passage of these sections.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that makes your position clear.

Have you any questions, Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. No questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. I have no questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

If I understand the tenor of your testimony, what you want to do, practically, is to allow the professional engineers to be set up either in a separate collective bargaining unit, or if they choose, to become part of the production and maintenance or plant unit; is that right?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. That, I believe, was done under the Wagner Act, as well as under the Taft-Hartley Act, by Board decision, was it not?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. As I understand, sir, under the Wagner Act it was almost entirely at the discretion of local agencies of the NLRB as to whether such engineering groups should be put into a plant unit, or should have their independent group.

Mr. BURKE. Do you remember when the Society of Designing Engineers voted for affiliation with the CIO, and went into the various international unions—first of all, they went into the Federation of Architects, Engineers, Chemists, and Technicians, and that was set up within the CIO for that particular phase, and then—of course, I am more familiar with the auto industry than anything else, and I think you will find that engineers in the auto industry, who are now represented by the United Automobile Workers, are far in excess of the 3,200 that you quote here that are in both the AFL and CIO.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. That could be, sir. I will admit that we did not have very good information. I would be interested in knowing how many there are.

Mr. BURKE. I can readily realize that. Of course, as I say, I am more familiar with the automobile industry than with any other industry in the country, and I do know that to be a fact; particularly, since I happened to come from an engineering department myself.

In that particular case they set up a professional and technical unit, and this was under the Wagner Act, by the way, and it was set up as a separate and distinct unit from the production and maintenance unit of the plant workers, although the union members among the engineers themselves contended for a unit as part of the collective bargaining unit of the total plant. The Board in that particular case went against the wishes of the union and the express wishes of the people, and did set up a separate unit recognizing the company's contention of lack of community interest, and so on; but, by and large, you would be satisfied if the new bill did provide that the unit could be set up in either of the two ways: One, as a separate unit by itself, depending on the evidence developed in the hearing, and so on; and secondly, if the people in that unit so desired, be a part of the plant-wide unit. You would be satisfied with that?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Yes, and to put it another way, we think that the group should have the choice by a majority vote of this group as to whether they want to have an independent, unaffiliated group, or whether they want to affiliate with the AFL or CIO another way.

Mr. BURKE. The principle of the election being held among the group to determine whether or not they wanted to be a part of the plant-wide unit, I believe, was used first in the Willys-Overland case?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I am not sure.

Mr. BURKE. I believe it was. From that time, then, many other cases arose within the automobile industry. And, I might say, that the engineers in the United Automobile Workers have received pretty good recognition all the way through. In fact, the international president is an engineer himself.

That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Brumbaugh, the people you mention as engineers, what do they include, generally? Are they college-trained men? That is what is bothering me.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. In the groups which I represent the percentage of graduate engineers varies from group to group. I would estimate, on the average, that it might be 80 percent graduate engineers.

Mr. WERDEL. College-trained men?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. College trained.

Mr. WERDEL. And those could be chemists or physicists or civil engineers?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Yes, mechanical, electrical, chemical; yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. Is there any labor organization opposition to your request, that you know of?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I know of only the testimony in the Senate committee by a Mr. Oliver, I believe, of the A. F. of L.

Mr. WERDEL. Of who?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Of the A. F. of L., affiliated with the International Federation of Engineers, Architects, and Technicians, I believe it is. That is the only testimony I know of having been presented against these sections.

Mr. WERDEL. As a matter of fact, under the Wagner Act there were occasions in a plant where there might be one or two chemists, say, in a dehydrating plant, and they were put into the plant-wide bargaining unit as a classification by a vote of the people that voted in the plant; is that not correct, under the Wagner Act?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I think so, but where it was not an expression of the wishes of the individuals in that group itself.

Mr. WERDEL. And having then been included in the bargaining unit their wage rates were figured, and you were for all time covered by those wage scales—not that I object to your stand. I think that if your people represent college educations, and so forth, they are entitled to some differential and to a right to bargain independently. I assume that is what your real objection is; you want to bargain independently so you can maintain a little different wage scale, that is expressed in terms of pennies per hour; is that it?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. That is one, but there are others.

Mr. BURKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WERDEL. Yes.

Mr. BURKE. Under the Wagner Act the Board did it in three cases—in three ways:

First, in some cases it excluded from bargaining this type of employee;

Second, it set them us as a separate bargaining unit from any other bargaining unit in the plant: and Third, in some cases it set them up as part of the plant-wide bargaining unit.

Mr. WERDEL. I agree with that, but almost invariably, within the knowledge I have—and mine is not Nation-wide by any means— if there were one or two men classified as engineers, chemists, or physicists, unless they personally objected they were usually included, and within a short time thereafter we often found them objecting.

I believe that is what the man is talking about.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Yes, there were a number of such cases where there were fairly large groups of engineers who were included against their wishes.

Mr. WERDEL. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you, Mr. Brumbaugh, for your appearance.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Thank you, gentlemen.

(The revised statement referred to by Mr. Brumbaugh is as follows:)

STATEMENT RELATIVE TO H. R. 2032 PRESENTED BY JOHN M. BRUMBAUGH ON BEHALF OF A GROUP OF INDEPENDENT CERTIFIED COLLECTIVE BARGAINING UNITS OF ENGINEERS

This brief statement constitutes the plea of approximately 7,300 engineers, in 14 independent unions or collective bargaining units, for carry-over of sections 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) of the Taft-Hartley Act into the new Labor Relations Act. A list of these units and their membership is included at the end of this statement; as is also a break-down of other groups, which shows that at least 18,000 engineers in industry (of which about 10,000 are in existing independent bargaining units) join us in this plea for retention of the above-cited sections.

Section 2 (12) explains what is meant by "professional personnel"; as that designation is used in the stipulations concerning the appropriate grouping of employees into collective-bargaining units. Section 9 (b) (1) provides that no group of such professional personnel shall be included in a proposed mixed bargaining unit unless a majority of that professional group so chooses.

To the groups which I represent, these sections give the following very vital provision. Engineers and scientists in industry, who, as a naturally distinct group in any company, may find it advantageous to form a bargaining unit of their own, are guaranteed the right to: (a) form such an independent unit, (b) form a separate unit and affiliate with an established labor unit, (c) go into a mixed unit, or (d) refrain from bargaining activity. We believe that the right to these choices is essential to the furtherance of proper and advantageous collective bargaining among all engineering groups in industry, and among all other industrial groups. We believe such proper bargaining is essential in the public interest, so that our economic order may be preserved and improved.

Testimony favoring these same sections 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) has been presented by Mr. E. Lawrence Chandler, speaking for the Engineer's Joint Council (panel of representatives of technical professional engineering societies). It has been charged in other hearings that these societies are primarily technical in their functions, that their officials are drawn largely from top-management personnel of large corporations, and that they should not therefore speak for employee engineers. We agree that there is some basis for questioning the appropriateness of any representative of these groups as a spokesman, on economic matters, for engineers in industry. However, many engineers in our groups are members of these societies, and it so happens that we do agree with Mr. Chandler on retention of these sections; as we do on many other noneconomic issues. Moreover, we believe we have good reasons for their retention in addition to Mr. Chandler's.

On the other hand, in fairness to our groups and many other engineers in industry, we cannot avoid stating that the only engineering representatives, whom we expect to speak for omitting these sections from the act, must be considered as authorized by only a small minority of the engineers in American industry.

In a study made in 1947 for the Industrial Relations Counselors, by Prof. Herbert R. Northrup (professor of industrial relations, New York School of Social Work), the following was reported: The International Federation of Technical Engineers, Architects, and Draftsmen (A. F. of L.), founded in 1918, had, in 1947, 6,200 members; 8.5 to 10 percent of whom were engineers—or a maximum of 620 engineers. We are rather sure that they could not have more than twice that many today—or a probable maximum of 1,200 bona fide engineers.

The same study said that the United Office and Professional Workers (CIO), had about 10,000 members, with approximately 10 percent or 1,000 engineers. Here again, we are rather sure that the number has not doubled to date. This would give a probable maximum of 3,200 engineers in the two groups, who are probably the major proponents of dropping the sections in question from the act. We cannot avoid contrasting this probable 3,200 with the 18,000 cited above, and also point out that the sections in question do not detract in any way from the rights or bargaining efficacy of these affiliated groups. On the contrary, we find that they make for more satisfactory and effective bargaining units generally, since groups are thereby free to form into whatever type of mixed or homogeneous units they may find desirable.

The groups which I represent do not wish to testify against the interests of the large labor unions. On the contrary, we hold that collective bargaining by engineers is in their long-term interest; and that a free choice of appropriate unit (as provided by the sections we advocate) is the only basis upon which most engineering groups have actively participated in bargaining activity. We petition the Congress that they do not create obstacles to this free choice, and thereby hinder the development of proper collective bargaining.

As established bargaining units, most of our concern is for large groups of our colleagues in industry who are as yet unorganized, and thus have no duly authorized spokesman on such matters. Our cocern is that they shall have a free choice as to the most advantageous and effective bargaining unit available, whether it be in combination with other groups or not; or a choice not to bargain collectively at all, if they deem this to be in their interest.

It has been argued that engineers in industry have only the same problems and interests as other plant groups, and that therefore they can have no need for separate bargaining units, even if they wish them. This argument shows complete disregard for inherent differences between industrial groups, and for their individual functions, interests, and approaches to bargaining. It is true that engineers and scientists in an industrial plant have certain group problems which more or less parallel similar problems of other groups. But it is equally true and quite evident that the engineers and scientists in an industrial plant are, by the very nature of their work and function, certainly a more separate and distinct group than are the various separated craftsmen; such as carpenters, steamfitters, electricians, etc., who work in the same plant. As such a separate group, characterized by unique functions, interests and capabilities (rather than by desired prerogatives), they should also be accorded the right to: (a) set up a separate and distinct bargaining unit, if they so desire—which bargaining unit should be affiliated with a labor union, or independent, as they so desire, (b) enter a mixed bargaining unit, along with draftsmen, technicians, etc., if they so desire, (c) set up a noncertified bargaining group, or (d) abstain from collective bargaining, if they so desire.

Sections 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which sections we want retained, permit engineering groups any of these choices. It is not true, as has been implied elsewhere, that these sections enforce the separation of engineering-drafting-technician groups. Such combination groups are one of the above choices permitted by these sections; and such mixed groups must be certified under these sections as appropriate bargaining units, if the groups so desire.

Collective bargaining by engineers has progressed and expanded under these provisions, for which we are requesting continuance. The large and increasing number of existing, active, independent, bargaining units of engineers is, in itself, an attest to the need for these provisions. And, in this regard, it should be remembered that these provisions infringe on no one's choice of action with respect to collective bargaining. Before they were enacted, many engineering groups were deterred from bargaining by their inability to get certification, from local NLRB agencies, for what they considered to be an advantageous and appropriate unit. Moreover, other engineering groups were then forced, against the will of their majority, into bargaining units wherein the bargaining interests of the engineers were subjugated to those of a larger majority. In most such cases, the engineering groups atrophied in their bargaining function. They either disregarded the activity completely, or went to great effort and expense to be excluded from the unit. Such occurrences have strongly prejudiced some engineering groups against the labor movement in general. This does not appear to be in the public interest.

Correction of such inequities by these sections 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) has resulted in improved relations for all concerned, has promoted bargaining among engineers, and has not deterred in the least, those groups of engineers, draftsmen and technicians who have found it more advantageous to combine in their bargaining activity.

We ask why these sections should be omitted from the new law, since they are so eminently reasonable. We believe they should be retained since they are, in the light of experience, so conducive to the orderly development of collective bargaining. These sections do no harm to any group, and we believe they are of real benefit to all industrial groups. We ask nothing new; only retention of something which proved to be good.

The following is a list of the independent bargaining units which I represent, by official authorizations in my possession, in their appeal for retention of sections 9 (b) (1) and 2 (12) of the Taft-Hartley Act:

Name and company employing—	Approximate number of engineers
Unit I. Eastern Conference Committee of Independent Engineering Organizations:
1. Council of Western Electric Technical Employees, Kearney, N. J.	1,520
2. Engineers Association, Sperry Gyroscope, Hempstead, N. Y.	900
3. Association of Professional Engineer Personnel, RCA, Camden, N. J.	510
4. Association of Engineers and Engineers Assistants, General Electric, Philadelphia, Pa.	160
5. Bloomfield Westinghouse Association of Engineers, Bloomfield, N. J.	150
6. Association of Technical and Professional Employees, Westinghouse Electric, Bloomfield, N. J.	30
Unit II. National Professional Association of Engineers, Architects, and Scientists (employed by various concerns):
1. Southern California Professional Engineers Association 2. San Francisco Area Group of Professional Employees 3. Sacramento Group of Professional Engineering Employees 4. Engineer's Guild of Oregon 5. Seattle Professional Engineering Employees Association	3,000
Unit IV. Research and Engineering Professional Employees Association, Unit III. Minneapolis Federation of Honeywell Engineers	300
Standard Oil of Indiana, Whiting, Ind.	410
Unit V. Association of Industrial Scientists, Shell Development Co., Berkeley, Calif.	330
Total, over	7,310

All of the above are certified by N. L. R. B. as collective bargaining units. Several other bargaining units, with about 400 engineers, have requested similar representation, but have not supplied official authorization. There are at least 9 other independent bargaining units, with at least 3,000 engineers, all of which are known by us to share our views on this issue because of their member bulletins and other contacts we have had. This makes at least 10,000 engineers in existing independent bargaining units, and we know of at least 2,500 others who expect to be certified in the near future, and who also concur with us.

In addition to these collective-bargaining groups, we know of at least 6,000 engineers in industry, in noncertified bargaining groups or nonbargaining groups and organizations, who are also in accord with us in this appeal. Among these are about 2,500 engineers in the Bell Telephone Laboratories, at least 1,500 in several engineers associations in the General Electric Co., and 200 at the Humble Oil Co., Baytown, Tex.

This makes a grand total of at least 18,000 engineers in industry, of which more than half are in certified bargaining units, in groups which are known to favor strongly the carry-over of sections 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) of the Taft-Hartley Act to the new Labor Relations Act. There are also many tens of thousands who have no real representative because they have not even joined their technical societies. By their bargaining inactivity, it is presumed that they favor these same provisions.

In contrast to these 18,000, and the many other inarticulate groups, we believe that the total number of bona fide engineers in the AFL and CIO affiliated groups, who may have spoken against these sections, could not exceed 3,200—and we repeat that retention of these sections does not detract from the rights or bargaining effectiveness of these groups of engineers and technicians.

Mr. BAILEY. The committee will now hear Dr. H. M. Griffiths of the National Ecoonmic Council.

You may state your name and affiliations.

TESTIMONY OF DR. H. M. GRIFFITHS, DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC RELATIONS OF THE NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL, INC., NEW YORK, N. Y.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. My name is H. M. Griffiths. I am director of public relations of the National Economic Council, Empire State Building, New York.

Most of the witnesses whom you have heard here, Mr. Chairman, have come for some special interest. Some have come representing the unions, and some have come representing employers. We wish to make it clear at the outset that we are here representing a cross section of the general public.

Our membership represents employers, it represents employees, it represents housewives, and people who work at the benches, and people who hold executive positions, and so I want to say we are not in a position here of representing any one special interest, but the interest of the constituency which comprises our membership.

Mr. BAILEY. You may proceed.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. It is the opinion of the National Economic Council that H. R. 2032 or any equivalent thereof should be rejected. The need of the United States, in the interest of the public of wage earners, of management and of ownership, is that the Taft-Hartley law be strengthened, not repealed.

The Taft-Hartley law is not unfair to the wage earner. In fact, it gives sorely needed protection to the wage earner against exploitation. The chief danger to the wage earner today is not that of exploitation by the employer. It is the power held over him, or desired to be held over him, by the barons of organized labor. We believe the Taft-Hartley law is a character of liberty for the American wage earner who desires to retain his self-respect as a person. The representation that it is a slave-labor law is pure invention, and every informed, intelligent person knows it.

The National Economic Council believes that reenactment of or substantial reenactment of the old Wagner Act, would be a dangerous backward step in American labor relations, in the following respects:

(1) Restoration of the closed shop is a direct blow at the moral and legal right possessed by virtue of natural right and guaranteed by the Constitution whereby any man is free to join or not to join a labor union as his own conscience and judgment may dictate.

(2) Invalidation of all State laws against the iniquitous closed shop is an invasion of the police powers of the States under the Constitution. The interstate commerce plea is a mere subterfuge.

(3) The right of employees to vote by secret ballot on whether they wish to work or continue to work under a union shop contract is taken away, thus further reducing the area of the employee's freedom. This, not the freedom given under the Taft-Hartley, is real "slave labor."

(4) The right of employees to vote themselves out of a Communist-controlled, or mismanaged union by secret ballot is taken away by repeal of the decertification provisions of the Taft-Hartley Law. This is an affront to all decent American workers who do not wish to pay tribute to Communist labor bosses, and in effect compels them to support un-American activities if their union is Communist-dominated.

(5) The right of employees to be free of coercion from any quarter is taken away by retaining the Taft-Hartley provision against employer-coercion while omitting the Taft-Hartley provision against coercion by unions. This is an open invitation to coercion and an open door for the restoration of labor abuses of which the American public is heartily sick. It further restricts the employee's freedom.

(6) The obligation upon employers to bargain collectively in good faith contained in the Taft-Hartley law is retained, but the corresponding obligation of the union to bargain collectively in good faith is omitted. This again opens the door to gross abuses and abandons even the pretense of mutuality.

(7) The Taft-Hartley ban upon political contributions by employers is retained, while the making of such contributions by labor unions is not prohibited. This again, taken together with the closed shop, forces employees to make political contributions against their will and without their consent. There is no mutuality. This is an immoral device, and there are others equally immoral in the proposed legislation, to increase the political power of labor barons at the financial expense of their serfs, the rank and file. Here is "slave labor" with a vengeance.

(8) The proposed legislation, in repealing the Taft-Hartley provisions against featherbedding returns to medieval economic thinking which does vast harm to workers, employers and public. It slows down the efficiency of industry to produce, make statutory the obligation of employers to pay employees who do no useful work, and saddles the public with many millions of dollars added without reason to the cost of living. In effect it is a tax upon consumers paid to union members for not working, which is extortion.

(9) The proposed legislation omits the Taft-Hartley provisions guaranteeing to employers freedom of speech, while preserving such freedom for labor unions and their officers. This is class legislation at its worst. America has no room for the philosophy and the practice of class-conflict, nor should they be sanctified by law.

(10) In eliminating the Taft-Hartley provisions making labor unions responsible for the acts of their agents and liable for violations of their contracts, while holding employers both responsible and liable, the proposed legislation is grossly immoral, lacks mutuality, and invites lawlessness from a privileged class thus notified in advance that it will not be penalized for unlawful acts it does by agents or for damage to employers, employees and the public done by breaking its own pledged word.

(11) The proposed legislation further violates the freedom of individual employees because, while it retains the Taft-Hartley prohibition against discriminations against employees by employers, it omits the Taft-Hartley provision making it an unfair labor practice for labor unions to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee. This is plainly a provision to put the rank and file worker completely under the thumb of labor bosses.

(12) The proposed legislation, in omitting the Taft-Hartley ban on strikes by Federal employees, threatens the future security of the United States.

(13) By eliminating the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law requiring non-Communist affidavits, the proposed legislation deprives patriotic, American-minded members of labor unions of a proven and efficient means by which Communist officers and Communist controls may be eliminated and kept eliminated from their unions. In taking away this weapon, it encourages communism among unions.

(14) The proposed legislation strikes a blow at the public safety and security by eliminating the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law which enable the courts at the request of the President to delay strikes threatening the national health and safety. That the small group of labor barons who control unions with power to threaten the national health and safety should be given power to use the national health and safety as a coercive weapon would be a monstrously immoral act. The Congress should put the interest of all the people above the interest of a few power-drunk men.

For these and other reasons, too numerous to set forth in this brief statement, the National Economic Council urges that the Taft-Hartley law be retained and the proposed substitute be rejected. We can think of no better way to promote that chaos and utter confusion in which communism thrives than to pass this bill.

We also urge the strengthening of the present law as follows:

(1) By enacting amendments protecting the right of any individual to employment upon agreement with an employer, whether he chooses to belong to a union or not to belong to any union.

(2) By enacting amendments denying to a majority of employees the power to coerce a minority by legalizing a compulsory union shop. Such coercion is an infringement of the natural rights of the minority, as well as an unconstitutional exercise of the power to abrogate the contracts between the minority and the employer made before the establishment of the so-called union shop.

The issues involved in these matters transcend the interest of partisan or political advantage. The Taft-Hartley law is consonant to and agreeable with the spirit and the letter of the American system of Government as contained in the Constitution. The proposed legislation is neither. It is class legislation, it invites lawlessness, it abrogates the constitutional liberties of employees and employers alike, it encourages Communist activity, it saddles heavy financial burdens upon the cost of living of every American family, and it betrays the interest and safety of the American public by failing in its duty to protect their health and welfare.

The National Economic Council earnestly urges the committee to preserve and strengthen the Taft-Hartley Law.

Thank you.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Griffths, I notice in your presentation, you say you are Director of Public Relations of the National Economic Council, and beyond saying they have their office in the Empire State Building in New York, you give practically no background of your organization.

Does it have a constitution?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Does it have a board of directors?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Is Merwin K. Hart the president?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. He is the president, and also a member of the board of directors. I have a sample of the literature containing a roster of the board of directors, which I will be glad to leave with the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Was Merwin K. Hart, the president, at one time associated with one William Dudley Pelley?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Not that I know of, and I do not think that has anything to do with the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. I think we should have the background of your organization.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. My answer is that I have never heard of any association. Have you?

Will you answer my question? Did you ever hear of any such association?

Mr. BAILEY. I am quoting here now from Who's Who in which he is listed as a member of the American Union for National Fame in 1938 to 1940, and also chairman of the committee to send relief supplies to Fascist Spain in 1943.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. What has that to do with William Dudley Pelley?

Mr. BAILEY. I am talking about Mr. Hart.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Yes, but you asked if Mr. Hart was associated with Mr. Pelley. I asked you the question whether, to your knowledge, he was.

Mr. BAILEY. But I am asking you a question.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Do you not think it is unfair to ask the question unless you have the evidence to prove it?

That is the smear technique, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I object to your statement here.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Unless you have some reason to believe he has been, you should not have asked the question.

Mr. BAILEY. I think this committee has a right to know the background of the groups who come here to put pressure on Congress to pass legislation to regulate other people's business.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I do, too, but I do not think you have a right to ask such a question. I have never heard of any such connection, and I doubt whether any has ever been alleged or proved.

Mr. BAILEY. You state here on page 4 of your presentation that in taking away the weapon of the non-Communist affidavit that it encourages communism among unions.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. That is right.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Taft-Hartley Act require non-Fascist affidavits?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Not so far as I know, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. Would you say that failure to include a non-Fascist affidavit would encourage fascism among the employers?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. As far as I know, Mr. Chairman, if you will let me answer that question in my own way, there is no organization known as a Fascist Party in this country. I do not know of any Fascists, myself. So far as I know, they are all gone. There are Communists, and that refers to whether a person has a membership in the Communist Party, a membership which is well known. The term "Fascist" is another smear term which is just used by a number of people to refer to people they do not like. There is not any such thing as a Fascist Party, so how could anybody ask a person to make an affidavit to something that does not exist?

Mr. BAILEY. You will agree, then, if the non-Communist affidavit is required of labor unions, it should be required of employers, alike?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I will agree with that, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Will you agree that the best way to handle that would be in general legislation rather than to write it into labor legislation, or any other kind of labor legislation?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I do not know what you mean. Do you mean to make every citizen sign an affidavit he is not a Communist?

Mr. BAILEY. Would that not be the desired end which we all want, if we could do that?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I do not think so.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you see any difference?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. This refers to officers of labor unions, and labor unions are, to the knowledge of anybody who knows anything about it, being currently infiltrated by Communists today.

But to go out and ask the whole American people to sign up and say they are not Communists would be a work which could not be accomplished, and there would be no point to it.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman is aware there is a legislation pending before committees of Congress in that direction. In fact, they cover practically the entire field. You are aware of that, are you not?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. No, sir. I am not. I think there is a great distinction in what you propose and the other legislation.

Mr. BAILEY. You are familiar with that legislation?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. In general. Some of it has just been introduced, and I have not read the bills.

Mr. BAILEY. You would not know what groups are covered?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I understand you are suggesting that every citizen of the United States should tell whether he is a Communist, or not.

Mr. BAILEY. When he is brought into a position where his Americanism is subject to question, probably it should be required.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I am willing to go along with you on that. I thought you said they should go out and ask all Americans whether or not they are members of the Communist Party.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the gentleman would agree that would be impossible.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. That is right.

Mr. BAILEY. Have you any questions, Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. I would like to know something about the financing of the organization, and how the members are gotten.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. You mean the members of the National Economic Council?

Mr. IRVING. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. We have memberships at $10 a year. We have a great many people who cannot afford to pay $10 a year but who—because we know that they are in sympathy with our aims and have been for a long time, because of correspondence with us telling what their theories are—are continued on without the payment of the full fee.

We have other persons who contribute to us larger amounts than that.

Mr. IRVING. That is all. Thank you.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. I read here in the second paragraph where you state that the Taft-Hartley law is not unfair to the wage earner.

I take it that you are familiar with the law?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I have not memorized it, but I take it that in general I am familiar with it.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you refer to section 8 (b) (4) (D)? You recall that section, do you?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Not by the number. If you have it there I will look at it.

Mr. JACOBS. I will give you a copy to use. It is on page 7, I believe, down about the middle of the page.

That is the provision that deals with the jurisdictional strike in the craft unions. It provides that it is unlawful to engage in a strike, or encourage anyone else to engage in a strike over a jurisdictional dispute between crafts. That, of course, as you probably know, is enforcible by injunction.

You are familiar with that?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. But there is also a provision, is there not, for settling those disputes, and for calling in arbitrators, or the Board?

Are you familiar with that?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I think so.

Mr. JACOBS. I think you will find that section 10 (k) provides that awards can be made, and give the work to one craft or the other.

Will you tell me where, in the Taft-Hartley law, there is any provision to enforce the award against the employer? We know that in 10 (l) it can be enforced against the workers.

If you are familiar with the law—I have been looking for it for a long time and have not found it; and maybe you can tell me a provision under which an award can be enforced against the employer.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I am not in a position to give you that exact information at the moment, sir. If you have not been able to find it, it might take me a little while to find it.

Mr. JACOBS. I am afraid it would take you an awful long time to find it.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. If it is not there I would join you and say it should be made equally mandatory upon the employer.

Mr. JACOBS. You would then vary your statement that it is not unfair to labor and say there was only a unilateral remedy?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I would say the Taft-Hartley Act has gone 90 percent of the way in representing the wage earner, and that if the provision which you mentioned is not in there it should be put in there. It certainly is not something they had before, is it?

Was it in the Wagner Act before that?

Mr. JACOBS. My friend, you used your time with your prepared statement, and I am asking the question.

However, I will answer your question. Neither was section 8 (b) (4) (D) in the Wagner Act, was it?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. So far as my memory goes; no.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us get back on the track, now.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. But they are no worse off than they were.

Mr. JACOBS. You used your time on your statement, and now I want to ask you some questions.

You are using my time, and I want to ask you some questions.

You are aware of the fact, I suppose, that in the questionnaire that has been put out it demands a "Yes" and "No" answer in regard to the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I have seen some of them.

Mr. JACOBS. I am not trying to restrict you to that, but I do not want you to use my time, especially on something I am not asking you about.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. All right.

Mr. JACOBS. We will get back to the question of the closed shop:

Do you know of any corporation—that is, an employer—that permits the stockholders who are not officers and directors to come in and disagree with them at the bargaining table? Do you or do you not?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Offhand, no.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you believe that the workers are entitled to strive by contract to procure a contract whereby they may have equal unity at the bargaining table?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I think, sir—and I am not trying to make your speech for you: I am trying to answer the best I can—I think, sir, when you are dealing with the question of the equity which a person has in his job, you are dealing with something of a different nature than you are when you are making analogies about corporate structure.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you answer my question? Do you believe that the workers are entitled to strive by contract to procure a contract whereby they may have equal unity at the bargaining table?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Not necessarily, sir, if some of the workers do not agree to it.

Mr. JACOBS. We will talk about the labor barons for a minute. Do you know how much money is in the treasuries of the first 30 international unions?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I know it is a good deal of money, but I do not have the figure. Undoubtedly you do.

Mr. JACOBS. According to the figures I have, it is a little over $200,000,000. You heard the testimony as to what the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. is worth here this afternoon, did you not?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I could not hear it all, sir. There were echoes in the room.

Mr. JACOBS. It is stated to be 9½ billion dollars or, in other words, about 40 times as much as all the international unions I mentioned.

Do you know how much money the State of New York is worth, what the assessed valuation of the State of New York is?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. No.

Mr. JACOBS. It is $14,000,000,000 plus.

We are talking now about the labor barons, and all their wealth. You recognize that there are seven corporations in the United States that are each worth more than the total assessed valuation of the State that I represent in Congress, the State of Indiana. Did you know that?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. No, sir. I presume you are leading up to something here.

Mr. JACOBS. I am just trying to find out how much you know about the relative wealth of those who oppose the people whose purpose you are talking about—and I suppose the question is answered.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I would like to answer the question.

Mr. BAILEY. At this time the chairman desires to explain there is a roll call for a recommitment of a bill, and it is necessary for us to recess the meeting for 30 minutes, and we will be back to finish your testimony and the testimony of one other witness who is here to be heard.

We will stand in recess for 30 minutes.

(Whereupon, at 5:25 p. m., the committee recessed until 5:55 p. m. of the same day.)

(The subcommittee resumed at 6 p. m.)

Mr. IRVING (presiding). We will proceed.

Mr. Wier, do you have any questions?

Mr. WIER. No; I do not want to question him, since I did not hear his testimony.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Dr. Griffiths, a little bit earlier, there was a discussion about whether they should not also include Fascist organizations when they mentioned Communist affidavits.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I think the wording of the act really covers all of those points. It speaks about—and is not a member of or supports any organization that believes in or teaches, the overthrow of the United States Government by force or by any illegal or unconstitutional methods.

So I think that really covers a Fascist organization, and without mentioning any of the names, I am sure it does.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Yes, sir, I would agree to that.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Now, speaking about the reason for having the non-Communist affidavits signed by employers as well as the labor leaders, the statement was made, I believe, to the effect that all people be required to make a non-Communist affidavit. The difficulty with that, of course, is that it would be, from the standpoint of organization, almost impossible to set it up and handle it. I have always felt that one of the reasons for having the employer and employees in a production plant or business sign those affidavits is the fact that they are a production team, and production is most essential in case of any trouble with some unfriendly outside power. I think that is a thought that might be considered when we are deciding on whether they should be included in the act.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Now, I want to ask you one question.

Have you considered the proper way to handle the national emergency strikes?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. As a matter of principle, I am opposed, and have always been opposed, to the use of coercion and force to make anybody work against his will. I think that the provisions of the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments, and particularly the thirteenth, refer, however, to individuals who were made to work against their will, but when you are dealing with a situation where one man has it in his power, or two or three men have it in their power, to paralyze the national economy, and the men who are involved have really no part in that decision themselves, it then becomes a primary function of government to preserve the welfare of the whole people to take action to see that its health and safety are not endangered.

That is why we have advocated the retention of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act in that respect.

Mr. McConnell. Of course, you realize that in the Taft-Hartley Act, we do not provide for any settlement of those strikes. I think you realize that.

Mr. Griffiths. Yes, I understand. That is a cooling-off period.

Mr. McConnell. That is the cooling-off period, with an open end to it, you might say. The strike can be resumed at the end of a certain period of time.

We shied away from two extremes, one of complete freedom to do as one saw fit, and the other, compulsory arbitration, where it had to be settled by the Government itself. We shied away from those two extremes. I admit it was a compromise, and I also admit that many people are not sure that we have in any way arrived at a correct solution of the national emergency strikes.

Mr. Griffiths. Well, sir, I would not want to advocate here that any group of people be permanently kept under such an injunction.

Mr. McConnell. That is all.

Mr. Griffiths. May I make a supplementary statement, for just a moment or two?

Mr. Irving. Surely.

Mr. Griffiths. When Mr. Bailey was here as chairman of the committee, he began his examination of me as to my statement by inquiring to find out whether the president of the National Economic Council, which I represent, was ever associated with one William Dudley Pelley. I replied that to the best of my knowledge, he was not, and Mr. Bailey did not offer any proof that he ever had been, although I asked him to do so.

It will interest the committee to know that upon your recess, I went upstairs to the telephone, called Mr. Hart, and asked him point blank whether he knew Mr. Pelley, without telling him why I was asking. Here is his reply to me:

> I have never met or had any association with William Dudley Pelley.

He authorized me to put it in those exact words after I had explained to him, then, because naturally he wanted to know why I asked him a question about a man that I do not think he and I ever discussed. He further made a statement that he did not know what Mr. Pelley looked like, except that he had seen a photograph of him with a goatee. He had heard he is in prison, but does not know whether he is in prison justly or unjustly, but in so saying, he is not implying whether Pelley is guilty of anything. He just does not know.

No, sir, I think that the committee should be well apprised of the fact that the implication which was bound to come in the statement of the chairman, or the Congressman who was the chairman then, was not founded in fact.

Mr. WIER. Mr. Chairman, as long as you brought up this act, I will ask just one question here. I was not going to ask any questions until you did, in view of the fact that I have been on the House floor.

Who makes up the National Economic Council? Maybe that has been answered.

Mr. MCCONNELL. That has been answered.

Mr. WIER. Is it in the record?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Yes. There have been several questions about the organization.

Mr. WIER. And it is in the record who pays the bill, and all that?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Yes, sir. And I may say that I have available for the committee, in case that question should be asked, because we have nothing to hide, a statement of the National Economic Council, excerpts from its constitution and bylaws, showing its purposes and the names of all its officers and directors, including one Vice President of the United States, some people who are actually officers of labor organizations, people who work at the bench, and people who are a cross section of American life. We do not come representing industry; we do not come representing employees. We come representing a cross section of what we believe the public to be.

Mr. WIER. That is all I want to know. If it is on record, I will do my own checking and my own thinking.

That is all.

Mr. IRVING. I think it would be well for Mr. Jarosz to pass those out to the various members, for I see no objection to making that part of the record.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. We have no objection, sir. We have others of our publications here, too, sir. You can examine this during your spare time.

Mr. WIER. I think we get some of this propaganda in the mail.

Mr. IRVING. Have you any further questions?

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Mr. Chairman, should I answer the question which Mr. Jacobs asked of me just before the recess? I would like to, in about 1 minute.

Mr. IRVING. I think it is not quite in order as long as Mr. Jacobs is not here.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. Well, I am here and he asked me the question.

Mr. IRVING. But if it takes only 1 minute, go ahead.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Yes. Mr. Jacobs asked him the question.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. He asked me in effect this, whether or not there was not such a great disparity between the assets in the hands of certain corporations and the assets in the hands of labor unions as to make of no significance the terms which we have used here in describing the power of labor barons.

My reply to that, sir, is quite simple. Money is power, but is is only power in a relative sense. It is only one kind of power. There is another kind of power, and that is the power which can stop the wheels of industry from working. If you added up the assets today of all the coal companies, the producing coal companies in this country which Mr. Lewis has now stopped—we will not call it a strike, but we will just say he stopped them from operating for 2 weeks—undoubtedly, you would find that those assets are greater than those of the United Mine Workers.

Nevertheless, the wheels are not rolling; coal is not coming out of the ground. Why? Because another kind of power, the power to stop the industrial machine, is far more important at this critical stage than all these theoretical statements about the amount of assets which certain corporations have.

The person who controls and has power in our economy today is the person who controls the bottlenecks, and those bottlenecks are controlled by the barons of union labor, and not by corporations.

Mr. IRVING. I think Mr. Jacobs made it quite clear that there had been a previous witness that used the dollar-and-cents terms with regard to economic power.

Mr. WIER. Are you answering for Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. IRVING. No. I am not answering for Mr. Jacobs, Mr. Wier. I am stating the term that he referred to.

Mr. Burke, did you have a chance to question this witness?

Mr. BURKE. No.

Mr. IRVING. Do you care to?

Mr. BURKE. No.

Mr. IRVING. We will thank you, Dr. Griffiths, for appearing, and we appreciate your coming, of course, and presenting your statement.

Mr. GRIFFITHS. I thank you, and I thank all the members of the committee.

Mr. IRVING. We will have the next witness. Mr. Clorety.

STATEMENT OF JOSEPH A. CLORETY, JR., VICE CHAIRMAN, AMERICAN VETERANS COMMITTEE

Mr. CLORETY. My name is Joseph A. Clorety, Jr., I am national vice chairman of the American Veterans Committee.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the American Veterans Committee—AVC—wishes to express its appreciation to the subcommittee for this opportunity to present our position on H. R. 2032. The third national convention of the American Veterans Committee went on record clearly, unequivocally and succinctly, as follows:

> We believe that free, strong, responsible trade-unions are a hallmark of a democratic society. We are for the speedy and complete repeal of the Taft-Hartley law, and for reinstatement of the Wagner Act without crippling amendments of any kind.

We interpret this mandate, which was adopted by an overwhelming majority, as fully justifying a firm endorsement of H. R. 2032.

I am certain that delegates to our convention, and our membership as a whole, now regard removal of the Taft-Hartley act from the law of the land as a step to be taken by the Eighty-first Congress at the earliest possible date. We opposed this act while it was pending in the Eightieth Congress, and its operation since August 22, 1947, has strengthened our conviction that we were right in our opposition.

I wish to emphasize that we have taken this stand in two national conventions, virtually unanimously, despite the fact that our membership represents a reasonably accurate cross section of the American people and of veterans of the last war. While the bulk of our membership, like the bulk of the American people, are dependent upon the pay roll, we do number among our members significant representation of employers, professional men, farmers, and those veterans whose disabilities make their interest in this legislation strictly academic—or I should say patriotic. Of the overwhelming majority who do work for an employer, I have no doubt that we include roughly the same ratio of unorganized workers as exists among all workers in the American economy.

We are aware that some may query both the right and the propriety of a veterans' organization, as such, taking a stand on this type of legislation. AVC was founded on the concept, then and now peculiar to AVC, that the basic interests of the veteran are inseparable from those of the community. We appear here as "citizens first, veterans second" endorsing this legislation because we believe that its enactment is in the public interest.

More specifically, we favor H. R. 2032 for the following reasons:

Primarily, elimination of the Taft-Hartley Act from the law books and reenactment of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 will in our judgment strengthen collective bargaining, which we deem the key to sound equitable labor-management relations.

Secondly, passage of H. R. 2032 will alleviate, if not remove entirely, the workers' feeling that the Congress of the United States entertains a spirit of animosity toward labor. As the committee knows, each of labor's outstanding gains, from the time of Adam Smith down to this very date, has been won only after truly terrific struggles inside and outside legislative halls. It is small wonder in the light of economic history, that the worker does entertain such suspicions and that such reactionary legislation as the Taft-Hartley Act can only fan these flames.

Thirdly, passage of H. R. 2032 will provide a sounder administrative procedure for governmental action to assure fair and effective operation of collective bargaining.

Fourth, enactment of H. R. 2032 will permit resumption by management and labor in many instances of disrupted patterns of amicable cooperation which were shattered by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Fifthly, we deem it imperative that the Taft-Hartley Act be repealed and the Wagner Act reenacted before a possible economic crisis permits the worst teeth in the Taft-Hartley Act to come into play in an effort to destroy organized labor.

Undoubtedly, many other reasons have influenced our members in adopting the position which we take. I have cited those which committee and convention discussions of this problem indicated to me were our major considerations in urging this subcommittee, the full Committee on Education and Labor, and the Congress to enact expeditiously H. R. 2032, or legislation substantially the same as that now before the subcommittee. After examination of H. R. 2032, I find no reason to believe that the amendments to the Wagner Act which are proposed by H. R. 2032 would be regarded by our membership as "crippling amendments," against which our national convention took its stand.

We were happy to note several weeks ago that this subcommittee passed a resolution under the terms of which we can reasonably anticipate favorable action on H. R. 2032. We commend the statesmanship of members of the subcommittee who have thus announced their intention to wipe out the iniquitous Taft-Hartley Act, restore the Wagner Act with the improvements set forth in H. R. 2032, and thus bring back to date the hands of the clock of progress in labor-management relations. The American Veterans' Committee shares these aspirations, and will support to the full this fight to regain the legitimate rights of labor.

I wish to thank the committee for the opportunity to appear, and on behalf of our national chairman, Gilbert Harrison, to express his regret that it was impossible for him personally to present that position.

Mr. IRVING. Do you have any further remarks or summary that you wish to make?

Mr. CLORETY. I think probably the statement I have given completely reflects the position of the organization, to which I have nothing to add other than in answer to any questions that any members of the subcommittee may wish to ask.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Wier, do you have any questions?

Mr. WIER. No. I think it is a good, outright statement. It is all right.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. I think, too, it is a mighty fine statement. I have no questions.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. I have no questions.

Mr. IRVING. On the part of myself and the committee, I wish to thank you for appearing before the committee and offering your statement.

Mr. CLORETY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. IRVING. We appreciate it very much.

The committee will stand adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

(Whereupon, at 6:35 p. m., the subcommittee adjourned, to reconvene at 10 a. m., Tuesday, March 15, 1949.)

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT 1949

TUESDAY, MARCH 15, 1949

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., Hon. Cleveland M. Bailey presiding.

Mr. BAILEY. The subcommittee will be in order.

The chairman has a number of statements that have been submitted with the request that they be included in the official record of the hearings.

We have statements by William T. Gossett, vice president and general counsel of the Ford Motor Co.; Joseph Gritter, secretary of the Christian Labor Association of the United States; the General Federation of Women's Clubs; Edmund R. Purves, executive director, on behalf the American Institute of Architects; and E. W. Tinker, executive secretary of the American Pulp and Paper Association.

If the chairman hears no objection, these will be accepted for inclusion in the record.

(The statements referred to will be found in the appendix, following close of today's testimony. See index for page numbers.)

Mr. BAILEY. At this time the committee would be pleased to hear from Leonard B. Boudin.

Please state your name and affiliations for the record.

TESTIMONY OF LEONARD B. BOUDIN, CHAIRMAN, LABOR LAW COMMITTEE OF THE NATIONAL LAWYERS GUILD, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Mr. BOUDIN. My name is Leonard B. Boudin, and my address is 78 Beaver Street, New York 5, N. Y. I am chairman of the labor law committee of the National Lawyers' Guild, and am appearing today in that capacity before this committee.

I should also like to state I am a member of the State and Federal bars, including that of the United States Supreme Court.

I have been a specialist in the field of labor law for approximately 13 years, representing in that capacity labor unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, the CIO, and various unaffiliated unions, and while these remarks are supported by the practical experience in the field, the views expressed here are exclusively and completely those of the National Lawyers' Guild, and I am appearing in that representative capacity.

The National Lawyers' Guild is a national association of several thousand members of the bar. Most recently, in February, at its national convention, it adopted a report and resolution calling for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law and the reenactment of the Wagner Act, and also in accord with past enunciations of policy by the National Lawyers' Guild.

The enactment of the Lesinski bill is necessary to relieve workingmen from the unequal bargaining position in which they now find themselves and to restore to them certain basic civil liberties of which they are presently deprived.

The purpose of the Wagner Act, and of the Lesinski bill, was accurately expressed by Senator Wagner in his testimony 14 years ago before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor. At that time he said, and I quote—

> It is designed to further the equal balance of opportunity among all groups that we have always attempted to preserve despite the technological forces driving us toward excessive concentrations of power and wealth.

The Wagner Act was an extremely mild statute. It merely protected workingmen against employer-interference with their rights of association and collective bargaining. Its sanctions were remedial, not punitive; they were civil, not criminal. It employed the rather leisurely administrative process.

The union which was refused collective bargaining, the working man who was discriminatorily discharged, the employees upon whom a company union was foisted, received a partial remedy for these injuries after years of Board and court hearings.

Yet a cry went up, as we know, even while enforcement of the law was restrained by injunction, that this mild law gave labor too much. The motivation of this antagonism was obvious—resentment at the protection given by law to the simple right of workingmen to band together for joint protection and collective bargaining. And for 12 years Congress successfully resisted efforts to amend the Wagner Act—efforts which were first made in time of peace, and then throughout our preparations for war and even during the war.

Finally, in 1947, following a postwar pattern familiar to all students of American history, came the extraordinary Taft-Hartley law.

This law did more than deprive labor unions and their members of benefits given them by the Wagner Act. It made them weaker than they were before the passage of the great charter. It did this in three ways:

First, by relieving employers of existing duties to their workers;

Second, by imposing new disabilities upon employees and their organizations; and Third, by declaring different rules of law for similar conduct on the part of employers and employees, the most significant of which are described below. In the guise of mutuality it created on the Labor Board a gigantic police court, eliminated traditional forms of self-help by workingmen, revived the temporary injunction against labor, created criminal sanctions, and interfered with basic civil liberties.

Certain of these statutory provisions in the Taft-Hartley law aim at a general weakening of the bargaining unit and the collective labor agreement. Thus certain employees are completely deprived of their collective bargaining right and protection against discrimination. I refer to supervisory employees, to so-called agricultural laborers, and to striking employees whose union failed to give the technical strike notices required by the statute. That is section 8 (d) of the statute.

Other employees are required to bargain in separate groups of their desires or past bargaining history. The closed shop is made illegal and the right to demand a union shop is attained only after a cumbersome procedure which leaves the employer free to reject it. A gigantic pretense, consisting of 17,958 union-shop elections has thus been made in 1 year, giving the workers the right to decide whether they are to be governed by a union shop, but permitting the employer to retain his veto power. It is no wonder that during this period both the Board and the unions and employers had the opportunity and time to conduct only 3,319 representation elections, as compared with the 17,958 union-shop elections. The union shop itself, as we have learned, unfortunately, is limited to the collection of union dues, and the statutory union shop requires the discharge only of the dues delinquent. The troublemaker, the labor spy, the agent provocateur is protected so long as he pays to the union his periodic fee. Of course we know the content of the agreement is further restricted by unrealistic limitations imposed upon agreements for welfare plans and for the check-off of union dues, all of which has led to a great deal of litigation and arbitration.

The next group of statutory provisions directly reduce the permissible economic activities of workingmen. Thus, section 8 (b) (4) (C) has made it unlawful for workingmen to refuse to perform services for one employer in an effort to compel another to bargain with a union unless it has actually received a Board certification. This is the law today even though no other union may be the certified bargaining representative. This, even if the strike is in support of a union chosen by the employees.

Section 8 (b) (4) (A) of the present law—the committee will notice I am interpolating here—is more comprehensive and far more reprehensible. It forbids any strike or refusal to handle goods where an objective is to force an employer to cease doing business with or handling the products of another person. Thus, employees who are members of a union in one plant are compelled to work upon nonunion products of another employer with whom their union is in dispute. No matter how unethical the conduct of the nonunion employer may be, regardless of the extent of his unfair labor practices, his product is given statutory immunity once it leaves his nonunion plant. This is the revival of the Bedford-Stone and Duplex cases in their literal form. Can we do better than quote from Mr. Justice Brandeis' statement that:

> The propriety of the union's conduct can hardly be doubted by one who believes in the organization of labor.

The language of the statute is so vague and so broad, and the Board's general counsel so unsympathetic to labor that he has applied the section to prevent workers from refusing to do actual strike-breaking. Only a long trial in a Federal court was able to give the coup de grâce to this theory (Douds v. Metropolitan Federation of Architects, 75 F. Supp. 672), in which I happened to have been involved. But certainly the result of that trial would not prevent variations of this interpretation of the statute from flowering in this statutory atmosphere.

Again, the Board has construed the no-strike provisions of the law to prohibit peaceful picketing. On what possible theory should we interfere with the basic right to peacefully publicize the existence of a dispute? Indeed, Congress, we had thought, attempted to protect this right through section 8 (c) of the statute, which provides that—

> The expressing of any views, argument, or opinion, or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic, or visual form, shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice, under any of the provisions of this Act, if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

But although peaceful picketing was held to be without the protection of this provision, employer expressions, far more potent and inherently coercive have been given complete protection. This is hardly the mutuality which the statutory supporters use as their constant argument.

I think the committee should compare the freedom given to the employer to interfere in elections by antiunion letters warning employers of "their own future welfare," (in re Wrought Iron Range Co., No. 14–C–1197), of compelling employees in shifts to listen to antiunion speeches (in re Babcock v. Wilcox), with the Supreme Court's warning that:

> Slight suggestions as to the employees' choice between unions may have telling effect among men who know the consequences of incurring the employees' strong displeasure.

That is the I. A. M. versus N. L. R. B. case, 311 U. S. 72. And I believe the opinion was that of either Mr. Justice Douglas or Mr. Justice Jackson.

Again, the disparity in treatment under this law is shown by the application of the agency theory. Congress in 1932 had recognized by the Norris-LaGuardia Act that labor unions, by their very nature, could not be made responsible for actions, unratified and unauthorized, of their many thousands of members or of thier hundreds of affiliates.

The reasoning behind the Norris-LaGuardia Act was plain and, I think, incontrovertible and, I think, corporate and other employers have unlimited power, and have the right to select the agents who will represent them in their business, but labor unions are voluntary associations whose members have joined voluntarily, to receive the benefits of association. The average union does not, and indeed cannot, examine the qualifications of every applicant. They cannot sift the occasional agent provocateur from the honest union man. Surely he was not hired to represent the union by virtue of his admittance to membership unless, of course, he holds a position or office, or a position of trust, in the union.

Yet section 301 of the Taft-Hartley Act seeks to recreate this artificial responsibility which the Norris-LaGuardia Act eliminated. The Board has drawn blood from this doctrinal stone by holding a union liable for a fracas engaged in by individual workingmen who were picketing. On the other hand, in several recent cases, employers have been relieved of liability for the acts of supervisory employees who indubitably were their agents.

It will be recolled that under the Wagner Act the Board originally held that only strikers could vote. That was the original Sartorious Doctrine. The pendulum, however, has been swung the other way completely by section 9 (c) (3) of this law, which holds that only the replacements have the right to vote. But since Senator Taft has confessed error on this point in the hearings now recently concluded, I suppose that nothing more need be said.

The revival of the injunction has, of course, been the most spectacular evidence of disparity of treatment between employee and employer. The emergency strike provisions of the law, which required a half dozen times in passage, are intended to settle economic disputes by punishing the workers rather than by seeking economic solutions. They certainly offer no incentive either to the employers or the Government to seek the settlement of a dispute, since any inconvenience to either may be disposed of by injunction.

Far more serious are the provisions of the act relating to the issuance of injunctions in nonemergency situations. Section 10 (j) of the existing law authorizes the NLRB to seek a temporary injunction in its discretion whenever it issues a complaint of unfair labor practice against a union or an employer. Section 10 (l) requires the Board to ask a Federal court for such an injunction in certain instances involving only unions. This has resulted in a revival of the injunction to an extent undreamed of even in the pre-Norris-LaGuardia Act days. For the quantum of proof to be given the Federal court is even less than that which historically supported the temporary injunction. Its duration—this is the most serious part of the section—its duration is completely within the discretion of the Board, since an injunction issued by a Federal court expires only upon the issuance of a Board decision in the main case. And there is nothing in the law which says that the Board ever has to issue a decision, and it certainly has taken a long time in some of the injunction cases, and has been severely criticized by one of the courts of appeals for a delay which has occurred since the temporary injunction.

In other words, the appeal from the temporary injunction reached the appeal court despite the ordinary delays that are supposed to follow from court procedures before the Board had a chance to decide the case.

Such injunctions, I should also point out, have remained in effect even where trial examiners in the main case before the Board have held that the Board's general counsel was in error and that the workingmen were not violating the law. But the workingman had no power to go back to the court and say, "The trial examiner has ruled that we were all right."

The Board's answer would have been, "Wait until the Board decides the case."

As a result, we find that each of the nearly 40 injunctions which have been issued against unions have prohibited peacefully conducted strikes and peaceful picketing.

Only one temporary injunction was issued against an employer, although two were sought by the Board, out of the two score that were sought, altogether. But the lack of mutuality goes much further than numbers. It is often forgotten that the injunction against workingmen prevent their engaging in the only forms of self-help which they possess in an economic battle. The statute is expressly intended to cut down their economic power, the power to strike, to ask the public for aid, and to picket. But the temporary injunction directed against an employer occupies a completely different position. It does not in the sightest impair his economic power in this battle. But the rare temporary injunction that is directed against him merely prevents the right of interference with collective bargaining against unfair labor practices, as in the case of General Motors, where the Board prevented an employer from unilaterally putting into effect a pension or insurance plan. But that was not the effect of economic warfare as such, because under this act he retains the traditional weapons of financial resources, as to which he has an absolute right, of course, and the right to run his business with replacements. No one is going to question that right. The point I make is that the employees are deprived of parallel rights.

Therefore, we say that even if Congress had made mandatory the issuance of temporary injunctions against employers as it did against unions, the effect would have been insignificant in the end result of a labor dispute.

May I ask the chairman how much time I have left? I do not want to try the patience of the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. You have time. Go ahead.

Mr. BOUDIN. Thank you.

The scope of these injunctions is reminiscent of those so critically analyzed by Professor, and now Mr. Justice, Frankfurter, and Mr. Nathan Greene in their celebrated text, "The Labor Injunction," published, I think, in 1931. They describe the dreadful history of the injunction weapon against labor: The summary procedure, the inability of Federal judges, competent in fields of technical law, to understand the social and indeed the human issues involved; the wide scope of the injunction order, both with respect to the activities that are forbidden and with respect to the persons who are enjoining it; the prohibition of peaceful strikes, picketings, circularization, and the heavy punishment for contempt.

Only last week we were reminded by Chief Judge Learned Hand, one of the great American judges and the head of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, that the lower Federal courts have not been always deft in their handling of the labor injunction. This was stated in the issuance of a temporary injunction, and he began his statement with a reminder of the complicated nature of labor disputes today and of labor problems in general.

Yet these tribunals, which have shown historically a lack of confidence, and unfortunately in many cases, a bias—but I am concerned here primarily with the lack of competence in understanding labor—have been returned to the arena, by the Taft-Hartley Act, from which Congress so wisely excluded them 17 years ago, and they have proceeded to do exactly what their predecessors did who acted without the impetus of the statute. They did worse.

In Douds v. Local 294 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, A. F. of L. (reported in 75 Fed. Supp. 414), the court enjoined in the union from inducing the employees of any employer to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of boycotting any person, any person in the world, or any business.

I think that Professor Frankfurter, now Mr. Justice Frankfurter, would be shocked at seeing the revival of the practice which he so brilliantly analyzed in 1931. And only recently, in a case I referred to, the contempt case, the Federal judge imposed a $20,000 conditional fine upon a union that was threatening to engage in picketing, a fine of $20,000 flat and $1,000 a day, and the arrest of the union's officers and agents if picketing occurred 1 day. And I refer to peaceful picketing.

Now, I should interpolate here, parallel with this injunctive weapon in the Taft-Hartley law, is created a right in employers to sue unions for engaging in certain peaceful strikes, certain peaceful boycotts and peaceful picketing, which are described in the act as unfair labor practices. One will search this statute in vain for the grant of equal relief to unions and their members against employers who are guilty of unfair labor practices.

In short, not only does this act revive the temporary injunction in a mandatory form against labor unions, but it gives the right to money damages to employers, but it does not give a parallel right to the unions or to the workingmen who have suffered great injury of unfair labor practices.

Now, of course, ultimately the individual employee will receive back pay 5 years from now when the Board and the courts have finally acted upon his discharge case. But that financial remuneration can hardly benefit him for the suffering that he has been engaged in during the preceding years. The union has no right to any money damages no matter how serious the unfair labor practices of the employer are, no matter how damaging it might be to the union, even if the union is destroyed.

Now, I come last to the third group of statutory provisions, which in the view of the guild finds no justification at all, even in this mutuality argument, which is urged, or which was urged—I hear it urged very little today—in support of the Taft-Hartley law. Those provisions are directed toward the general deterioration of trade-union effectiveness.

They have no place in a labor statute. They basically belong in a civil liberties statute and in a statute which will protect these rights rather than take them away.

One celebrated example, well known to the committee, is, of course, the prohibition of trade-union expenditures in political campaigns, which the proposed bill, H. R. 2032, adequately handles. It handles it very well, as a matter of fact. I need not comment upon that, since its constitutionality was saved only by the whittling down by the Supreme Court of a not unreasonable construction of the Taft-Hartley law as read. The Court clearly intimated that if the Taft-Hartley law read as we thought it read, the political expenditures section would have been held unconstitutional.

But equally notorious and even more shocking in this subject upon which the guild has repeatedly taken a position, is the infamous statute 9 (h), which has established a purgatory oath for all unions who would use the processes of the Board.

This oath, to be taken by all union officers, interferes directly with freedom of speech, of belief, and of association. It falls, we think, before the brilliant and frequently quoted declaration of Mr. Justice Jackson in the Barnette case:

> If there is any fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty, can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, or religion or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein.

The Board has admitted in litigation on this subject involving a variety of unions that there was no evidence of such clear and present danger before the Congress, which is normally relied upon to justify this type of infringement or any other basic infringement of basic first-amendment rights.

On the other hand, it has been suggested by the Board that section 9 (h) is really not as bad as it appears to be, because it merely prevents noncomplying unions from using a governmental facility. It merely deprives them of a governmental privilege. If this were so, it would still be abhorrent to any believer in our form of government. Imagine a court of a grand jury refusing to hear anyone who has failed to pass a political test.

But section 9 (h) goes far more down the line in the sanctions which it imposes and in its capacity to destroy great labor unions. For the Board has kept from the ballot unions who were the indubitable choice of the employees involved. In one recent case, a union selected by a minority of the workers replaced and established collective bargaining agents. Like all repressive measures, section 9 (h) has had the self-generative effect upon its administrators. The Board has continually expanded its application. It has limited the rights of employees to file unfair labor practice charges of certain types because they are members of noncomplying unions, even though the section relates to unions and says nothing about employers or about employees.

The Board has held that a complying national union cannot be certified if it has noncomplying local unions who also engage in collective bargaining. This, by the way, is not stated in section 9 (h). And when in one case it was shown that the locals had no bargaining function and therefore could not even come under the Board's interpretation of section 9 (h), the Board changed its rules in the middle of litigation by ruling that the mere existence of the locals prevented the certification of the national union.

Now, there are many other sanctions which flow from section 9 (h). A noncomplying union, as the committee knows, cannot have a union security election. It therefore cannot have the union shop. I have indicated the guild's view with respect to the weaknesses of the union-shop clause, but even this weak clause cannot be secured by a union which has not complied with section 9 (h). Then, of course, if the union cannot be on the ballot, its status and its contracts, if it has any left, are deprived of the protection which the Board gives to complying unions. Further, when the other union is certified, as it normally will, being the only union on the ballot, the noncomplying union will find itself forbidden to engage in a strike, picketing, or in a boycott, under the administrative and judicial construction of section 8 (b) (4), which I referred to before.

These affidavits, in the view of the guild, are a form of pressure upon union leaders to abandon the usual standard they employ to evaluate leadership—the quality and consistency of performance in the interests of the union members—and to apply instead a standard of no definition and of vague suspicion.

The standard has no definition because of the variety of meanings to be given to the word "Communist," and to the clause "believe in the overthrow of the Government by force and violence or by other illegal methods," to use the language of the affidavit.

Section 9 (h) introduces for the first time in our history, although we have experienced other repressive measures, of course, the concept that Government may make political belief a determinant by which members of a voluntary organization, labor or nonlabor, should choose their leadership. It is a concept fraught with danger to our democracy. It is but a short step from the outlawry of freedom of thought in our political life since it proceeds on the assumption that Americans cannot be trusted to choose their leaders.

It is particularly insulting to American workers because they alone have been told that they are not wise enough to manage their own affairs, which must be managed for them by Senators and Congressmen. But I would regard it as degrading to any group to be told that they must file affidavits with respect to their Americanism.

In practice, section 9 (h) has actually generated, not settled, industrial disputes. It has created intense bitterness within the ranks of labor. Unions have been encouraged to fight or raid other unions, with the employer lined up against one or both. Employers have frequently used noncompliance as a pretext for refusing to bargain with the chosen representatives of the workers.

The committee will recall that section 9 (h) was really an accident, a sport. It was not disclosed by Senator Taft in the original legislation, and it came through in the methods of legislative procedure, which this committee is more aware of than I, of course.

For these reasons, among many others which time prohibits our discussing, we believe that section 9 (h) requires special condemnation and should fall with the entire Taft-Hartley law.

Now for our conclusion. Prior to the adoption of the Taft-Hartley law, years of bitter struggle had succeeded in setting this Nation on a path toward a sound labor policy founded on the collective bargaining process. The Wagner Act, based on recognition of the inadequacy of the bargaining power of the individual worker in relation to the modern corporate employer, gave legal sanction and protection to the right to organize and bargain collectively. The Norris-LaGuardia Act sought to eliminate from the Federal courts the use of the injunction process as a bar to peaceful, collective, economic action by workers. It did not protect disorderly acts or unlawful acts or criminal acts.

Even before the Taft-Hartley law, a powerful segment of American industry and its congressional spokesmen conducted an unrelentless drive to undermine the Wagner Act, limit and frustrate its operation, and encourage defiance of it and secure its repeal. By almost 100 injunction proceedings prior to the decision of 1937 affirming its constitutionality, and by a continued campaign of attack and evasion thereafter, these groups succeeded in preventing the Wagner Act from becoming in full sense the law of the land. The Taft-Hartley law represented the ultimate victory of these forces.

The Taft-Hartley law rests on principles basically antagonistic to the objectives sought in the national labor policy of the preceding decade. It seeks not to encourage but to impede organization and collective bargaining. It seeks not to discourage but to promote warfare between labor and management; and it seeks not to eliminate but to extend the operation of the antilabor injunction.

The evils of the Taft-Hartley law cannot be eliminated by minor revisions or by deletion or amendment of isolated statutory sections.

Its errors are ones of fundamental principle, purpose, and effect, and can be remedied only by total elimination of the entire statutory scheme and the return to the underlying principles of the Wagner Act.

The Lesinski bill is commended in its basic outline which embodies a repeal of the Taft-Hartley law and a reenactment of the Wagner Act. We urge that Congress enact the basic provisions of the Lesinski bill and reject any attempts to use the bill as a vehicle for salvaging any of the evils of the Taft-Hartley law.

The National Lawyers Guild appreciates the opportunity which it has been given by this committee to appear and testify on the critical subject of labor legislation. It desires to have incorporated in this record the accompanying printed statement which was submitted last month by it to the Senate Commitee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Thank you very much.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Boudin, on page 2 of your formal presentation, you use this language:

> This law did more than deprive labor unions and their members of benefits given them by the Wagner Act. It made them weaker than they were before the passage of that great charter.

Now, in this connection, I would like to call your attention to a radio forum conducted in Washington some days ago, participated in by President Green of the American Federation of Labor. In this forum he said now that we were in a fight to protect our American way of life and our American ideals against Communist onslaught, that this was the time that labor unions should be strong rather than weak. And he decried the weakening effect of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Do you and your group approve of President Green's stand in this matter?

Mr. BOUDIN. Unfortunately, although I heard that he talked on the radio, I missed the opportunity to hear him. I am here for the labor law committee of the guild. There are other committees of the guild which considered the problems to which you referred, the general civil liberties problem, the issues of communism, and so forth. I would not regard myself as authorized to express the views of the guild on that subject.

I may say, speaking generally, that it certainly appears clear to me that the strength of the labor unions is the strength of the country, and that in fighting any kind of force which would affect the democracy of this Nation and its institution, historically, labor unions have shown themselves, whether in the First World War or in the last World War—and I hope it will not be necessary in future periods—to represent the bulwark of our democracy. The experience which some of the members of this committee may know of labor during the last World War, the participation of law in the War Labor Board, the very small number of strikes that occurred during that period—all these could not possibly have occurred had not there been large, strong labor unions who were able to mobilize the forces of labor and to participate in the democratic functions of the War Labor Board.

Mr. BAILEY. The Chair yields to a question from Congressman Smith.

Mr. SMITH. You did not answer Mr. Bailey's question. He asked you about what Mr. Green said about communism.

Mr. BOUDIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Now, why not answer the question?

Mr. BOUDIN. I have already stated to the Chair that I am here to express the opinion of the guild. I am not here in an individual capacity on the subject of the Lesinski bill and on labor legislation. I am not here to discuss, nor am I authorized, and I regret, nor am I competent, to testify as to the position of the organization which I represent on various other issues. There are other committees of the guild which are authorized to express their views——

Mr. SMITH. Is it about communism? Is that it?

Mr. BOUDIN. I presume so. And if the committee desires to hear from other committees on these subjects, I am sure they will be available.

Mr. SMITH. But you are not here to answer Mr. Bailey's question?

Mr. BOUDIN. I am here to testify on a specific subject, and I think I have answered the question as well as I can.

Mr. BAILEY. I have one more question, Mr. Boudin. You mentioned the matter of the use of injunctions in labor disputes. I want to ask you if you think that mandatory injunction proceedings can ever be justified against labor.

Mr. BOUDIN. I believe definitely not. Even those persons who believe that injunctions should issue against labor unions in disputes agree, and I think the Board probably agrees, that the mandatory injunction is an impossible administrative and judicial weapon. The Board in many cases has felt that it might be unwise to go into court to seek an injunction, because of equities on the part of the employees or of the workingmen, or because it was a border-line case. But it has expressed itself openly as being under a duty to go into court to secure these injunctions. And only very wise judges, like Judge Simon Rifkin in the district court of New York and other judges have been able to pierce through this mandatory power and to realize that in certain definite situations an injunction cannot be issued. But I would say that the mandatory injunction is an evil always to be avoided—mandatory, I think you refer to, in the sense that the Board must go into court.

Mr. BAILEY. The Chair will retain the remainder of the time allocated.

At this time, have you any questions, Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. No, I have no questions. I will yield my time to Congressman Jacobs.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Boudin, in regard to the anti-Communist affidavit—you are a lawyer, as I understand it?

Mr. BOUDIN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. I came in late, but I understand you represent the Lawyers Guild.

Mr. BOUDIN. I so do, sir. I am chairman of its labor law committee, and am appearing in that capacity.

Mr. JACOBS. With regard to the anti-Communist affidavit requirement as prescribed in the Taft-Hartley law, have you ever considered that in connection with the constitutional inhibition against bills of attainder?

Mr. BOUDIN. Yes. On looking over my remarks, I noted that I omitted reliance upon that constitutional provision. I have always regarded section 9 (h) as being violative of that section, and in an article which the committee might be interested in, which I had published in the January 1948 issue of the New York University Law Quarterly Review, I discussed this statute from the point of view of the bill of attainder.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you happen to have a copy of that?

Mr. BOUDIN. Yes, and I will be glad to submit additional copies to the committee.

Mr. JACOBS. I would like to have a copy of it.

Now, in view of the rather forthright comments by some of the officials of the Communist Party that have been recently reported in the press, I wonder what your reaction would be to a bill that would forbid a Communist from holding office, either in a corporation or a labor union, not one which would withdraw the processes of the law from the organization in the event it had such an alternative, but that it would embody a provision of quo warranto by which you get rid of him? What would you think about that?

Mr. BOUDIN. Speaking as a lawyer, I think that would fall equally within the bill of attainder clause, because it would punish a named person or a selected group easily defined by depriving him of the right to hold office. I would not regard that as an appropriate means of enforcing the other laws of the United States.

Mr. JACOBS. What is your reaction to the statements that have been published recently by the officers of the Communist Party?

Mr. BOUDIN. I would prefer, if I might, not to give my own reaction, for the reasons that I think I have suggested. I am here really, and have prepared myself exclusively, for the purpose of analyzing the existing legislation from the point of view of labor legislation. We feel that civil liberties is not very far away, of course, from labor legislation. But I am here actually in a representative capacity and only in that capacity.

Mr. JACOBS. With the understanding that you speak only your own view upon the subject, I would be interested in your reaction, if you feel like stating it. I will not press you.

Mr. BOUDIN. I would prefer, at least so long as I am here in this capacity, to express no views. I will be glad to discuss with the committee on another occasion my own views on any other subject.

Mr. JACOBS. This suggestion that I have made would not be one which would have the effect of depriving the processes of the law to the organization for any wrong, which might be committed against it and its members, as the Taft-Hartley law does at this time. Do you feel that that is so?

Mr. BOUDIN. I do feel, Congressman, because I want to be candid, that the provision which would deprive labor unions of their officers by eliminating the officers as such rather than by eliminating the benefits of the act and imposing sanctions on the union, is merely another way of doing the same thing. As a matter of fact, it is probably true that the way to which you referred would be even more obviously unconstitutional. If there is a right of freedom of association—and I believe there is, and that workingmen have a right to choose their own representatives—then that right is interfered with whether you say the representatives can be eliminated by a quo warranto proceeding or whether you say that the representatives can be eliminated indirectly by this type of procedure which we now have in the statute.

Now, I think that the right of association is so fundamental that the workingmen themselves must have the power to determine whom they desire as their officers.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think that the right of association really includes the right to occupy positions of power in our economy?

Mr. BOUDIN. Unless one were prepared to say that one could not run a business if he were a Communist, to use the Communists as an example, then I think you have to say that Government should not interfere with the right to earn a livelihood, whether it is in a labor union, whether it is in an employers' association, or whether it is a business.

Mr. JACOBS. I am not, of course, talking about the right to earn a living so much as I am the right to occupy an official position, not only in a labor union, but in a corporation, of one who is proven to be disloyal. I would condition it upon that.

Mr. BOUDIN. I think I can meet that in two ways. We are probably in agreement, even though I may phrase it in terms of balancing. First, I think it clear that political views should under no circumstances be established by the Government as a condition to holding a position of any kind. We will pass the field of Government employment, as to which I am not an expert and on which many studies have been made, and will consider the question of employment, whether in labor unions, in corporations, or associations. Under none of those circumstances, do I regard it as proper for the Government to say, "You shall not work in this grocery store, or you cannot work in that labor union as an officer or as an employee or a business agent unless you fall within the Government's views as to the proper political point of view."

I make that statement categorically, and I would not withdraw from it in respect to any business.

Mr. JACOBS. That would hold true of a man even though he is convicted, so long as he has his liberty and is available to work. I would agree with you on that.

Mr. BOUDIN. When you get to a man who is disloyal to the Government, than it may be that the Government can move in and impose certain restrictions and conditions. But the disloyalty must be proven, not on the basis of what Congress says is an appropriate standard of political views, but by an appropriate trial pursuant to a valid statute in which a man has actually been convicted of a crime.

Mr. JACOBS. I wonder now at that point if our paths are converging again. Would you say that a statute providing quo warranto to oust anyone from a position as an officer of a corporation or a union, should be provided upon proof of his disloyalty?

Mr. BOUDIN. Upon proof that his disloyalty is shown by conviction in an American court before an American jury. With that modification, yes. The use of the word "disloyalty" is, of course, as we know from our experience of the last 20 years, very dangerous.

Mr. JACOBS. It is very broad; that is true.

Mr. BOUDIN. If we have a conviction upon charges properly made in the form of an indictment, whether it was of a Communist or anybody else, then I think we might well consider the question as to whether a conviction of a person, not necessarily for disloyalty, but for other reasons, might not be a bar to occupying important positions. You might still——

Mr. JACOBS. Would you not——

Mr. BOUDIN. You might still, if I may interrupt you, because I want to be sure that I am not going too far in the constitutional line—you might still meet constitutional problems, because I am not sure in a private business, for example, and one cannot say that a businessman who had been convicted, and I might say that some have been under the antitrust laws—could not continue in his business. I am also not sure, speaking now from a constitutional point of view, whether you could say that regardless of the offense or of the crime, a labor union leader could be prevented from continuing in office. But at least, I am willing to assume that if you had a substantial crime, whether it was for disloyalty under the Smith Act or under some other statute and you had a conviction under that statute, then I think one might consider this problem again.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, what you are saying is that we have to be very careful in dealing with a very delicate question and keep the balance between civil rights and our protection against disloyalty on a pretty even balance, or we will go overboard one way or the other.

Mr. BOUDIN. Yes. And I am saying that Congress cannot establish any standard at all with regard to loyalty or disloyalty or political views in a labor relations statute or any other statute. Congress can establish a provision in a law under which a person who has been convicted of a crime before an American Federal district court, before an American jury, might be subject to certain disabilities.

Mr. JACOBS. Would you think, really, that a law that would prohibit a man from holding an office in a corporation, or an alien who had been convicted of a crime, having the effect of depriving the officer of a corporation of the right to continue in that office if he is convicted of violating the antitrust laws—then do you think that might actually have quite a deterring effect against the violation of the antitrust laws?

Mr. BOUDIN. It might have a deterring effect, but I think you would have to change the Constitution before it could be passed.

Mr. JACOBS. You think that might infringe upon the inhibition against bills of attainder?

Mr. BOUDIN. I am not sure it would be the inhibition against a bill of attainder in connection with the use of the antitrust laws, because there the question of a selected class, which is definable, and there the coloration of political views which normally goes with a bill of attainder, would not be present. I think that might be a violation, however, of the fifth amendment.

Mr. JACOBS. And even from a practical viewpoint, you might preclude some very good talent.

Mr. BOUDIN. Yes. I understand that most frequent violators of the antitrust laws are very competent businessmen.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, I would like to go to another subject, briefly. I have been quite interested in the unfair labor practice as it is described in section 8 (b) (4) (D), which is the craft jurisdictional dispute. I have read that very carefully and tried to examine it in reference to all of the other provisions of the Taft-Hartley law. There is a provision, 10 (k), for a determination by award of the Board when such a dispute arises. There is also a provision, the last sentence of 10 (l), which makes that mandatory injunction provision applicable where it is an appropriate remedy. Then, of course, if you go back, I think it is, to section 10 (j), where the discretionary injunction provision is, it provides for the remedy of the employer to enforce the law against the labor organization that might engage in a strike or a concerted stoppage of work or encouraging anyone to engage in such, in violation of section 8 (b) (4) (D).

Now, I have read the act very carefully in an effort to find where the union may enforce the award provided in section 10 (k) against the employer. I have not yet been able to find it. I wonder if you have examined the law in reference to that matter?

Mr. BOUDIN. I have not found it, either. I have been looking at it while you were talking, Congressman.

Mr. JACOBS. Have you thought of that problem?

Mr. BOUDIN. Actually, I have not. One of the reasons I have not given it consideration, which I suppose I should have, is that as I recall it, the Board has never applied that section; that is, applied section 8 (b) (4) (D).

Mr. JACOBS. Yes. I understand that it has in one case.

Mr. BOUDIN. It may have in a recent case.

Mr. JACOBS. In a rather recent case, I understand that it has.

Mr. BOUDIN. I got the impression, on looking over the testimony of the Chairman of the Board before the Senate Committee that he also——

Mr. JACOBS. May I interrupt you at that point, to say that if you have not given it consideration, it would not be fair to go into it here now, at this time.

Mr. BOUDIN. Thank you.

Mr. JACOBS. It is a highly technical and complex matter.

Mr. BOUDIN. I plead inexpertness on that point.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. I want to ask you a question or two about the so-called emergency strike.

Now, there has been quite a bit of sentiment created throughout the country for what is designated as "a delay" in stoppage of work, where a strike might create a national emergency. I find that a good many people have not thought beyond the delay. But I can conceive of the possibility of the dispute's still being in existence at the end of the period of delay.

Have you thought along the lines of what we are going to do when we arrive at that point?

Mr. BOUDIN. I do not think we can do anything.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, we could delay it further.

Mr. BOUDIN. Well, for a while. You cannot delay it indefinitely.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, let us stop and think of that a little.

Mr. BOUDIN. All right.

Mr. JACOBS. You say we cannot?

Maybe we could. I am not talking about whether it is fair to do so, but I am talking about what he should do.

Mr. BOUDIN. I see. You are not referring to what the present statutory language embodies?

Mr. JACOBS. No.

Mr. BOUDIN. You are talking about the power of Government?

Mr. JACOBS. I am talking about that later provision which says that if the event is not settled it shall be reported to Congress—and I presume that it is not presented to Congress just for us to talk about at a tea party; is that correct?

Mr. BOUDIN. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. We have arrived at that point now.

The next step would naturally be compulsory settlement; is that right?

Mr. BOUDIN. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Then we would want to fix a wage that would be fair to all parties concerned.

Mr. BOUDIN. I am afraid that that is what Congress would have to do.

Mr. JACOBS. We would have to do that if we say the men cannot strike.

Mr. BOUDIN. The alternative would be to say that the men cannot strike and that they would have to work at the wages which they had been working at. I take it that the point you are making is that you are creating of Congress a compulsory arbitration body?

Mr. JACOBS. No; I am going a little further than that. I am carrying it still further than that.

What is going to happen with those people that have been working on wages that we fix, when they come back here and say, "This is not enough for us to work for, to buy shoes for our kids. Will you fix the price of shoes?"

Mr. BOUDIN. That might be a good idea.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. There are a lot of people who did not like OPA in this country, as I recall.

Mr. BOUDIN. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. I just wondered if some of our people who have been urging these Taft-Hartley provisions have thought that thing through very carefully.

Mr. BOUDIN. As a matter of fact, I have not thought of that aspect, either. But you were quite right. If you are going to begin wage regulation by Congress on this scale, you must include price regulation and you must include a variety of other forms of regulation. I am glad you pointed that out. I had not thought of that.

Mr. JACOBS. You think we might be getting into some pretty deep water there?

Mr. BOUDIN. Yes; but, of course, that can be postponed for about 6 months.

Mr. JACOBS. What?

Mr. BOUDIN. That can be postponed for about 6 months until the next emergency strike arises.

Mr. JACOBS. But if we start down that road, we are liable to meet that problem.

Mr. BOUDIN. I do, however, think that it is important to meet that problem now before we meet the emergency strike and then have to consider the price regulation, the wage regulation, and all other regulations to which you have referred.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, I thought about those things pretty much in connection with some of these questionnaires that people mumble over the radio and ask people to answer "yes" or "no" on.

That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. No questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Boudin, did I hear you mention the name of Justice Brandeis?

Mr. BOUDIN. Yes, you did, sir.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I guess you would consider him a capable and fine protector of civil liberties, and so on?

Mr. BOUDIN. Yes. And I have read many things that he has said.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Do you agree with the majority of the things that he has said in connection with the protection of an individual's rights, liberties, and so on?

Mr. BOUDIN. Yes.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I would like to read to you from Justice Brandeis' book, the Brandeis Guide to the Modern World, edited by Alfred Lief, and published by Little, Brown & Co., in Boston, Mass. Here is what Justice Brandeis said. I think it is rather interesting, as we are considering the writing of a labor law.

> It is an essential condition of the advance of trade unionism that the unions shall renounce violence, restriction of output, and the closed shop. The abuses of trade unionism, as we have known them with their violence, restriction of output, and their lack of constructive policy, are in large part the result of the fact that they have been engaged in a bitter struggle for existence.
> When public opinion is brought actively to the support of labor unions, these abuses will, I believe, tend rapidly to disappear, but the American people should not and will not accept unionism if it involves the closed shop. They will not consent to the exchange of the tyranny of the employer for the tyranny of the employees. Unionism, therefore, cannot make a great advance, until it abandons the closed shop, and it cannot accept the open shop as the alternative. The open shop means the disintegration of the union. I think there is no man or body of men whose intelligence or whose character will stand in absolute power, and I should no more think of giving absolute power to unions than I should of giving to capital monopoly power. I believe that experience will teach the labor unions that they can never succeed in a large way as long as they insist upon the closed shop. The closed shop seems to me opposed to our ideas of liberty as presenting a monopoly of labor which might become as objectionable a monopoly as that of capital.

You mentioned Justice Brandeis, and I thought that was a very interesting comment on this whole matter of the closed shop and the power, and so on, and I was just presenting it for your consideration in partial reply to your apparent dislike of every part of the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. BOUDIN. I was aware of what Mr. Justice Brandeis has said on that subject. As a matter of fact, I assumed that some comment would be made by the committee when I mentioned our reliance upon a decision of his. I do not, however, agree that the closed shop carries with it the dangers or the evils to which this great judge has referred, and I think the experience of the last 50 years has shown that. The closed shop has been a power for good. I think no one can question the fact that in the typographical situation the loss of the closed shop has resulted in this terrible period that occurred.

The closed shop was basically a stabilizing influence in that industry and many others. Now, I would be the first to admit that there are many abuses with respect to the closed shop, with respect to the open shop, and the union shop, and with respect to all varieties of labor relations.

Those abuses, however, should not be considered without remembering that there are many advantages in the thing, and they permit the employees to share the load of a union which is working for all of us. And I suppose this is one of those philosophical arguments that could be begun here and continued day after day, and perhaps I should merely have contented myself by saying I did not agree and had not agreed with the remarks made on the closed shop.

Mr. McConnell. I yield the balance of my time to Mr. Smith.

Mr. Bailey. Mr. Smith?

Mr. Smith. What is your educational background?

Mr. Boudin. I am a graduate of the College of the City of New York. I am a graduate of the St. Johns University Law School in New York. I am a member of the Bar Association of the City of New York, and of the county lawyers association, in addition to being a member of the National Lawyers Guild.

Mr. Smith. What is your law firm?

Mr. Boudin. I beg your pardon?

Mr. Smith. What is your law firm?

Mr. Boudin. My firm is now known Neuburger, Shapiro, Rabinowitz & Boudin. I was formerly associated with the firm of Boudin, Cohn & Glickstein, a law firm representing labor unions and other clients.

Mr. Smith. Is the majority of your practice in the labor field?

Mr. Boudin. Oh, yes, the vast majority. That is why I made a point of indicating at the beginning that I was a practicing lawyer representing labor unions, but that I was speaking with the authority of and subject to the mandate of the Lawyers Guild. It is only my experience, I think, as a labor lawyer that can give emphasis to what I say.

Mr. Smith. You placed great emphasis this morning on freedom of speech.

Mr. Boudin. Yes, I did, because that is the emphasis placed by the Lawyers Guild at its recent convention.

Mr. Smith. Then why do you want to deny the employer the right of free speech?

Mr. Boudin. I do not want to deny the employer the right of free speech, Mr. Smith. I do, however, feel that in certain situations, such as the Babcock-Wilcox case, to which I referred, the employer's economic power is inherent in his expression of a point of view. Where, for example, the employer calls the employees down in shift after shift to listen to antiunion speeches and to be warned directly or indirectly that there will be a discharge or a loss of benefits if a union were to win an election, I would regard that as inseparable from coercion.

Mr. Smith. Now, I am not talking about intimidation. I am talking about the right of an employer to make a speech any place, any time, on what he thinks the benefits of unions are.

Mr. Boudin. You see, I think it depends on the situation. Before the Taft-Hartley Act was passed there were two kinds of situations with which the Board and the court dealt. One was a pure statement by the employer of his views; he did not like unions; he did not like this union, and so forth.

The other was in a context of coercion in which the employer clearly was threatening. I say "clearly," although it may have been incorrect. But the understanding was clear that if the employees selected a union, they would be subject to economic harm. It is that kind of situation which is today protected by section 8 (c) of the Taft-Hartley

Act, and which I think does not come within the realm of free speech as such. I will agree with you that in the absence of a background for coercion or the formulation of a context of coercion, speech should be free whether it is of the union or of the employer. I think it has to be handled on a case-by-case basis, and that the section such as 8 (c) has been given such breadth that unfair labor practices which the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit of New York recognized were a pressure on employers, are now protected by the statute. I do not take the rigid point of view which might be suggested by your question.

Mr. SMITH. You stated a while ago something about a peaceful boycott. Now, you just tell me what you mean by a peaceful boycott, which implies that there are other boycotts that are not peaceful.

Mr. BOUDIN. I assume that a boycott is a refusal to handle the goods of an employer or a refusal to work on the goods of an employer. Only yesterday I received a release from the National Labor Relations Board involving such a case. It involved local 807 of the Teamsters, an A. F. of L. union, and the Schultz Refrigerating Service, Inc. According to this, Schultz locked out the employees because he did not want to deal with the union. The employees then picketed the Schultz trucks, asking people presumably not to deal with Schultz. That was regarded by the trial examiner of the Board, who said it was a perfectly peaceful activity, as, however, coming within the scope of the secondary boycott provision. That I will regard as a provision which he apparently recognized as inequitable, but that he was forced to rule on, involving the peaceful secondary boycotts to which I referred.

I recognize that in the course of labor disputes there can be disorderly acts and violence, and I was attempting to make a distinction between that situation and the other.

Mr. SMITH. I take it from your testimony here this morning that you do not think the Government ever has a right to demand a non-Communist oath from anyone, Government employees or anybody else?

Mr. BOUDIN. No. You recall that I stated with respect to the Government employees, I believe there are resolutions in the committees of the guild that have dealt with that particular problem. It is not my field and I do not want to express the view of the guild on the subject. I am limiting myself to this problem of labor relations. And when Congressman Jacobs, I believe it was, asked me about businesses generally, or corporations, then I moved into the field of employers.

Mr. SMITH. I am talking about government.

Mr. BOUDIN. Yes. Well, I am answering you that I am not authorized to indicate the views of the guild with respect to government.

Mr. SMITH. Is it not the views of the guild that the Government does not have the right to demand a loyalty oath?

Mr. BOUDIN. No. I have told you already that I am not authorized to indicate the views of the guild.

Mr. SMITH. Do you not think that you could give them?

Mr. BOUDIN. No. I do not think that I can fairly present those views. But if you want, I could have a representative of the guild appear before this committee and indicate his views on the subject.

Mr. SMITH. You are the president of the guild, are you not?

Mr. BOUDIN. No. I have a much lesser office. I am chairman of the labor law committee of the guild. I assure you that I have never been the president of the guild of New York or elsewhere.

Mr. SMITH. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Morton?

Mr. MORTON. No questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you for your appearance.

Mr. BOUDIN. May I thank the committee for its courtesy?

Mr. BAILEY. At this time the committee will be forced to recess due to the fact that there is a roll call, and a vote will be taken soon on the rent-control bill. It is necessary that the members of the committee be on the floor of the House.

The committee will stand in recess until 3 o'clock this afternoon.

(Whereupon, at 11:30 a. m. the committee recessed until 3 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(Pursuant to recess, the subcommittee reconvened at 3 p. m.)

Mr. BAILEY. For the record and for the information of the members of the committee, and the witnesses who are here to testify, the chairman wishes to advise that the House is still in session and the Committee of the Whole is still considering the rent control bill.

The committee cannot go back in session until they have disposed of that, and I think that will be accomplished about 5 o'clock.

So, the committee will stand in recess until 5 o'clock this afternoon.

(Whereupon, at 3:05 p. m. the subcommittee recessed until 5 p. m. of the same day.)

(Pursuant to recess, the subcommittee reconvened at 5 p. m.)

Mr. BAILEY. The subcommittee will be in order.

For the information of our witnesses, who have been summoned here, may I state that the House is still in session, and on the motion to resubmit the rent control bill, roll call is being taken on it and there will still be a roll call on final passage.

The committee will stand recessed until 7 o'clock. We will start the hearings promptly at 7, without fail.

(Whereupon at 5:05 p. m. the subcommittee recessed until 7 p. m. of the same day.)

NIGHT SESSION

(Pursuant to recess, the subcommittee reconvened at 7 p. m.)

Mr. KELLEY (presiding). The subcommittee will please be in order.

Is Mr. Gabriel here?

Mr. GABRIEL. Present.

Mr. KELLEY. Before you proceed I have a statement from Mr. Richard J. Gray, president of the building and construction trades department, American Federation of Labor, and without objection I would like to insert it in the record.

(The statement referred to will be found in the appendix following close of today's testimony. See p. 915.)

Mr. KELLEY. I also have a statement by Sal B. Hoffmann, president Upholsterers' International Union of North America, American Federation of Labor, that we would also like to insert in the record.

(The statement referred to will be found in the appendix following close of today's testimony. See p. 920.)

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Gabriel, you may proceed.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES C. GABRIEL, REPRESENTING VARIOUS LABOR ORGANIZATIONS WHICH COMPRISE THE EASTERN SEABOARD ALLIANCE OF TELEPHONE UNIONS, ACCOMPANIED BY ABRAHAM WEINER, COUNSEL

Mr. GABRIEL. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is Charles C. Gabriel. I am making this presentation on behalf of the various labor organizations which comprise the Eastern Seaboard Alliance of Telephone Unions.

The Eastern Seaboard Alliance of Telephone Unions consists of eight labor organizations which are the recognized collective-bargaining representatives of upward of 70,000 telephone workers in the Bell telephone system.

The labor organizations which comprise the Eastern Seaboard Alliance of Telephone Unions are the following:

The United Telephone Organizations, representing all plant department employees of the New York Telephone Co., down-State area;

The Empire State Telephone Union, representing all plant employees of the New York Telephone Co., up-State area;

The Telephone Workers Union of New Jersey, representing all plant department employees of the New Jersey Bell Telephone Co.;

The Federation of Telephone Workers of Pennsylvania, representing all plant department employees of the Bell Telephone Co. of Pennsylvania;

The Ohio Federation of Telephone Workers, representing all employees in the plant, traffic and accounting departments of the Ohio Bell Telephone Co., northeastern area;

The Maryland Federation of Telephone Workers, representing all plant department employees of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. of Baltimore;

The International Brotherhood of Telephone Workers, representing all plant department employees of the New England Bell Telephone Co.;

The Connecticut Union of Telephone Workers, representing all employees of the Southern New England Bell Telephone Co.

Telephone workers, through their collective-bargaining representatives, desire to put themselves on record favoring outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley law.

At the same time, they desire to put themselves on record with proposals regarding two situations with which they have been intimately involved. These two situations are:

(1) National emergency disputes.

(2) Jurisdictional disputes.

National emergency disputes: The collective-bargaining representatives of telephone workers negotiate with the most powerful and the largest corporate empire that exists in this country—the Bell system.

The operations of the Bell System are Nation-wide in scope and it has been recognized that a labor dispute in the vital field of communi cations presents the country with a national emergency situation. The President of the United States, in 1948, appointed a Board of Inquiry under title II of the Labor-Management Relations Act, when a Nation-wide work stoppage in the long-lines department of the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. appeared imminent. Thus, telephone workers and their collective-bargaining agents are directly affected by the national emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley law and, consequently, base their observations upon concrete experience.

The national emergency sections of the Taft-Hartley law are completely inadequate to deal with national emergency situations. They are inadequate because they have been based upon a false philosophy, namely, that the way to settle a dispute having Nation-wide repercussions is to sit on one side of the parties and prevent that party alone from exercising its economic strength. Of course, a dispute is quieted by slugging one of the disputants but when he again regains his senses his grievances still exist and become aggravated by reason of the frustrating and unfairly one-sided treatment to which he has been subjected.

The entire approach which gave rise to the national emergency sections of the Taft-Hartley law must be altered if a valid, fair, American law, dealing with such situations is to be enacted.

The first step is to remove the injunction—the black-jack which is used entirely on one of the parties to the dispute. The unfairness of the injunction is apparent if we change the picture and substitute knock-out pressure upon management for the present system of slugging labor. Actually, the injunction forces labor to continue to work for management on the latter's terms. Suppose a law were enacted providing forcibly for management to accede to labor's terms. The deafening roar of protest that would then arise would engulf all of Washington.

It is obvious, therefore, that pressure upon one side to a dispute alone is not only unfair: it also stores up resentment without solving the dispute, thereby leading eventually to explosive results.

It is submitted that a new approach is necessary.

Instead of using force and emotion, the substitute of reason, education and scientific approach is suggested.

The present law calls for ad hoc boards of inquiry. Various amendments proposed also call for ad hoc boards. Such boards obviously come into a technical, highly explosive situation with little or no background knowledge of the issues, the parties or the grievances.

It is suggested, therefore, that in place of ad hoc boards for national emergency disputes, there should be created permanent panels for those industries directly affecting the public interest, such as public utilities, coal, steel, and atomic energy.

The objection may be raised that the cost involved would be too great. It is pointed out that the cost to a nation of one nation-wide steel strike or one nation-wide coal strike would be far greater than the cost of maintaining such panels. Newspaper reports have estimated the daily cost of the recent Philadelphia transit strike as running into millions.

Such permanent panels would be infinitely far better equipped to deal with emergency situations than an ad hoc board, much in the same manner that experts will accomplish results in their field where tyros will only botch things up.

What should the powers and duties of such permanent panels be? Inasmuch as they are permanent, they would constantly be collecting full and complete data in that industry to which they have been assigned.

Many disputes are of the result of inaccurate data, or even worse, data that is collected by one side and is unavailable to the other. In the telephone field this a sore point. With its immense wealth and facilities for research, the Bell telephone system is capable of producing a vast amount of statistical material that cannot be refuted or even scientifically and accurately examined by the comparatively poor labor unions in that field. Many industries which would and do unhesitatingly supply facts and figures to the Bell telephone system would and do just as unhesitatingly refuse to supply such facts and figures to the various labor unions in that field. Consequently, frustrated by lack of data and scientific knowledge, emotion is substituted for a weapon. The intrusion of emotion and strong feelings results in the dispute. Incidentally, the cost of acquiring this statistical data by the Bell system which operates public utilities ultimately is reflected in the rate bill to the public. It is, therefore, urged that public expenditures in this regard be used for the acquiring of statistical data which can be used by labor as well as management and which will ultimately inure to the benefit of the public.

The intrusion of emotion due to lack of knowledge can be entirely eliminated by providing that the permanent panels should collect and supply all data involving that particular field to which they have been appointed. Thus, the representatives of both the employees and management would equally have access to full, complete, accurate, and scientific data.

Provision should be made for the panels to make studies involving the various facets of union-management problems and to make the results thereof available to both parties. Such studies should be made with an eye toward solving the underlying causes that give rise to labor disputes in that particular field.

Furthermore, all records of data and the results of studies should be made public.

It is submitted that this educational feature alone will serve to settle many disputes because problems openly approached with reason and complete statistical data are far more capable of being solved than if approached with lack of knowledge bolstered by nothing more than blind strength of conviction.

In addition to its educational or statistical-collecting-and-furnishing functions, the permanent panel should, of course, be given powers to handle and hear disputes and to issue recommendations.

Certain Nation-wide issues no doubt will arise that the parties are unable to solve themselves. Where the present law calls for an ad hoc board of inquiry in such cases, it is submitted that the same powers of investigating the dispute and conducting hearings should be given to the permanent panels. Since these panels will constantly be involved in all the problems in their field, they will approach the dispute with the confidence that comes from knowledge. Furthermore, their recommendations will be based, not upon opinions that are newly arrived at, but upon opinions that have the secure foundation of long experience, knowledge, and facts. The parties themselves will have more confidence in a permanent panel that knows the problems and all the technical features involved than in an ad hoc board that no doubt will be influenced by various pressures when they suddenly find themselves with a national emergency problem in their laps.

The present Taft-Hartley provisions call for the ad hoc board of inquiry merely holding hearings and then stating the position of each party to the dispute. This is a useless gesture. The parties and the public know the positions. It is the solution of those positions that is sought.

It is, therefore, urged that the permanent panels should have the power to make recommendations and to give the reasons for such recommendations after conducting a hearing. Furthermore, such recommendations and reasons should be made public.

In summary, the above suggestions are for repeal of the present inadequate and unsound national emergency sections of the Taft-Hartley law and the enactment of new provisions calling for the following:

(1) Appointment of full-time permanent panels in various fields directly affecting the public interest instead of ad hoc boards.

(2) The permanent panels should have the following educational duties:

(a) Collection of all data relevant to their particular field;

(b) Making such data available to all parties and to the public;

(c) Making studies of the labor-management problems in their field with an eye toward the solution of the underlying causes that give rise to labor disputes in that field;

(d) Making the results of these studies available to the parties and to the public.

(3) In national emergency disputes, the panels should be given the following powers and duties:

(a) Conduct hearings with full subpena powers;

(b) Make recommendations with full reasons therefor;

(c) Make such recommendations and reasons public.

It may be objected that no power is given the Government to enjoin a strike when recommendations are not accepted.

In answer to this objection, it is submitted that in the past recommendations were made by ad hoc boards in situations fraught with emotion and high feelings. But the suggestions above are for the purpose of changing the entire atmosphere in which national emergency disputes may be resolved. Instead of an ad hoc board appointed to hear a single dispute, the matter is brought before a panel that is daily conversant with its job and which has been supplying both sides with educational and statistical material for a length of time. Where reason and education have been the accepted course of procedure and where all sides know they will get a fair shake from a panel that knows its job, the results would unquestionably be more acceptable. In such an atmosphere, a recommendation carries much greater weight than it does when rendered by an ad hoc board administering its task without attempting to collate and furnish information to the parties.

The above suggestions will lead, it is submitted, to knowledge and reason taking the place of emotion in national emergency situations where the latter has no place. Until now, all suggestions have placed emphasis upon force and coercion in such disputes rather than upon education and reason.

It is about time we gave the facts a chance to operate.

Jurisdictional disputes: Telephone workers, perhaps more than any other group of employees in the country, have been sore beset by the jurisdictional dispute. It is tribute to the restraint and acute sense of public responsibility of this group of employees that they have not permitted their jurisdictional grievances to become explosive and injure the public interest.

Wherever projects have been erected, the problem has arisen: shall telephone workers or electrical workers draw through conduits the telephone wires for telephone installation in such projects?

This problem is a pressing one, for instance, at Idlewild Airport and in projects like the huge housing development of Stuyvesant Town, Peter Cooper Village, Riverton Houses, United Nation's project and Brownsville Houses. There the jurisdictional dispute was between the United Telephone Organizations and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. The National Labor Relations Board has refused to hear the dispute despite the mandatory nature of section 10 (k) of the Taft-Hartley law and the matter is now before the courts.

The present statute is completely inadequate to meet the jurisdictional dispute problem. It fails to supply guide posts to direct the action of the Regional director, the general counsel, or the National Labor Relations Board.

The jurisdictional dispute is an irksome and explosive one. It cannot be permitted to fester. Yet, there is nothing in the Taft-Hartley law that calls for rapidity of action on the part of the National Labor Relations Board or any of its agents. For example, on September 2, 1947, the United Telephone Organizations filed a charge with the regional director of the second region against local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers alleging the existence of a jurisdictional dispute at Idlewild Airport. Here was an explosive situation. It required the weighty pressure of the mayor of New York, the Port Authority of New York, and the New York Telephone Co. to stave off a strike. But the dispute still remained and festered. The Board, in such a situation, should have acted swiftly. Either the fear of treading on political toes or sheer failure to appreciate the gravity of the situation resulted in complete inaction on the part of the Board or its agents.

It was not until 11 months later, on August 18, 1949, that the United Telephone Organizations was informed tersely by the regional director that the charges were dismissed, despite the fact that the documents specifically charged violations of section 8 (b) (4) (D) in that the IBEW had resorted to strikes and threatened strikes to compel the New York Telephone Co. to divert from its own employees, members of the United Telephone Organizations, to members of the IBEW work which was customarily done by its own employees.

No hearings were held and it is possible to determine the motivating factors that entered into the regional director's decision.

This smacked of star-chamber proceedings.

The general counsel affirmed the action of the regional director with no reasons given.

The National Labor Relations Board has failed to move in the matter and now court proceedings have been instituted to determine whether section 10 (k) of the Taft-Hartley law made Board hearings mandatory.

Suffice it to say, however, that the above method of operations are certainly not the correct or honest manner of handling the explosive jurisdictional dispute.

The ostrich approach to a problem as pressing as a jurisdictional dispute is hardly the way to solve such problem.

Perhaps inactivity was the chosen course because a labor organization, rather than an employer, filed the charge. This conclusion is offered because of the swiftness of action in Matter of Moore Drydock Co. (case No.20–CD–1), where the Board quickly entertained a jurisdictional dispute charge filed by an employer.

On March 3, 1949, the National Labor Relations Board made public its decision in the Moore Drydock Co. case. It was with perplexing surprise that the telephone labor organizations noted that the Board specifically held that section 10 (k) of the act mandatorily required the Board to "hear and determine" jurisdictional dispute charges.

If section 10 (k) of the act mandatorily requires the Board to "hear and determine" jurisdictional dispute charges, why did it, through its agents, refuse to "hear and determine" the jurisdictional dispute charges filed by the united telephone organizations in September of 1947?

The general counsel affirmed the dismissal of such charges by the regional director in New York. Thus, the general counsel and the Board have divergent opinions regarding the functions of the Board under section 10 (k) of the act.

The independent action of the general counsel, contrary to the express wording of section 10 (k) of the act and contrary to the Board's construction of that section in a formal decision, has served to prejudice the United Telephone Organizations in particular and telephone workers in general in their rights under the act.

Such independent powers of the general counsel serve as a strain upon the efficacy of the National Labor Relations Act, particularly in such explosive situations as jurisdictional disputes. The recent Hoover report on the regulatory agencies recognized that no good purpose is served by giving the general counsel such independent powers.

It is, therefore, urged that the proposed labor law contain provisions calling for:

(a) Unequivocal mandatory action by the Board, or its appointed agents, to hold hearings when a jurisdictional dispute charge is filed. Independent action by the general counsel preventing such hearings should be precluded by the law.

(b) Rapidity of action by the Board, or its appointed agents. The Board should be required mandatorily to hold, or have one of its agents hold, a hearing within a stipulated time after the filing of a jurisdictional dispute charge.

(c) A decision to be handed down within a specified time after hearings have been conducted.

It is further submitted that Congress should study this question of jurisdictional disputes with a view toward setting forth guideposts for the Board to use in deciding a jurisdictional dispute charge. There is nothing in the present act calling for such guideposts. The administration bill does contain certain criteria. It is submitted, however, that additional criteria should be established by Congress to guide the Board or its agents in reaching a decision.

Experience of telephone labor organizations has indicated that the claims to job preferment by certain classes of employees are spurious and may easily result in a good deal of unemployment. This should be guarded against, and criteria setting forth the grounds upon which the Board should proceed will aid in guarding against such eventuality.

Specifically, in the telephone industry, electrical workers who are trained in a wide field of operations assert jurisdiction over the specific job of drawing and pulling wire through conduits for the purpose of telephone installation. On the other hand, telephone employees in the telephone plant department are specifically trained for such telephone work. If this work is denied them, they cannot turn to other fields where they have no training. But the electrical worker can still earn a living at his trade without taking away the one specific job for which telephone plant employees are trained. Consequently, in a jurisdictional-dispute charge, the Board should be guided specifically by such considerations.

Therefore, in addition to the above proposals, it is further proposed the new labor law contain criteria to guide the Board, or its agents, in making decisions in jurisdictional-dispute cases. Such criteria, in addition to those in the administration bill, should be as follows:

(a) In a dispute over job jurisdiction, a presumption should exist in favor of those specifically trained for the job.

(b) A presumption should exist in favor of the employees of a company engaged in performing the disputed job.

In short, therefore, the proposals of the undersigned regarding jurisdictional disputes involve:

(a) Mandatory action to hold complete hearings.

(b) Swift action.

(c) Criteria to guide the Board in making its decision.

In concluding, I wish to say the International Brotherhood of Telephone Workers and the Maryland Federation of Telephone Workers do not wish to join with us in these proposals, as they have a satisfactory working agreement at the present time.

I wish to thank the committee for the time they have given us.

Mr. KELLEY. Have you given any thought as to how the panels would be composed?

Mr. GABRIEL. I would imagine they would be appointed in the same manner in which they were appointed back during the war. We had telephone panels of one nature or another in regard to hearing disputes at the time, which were considered a national emergency.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Powell.

Mr. POWELL. Do you mean by that a panel for each industry?

Mr. GABRIEL. I believe the proposal is for each classification of industry affecting the national well-being of the country whereby national emergency disputes might exist.

Mr. POWELL. And the members to be paid, of course?

Mr. GABRIEL. That is right.

Mr. POWELL. In your section on jurisdictional strikes, your criticism there is mainly directed at the National Labor Relations Board in your particular dispute, where the Board just has ignored you: is that right?

Mr. GABRIEL. The language of the act is not specific in its application in regard to the way the Board has acted.

Mr. POWELL. In other words, it is not mandatory for the Board to move immediately, and the Board is within the law by letting you sit by since 1947?

Mr. GABRIEL. We do not believe so. However, we are in the process of determining whether or not it is within the law.

MR. POWELL. As regards the Lesinski bill, the same situation exists in that bill; is that correct?

Mr. GABRIEL. That is right, you have no mandatory provisions there for the Board to hear a jurisdictional dispute.

Mr. POWELL. Outside of what you have commented on here, what is your feeling concerning the Taft-Hartley bill, as a whole?

Mr. GABRIEL. As a whole we consider it to be entirely unsatisfactory.

Mr. POWELL. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the minority members of the committee, I think I shall refrain from asking the gentleman any questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. I just wanted to say that, of course, I disagree with this last section here, where you say a presumption should exist in favor of the employees of a company engaged in performing disputed work. It is possible for construction contractors to have many employees, and one could very easily eliminate one of the building trades in that fashion as I see it, if that presumption were favored.

Mr. GABRIEL. Of course, we look at this matter in the nature of a presumption existing as we see it in working for the Bell system in that you have a specific company performing a specific job with its own tools, equipment, and owning the property which it places in service. In the building trades you might have a little more difficult problem to assimilate.

Mr. IRVING. You are making a recommendation for a lot of industries besides the telephone industry?

Mr. GABRIEL. That is correct.

Mr. IRVING. And I certainly could not agree that that would be a fair way, and it would cause many explosive situations also.

That is all I have.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. I assume you have given some consideration to the effect of section 8 (b) (4) (D) and section 10 (k) in connection with each other, apparently, in view of the Idlewild dispute?

Mr. GABRIEL. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. Here is what I would like to ask you, whether or not, in the event an award would be given by the Board under section 10 (k), if there is any provision in the Taft-Hartley law where the employees in the union can enforce the award?

Mr. GABRIEL. No; I am afraid I cannot give an answer as to that.

Mr. JACOBS. The gentleman to your right, I think, started to comment on that.

Mr. WEINER. Mr. Gabriel is not an attorney, and I am. My name is Abraham Weiner, and I am the counsel representing this group. With respect to that I a believe that the act, taken in conjunction with the rules of procedure of the Board, provide that if the Board renders an award, and one of the parties against whom the award is rendered refuses to accept that award, then the Board issues an unfair labor practice complaint against that party.

Mr. JACOBS. What specific section do you refer to?

Mr. WEINER. Section 8 (b) (4) (D) and section 10 (k), and the rules of procedure of the Board itself.

Mr. JACOBS. Then you think that section 8 (b) (4) (D) would carry back to the general language before (A), (B), (C) and (D); is that your view of it?

Mr. WEINER. No; section 8 (b) (4) (D), which is the manner of proceeding, is taken care of by section 10 (k) of the act, and section 10 (k) is the sore point that Mr. Gabriel spoke about. Section 10 (k) says the Board is empowered and directed to hear a jurisdictional-dispute charge, that is, a charge under section 8 (b) (4) (D). In the Idlewild dispute the Board shunted the dispute aside, after holding it in the office of the regional director for 11 months. That is quite a contrast to the recent case of the Moore Drydock Co. case.

Mr. JACOBS. I understand that, but under 10 (k) the requirement is to hear and determine a dispute and make an award in the event it is not settled; that is correct, is it not?

Mr. WEINER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. It is an unfair labor practice under section 8 (b) (4) (D) to force or require—> any employer to assign particular work to employees in a particular labor organization or in a particular trade, craft, or class rather than to employees in another labor organization or in another trade, craft, or class—et cetera.

Suppose an award were made and the employer refused to abide by it; what language is there in this act that gives the employees the remedy by which they can enforce that award against the employer?

Mr. WEINER. There is nothing in the act that forces that employer to abide by the award of the Board. It just seems to hit at that group of employees against whom the award is directed, the employees of group B——

Mr. JACOBS. But supposing that group of employees, which would be the IBEW, in your case, that you are talking about, did like the Arabs, and folded their tents and silently stole away in the night. Now, they are not there any more; they are not doing anything, are they?

Mr. WEINER. No. Then no unfair labor practice complaint would issue against them. And suppose the employer still refused to give the first gronp——

Mr. JACOBS. To you, yes.

Mr. WEINER. That is right. There is nothing in the act that would protect us in that particular case, as written.

Mr. JACOBS. If they desired to give it to another group, you would be right back where you started, and you would start another complaint and go through the procedure in section 10 (k) again?

Mr. WEINER. That seems to be so. There is no provision in the law as written in a situation of that sort. I doubt whether something like that would actually come up. I think the employer would be glad to resolve it in any possible way to get his work going on again. He may not.

Mr. JACOBS. At any rate, there seems to be a blind spot in someone's thinking.

Mr. WEINER. From a theoretical point of view, if not a practical one, there certainly is a blind spot there.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. Let me ask you just a few questions about other experiences that your organizations have had under the Taft-Hartley Act. You were organized under the Wagner Act, were you?

Mr. GABRIEL. Yes; we were.

Mr. WIER. Did you have any difficulty under the Wagner Act, in the operation of it?

Mr. GABRIEL. No. The Wagner Act, as far as we are concerned, operated satisfactorily.

Mr. WIER. Satisfactorily?

Mr. GABRIEL. Yes.

Mr. WIER. By the way, you made no designation here. Are these units that you list in your presentation as affiliated with your group independent, or are they affiliated with the CIO or the AFL, or what?

Mr. GABRIEL. This is an independent group.

Mr. WIER. You are not affiliated with the CIO?

Mr. GABRIEL. No; we are not.

Mr. WIER. You are not affiliated with the AFL?

Mr. GABRIEL. No; we are not.

Mr. WIER. You are not affiliated either way?

Mr. GABRIEL. No.

Mr. WIER. You represent, I assume here, quite a substantial group of employees. At least, you are the bargaining agent for a substantial number; is that correct?

Mr. GABRIEL. That is correct. We state upward of 70,000.

Mr. WIER. Of all the employees that are in your field, or these companies, what percentage of them are members of your union?

Mr. GABRIEL. On the average of 90 percent.

Mr. WIER. Ninety percent; in all of these companies?

Mr. GABRIEL. That is correct. In the particular departments we have outlined.

Mr. WIER. Do you have at the present time any kind of security, such as union shop, closed shop, check-off, or anything?

Mr. GABRIEL. We have maintenance of dues; we have a voluntary check-off system.

Mr. WIER. Is it in the contract?

Mr. GABRIEL. In most instances, yes.

Mr. WIER. Do you have a contract with all of these companies that you represent here?

Mr. GABRIEL. The various unions as outlined do have contracts with the various telephone companies; that is correct.

Mr. WIER. You do have written contracts with these telephone companies covering the collective-bargaining agency for the employees under your jurisdiction?

Mr. GABRIEL. That is correct.

Mr. WIER. And in these contracts, you have a check-off; is that what you said?

Mr. GABRIEL. That is right.

Mr. WIER. The companies have agreed to that, have they?

Mr. GABRIEL. Yes; they have.

Mr. WIER. And you have under the Taft-Hartley Act an individual voluntary assignment of the dues to your union; is that correct?

Mr. GABRIEL. That is right.

Mr. WIER. Do you have any difficulty with that?

Mr. GABRIEL. Not particularly, up to this time.

Mr. WIER. When did you get that agreed to?

Mr. GABRIEL. I might qualify my statement in that during a strike period, we have used it as a weapon.

Mr. WIER. You had a strike last year in some of these units?

Mr. GABRIEL. Two years ago, in 1947.

Mr. WIER. Two years ago. Was that following the installation of the Taft-Hartley Act, or was that under the Wagner Act?

Mr. GABRIEL. No. That was under the Wagner Act.

Mr. WIER. That was under the Wagner Act. And you have not had the experience of some of the teeth of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. GABRIEL. No. Fortunately, we have not had to experience some of those.

Mr. WIER. Now, let me ask you this. In the very beginning of an organization, it is true, is it not, in most of these cases, you were organized when the Taft-Hartley Act went into effect? Is your organization work going on now? I presume that you are still doing organizational work?

Mr. GABRIEL. That is right. We are.

Mr. WIER. And, under the Taft-Hartley Act, the management is given very liberal interpretations under this right of free speech, and so on. Have you encountered difficulties with management in their free-speech approach to the employees that are prospects to your unions or are members of your unions? Have you found interference?

Mr. GABRIEL. We have had few elections lately but, in what few we have had, there has been a certain amount of interference.

Mr. WIER. Have you had any occasion, or have you tried the clause in the Taft-Hartley Act on charges of unfair labor practices as against your employees?

Mr. GABRIEL. We are in the process of being involved in that.

Mr. WIER. Did you ever get a decision of an unfair labor practice against any of those companies?

Mr. GABRIEL. Not yet.

Mr. WIER. Not yet. I am waiting to see the one who says he has.

So you do have interference here and there by the employers in the prerogative of your workers to become members of your union or continue their membership?

Mr. GABRIEL. To a much greater extent than before the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. WIER. Greater than before the Taft-Hartley Act. Did you notice any change in the attitude of your employers after the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act in regard to negotiations, grievances, and relationships?

Mr. GABRIEL. I would say they have worsened from the union's viewpoint to a considerable extent.

Mr. WIER. I see.

Mr. GABRIEL. As we might point out, in the last bargaining negotiations where we were in bargaining sessions of five, six, and seven months before resolving a contract which to a certain degree was unsatisfactory.

Mr. WIER. I was going to ask you that question. You gave me the answer. But what did you get on your last negotiation with your membership in the way of money?

Mr. GABRIEL. Roughly $1 to $6, on a sliding scale, per week.

Mr. WIER. Six dollars a week? That is, $1 a day?

Mr. GABRIEL. One dollar to six dollars.

Mr. WIER. I see.

Mr. GABRIEL. The telephone workers of New Jersey, where they have a compulsory arbitration law in that State, got $2 across the board. In other telephone companies, the procedure was to give raises in wage patterns which were brought about by community comparability in a sliding scale which ranged, in some instances, from $1 to $6 in the larger communities.

Mr. WIER. How many of these unions dealing with the Bell Telephone Co. have compulsory arbitration?

Mr. GABRIEL. I believe only New Jersey.

Mr. WIER. Only New Jersey?

Mr. GABRIEL. Yes.

Mr. WIER. You would say that is a State law for public utilities, I presume?

Mr. GABRIEL. That is correct.

Mr. WIER. You have to go in and take what the arbitration board awards?

Mr. GABRIEL. That is right.

Mr. WIER. Well, we are coming closer to it all the time.

You lay considerable stress upon some difficulty you had with the electrical workers' union in some of these building projects. I think your outline here of a determination of those disputes is a dangerous approach to the over-all picture; that is, when there is a clash between you and another union as to who is going to do the particular work. But I certainly would not sit in this Congress and agree with the plan you outline, on the basis that it would involve hundreds of other disputes farfetched from the type of grievances you have. A lot of our jurisdictional disputes in the field of industry are primarily in fields where we find the introduction of new materials, replaced materials, and new populations, where nobody has made a decision as to the jurisdiction of that new material. I certainly would disagree with you entrusting the Labor Board, with no knowledge at all with the fields of building construction and the field of metal trades, to sit in and make a determination as to what union it belongs and what union might not, historically, in that particular industry. It is all right in the kind of dispute that you might have. But still you do not settle it there. You ran into a situation where the whole project had been tied up.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. WIER. Well, I cannot finish in 1 minute. So I will call it off.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Sims?

Mr. SIMS. I have no questions. But I will be glad to yield my time to Mr. Wier.

Mr. WIER. I am worried about that jurisdictional dispute, too. I am a member of the A. F. of L. now. I have a good paid-up card right now. I felt like going out on strike this afternoon. Probably they would have had an injunction on me.

Have you had any experience with injunctions?

Mr. GABRIEL. No; we have not, to this time, had any particular experience with injunctions under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. WIER. You have not had any dispute at all under the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. GABRIEL. No.

Mr. WIER. You are lucky.

I think that is all, Mr. Chairman. I think considerable has been said about that jurisdictional aspect; but I am, like you, deeply concerned with the jurisdictional dispute. However, I do not think your method is the proper method, of putting it in the hands of impartial observers and those that have no knowledge of the field of industry to make a decision that is far reaching.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Sims?

Mr. SIMS. No questions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Gabriel, thank you very much.

Mr. GABRIEL. Thank you.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Clarence Mitchell, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Mr. Mitchell.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Chairman, may I ask permission to put in the record at the close of Mr. Mitchell's testimony a statement of Mr. Elmer Henderson, director of the American Council on Human Rights?

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection.

Mr. Mitchell, you may proceed.

TESTIMONY OF CLARENCE MITCHELL, LABOR SECRETARY, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am Clarence Mitchell, labor secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

First, I want to thank you gentlemen of the committee, and you, Mr. Chairman, for giving us an opportunity to be heard on what we consider a very important subject. In two of our national conventions of the NAACP, we have called for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. This is the unanimous action of the persons who came to our convention from all over the country as delegate.

There are many aspects of this law that other people will talk about, but I wisk to confine myself to a part of the labor legislation which normally has not been given the kind of consideration which we believe it merits, and that is the question of instances of discrimination against persons who are employees in plants or who are members of trade-unions, solely because they happen to be Negroes or members of other minority groups.

In order to clarify and present this testimony in a fashion that will get the point across, we have submitted our proposals as suggested amendments to the Wagner Act. However, we feel that, whatever the final form of the legislation may be, there must be embodied provisions of this kind if persons who work for a living and happen to be colored, or members of other minority groups, are getting to get fair treatment at the bargaining table.

The first thing we ask for is that no union which segregates or discriminates against persons because they happen to be members of a racial or minority group be certified. The next thing we ask is that any union which happens to have the collective-bargaining relationship and is found to segregate or discriminate after it receives the contract be disestablished or decertified.

We ask that, in closed-shop situations, no closed shops be granted where individuals are segregated or discriminated against because they happen to be colored.

Finally, we ask that no employer be required under the law to bargain with a union which segregates or discriminates.

This question has been kicking around ever since the Wagner Act was passed back in 1935. Repeatedly, instances have arisen in which this issue was at stake, and always it has been treated in a very shoddy fashion. Perhaps the grandfather of this error that I am here to talk about tonight is found in the Larus case, which is cited in our testimony. In that case, the National Labor Relations Board approved the principle of having so-called separate but equal unions, or a complete exclusion of persons from union membership because they happened to be colored, or the segregation of them into auxiliaries, simply because they happen to be colored.

This is the Larus doctrine, and this we believe to be unfair and undemocratic. We believe that, if the Board had exercised a little courage in the beginning, it would have been able to come up with a philosophy and an administrative approach on this thing which would have given all persons a fair chance in labor organizations.

The Board did not elect to do that. It took a narrow and timid construction of its duty under the law, and that principle was incorporated into the Taft-Hartley Act, so that what was before merely an administrative determination on the part of the Board then became a principle which was incorporated into the law. In other words, those who voted for the Taft-Hartley Act, those who wished that on the people of this country, actually incorporated the principle of segregation into law.

Now, they have some very beautiful language in the Taft-Hartley Act in section 8 in which they talk about no discrimination against individuals on the part of employers and no dismissal of people if unions act against them in a discriminatory manner. And they have gone around the country saying that this is something wonderful and a pat on the back for minorities.

But actually they were pinning the donkey's tail of second-class citizenship on colored people when they gave them this kind of sock. And the Board was very quick to make use of this license for continued immoral conduct in four cases that I wish to cite. They appear in my testimony.

One of the first was the Norfolk & Southern Bus Corp., also the Texas & Pacific Motor Transport Co., the F. W. Wint Co., and the Veneer Products Co.

I want to discuss briefly two of those cases, because they show how clearly this principle of B-class locals and auxiliaries and second-class citizenship for colored people in trade-unions have been incorporated into the law under the Taft-Hartley Act.

I will take the Veneer Products case first. In that situation, the firm down in North Carolina had two locals which were under the jurisdiction of the operating engineers of the A. F. of L. In that plant, colored people were members of a local and white people were members of another. In the old days, when they had separate locals for colored people, usually they called the white locals by the number—that is, it was 431 or something of that sort—and then they called the colored local 431–A. But in this case, they called the white local 457 and the colored local 457–D. So we are getting farther down in the alphabet as they go along in the designations of separate locals for colored people.

The employer raised a question in that case: Why should we have those separate locals? And he contended that the existence of those separate locals meant that the union discriminated against the employees. He offered proof to that effect.

The Board went in and, in one of those amazing decisions, came up with a statement that the only reason why they had this separate local for colored people was to keep the colored money separate from the white money, and therefore they did not see any instance of segregation or discrimination in that case. And they referred back to their decision in the Larus case, saying that segregation was not any indication of discrimination.

We have even a more serious thing in the Texas & Pacific Motor Transport case. In that case, the teamsters union of the A. F. of L. already had the bargaining rights in that company. Apparently they were doing a very good job of representing the employees. Along came the International Association of Machinists and said they wanted to represent certain employees in that establishment, and the teamsters—which I wish to interpolate here to say is one of the best unions in the matter of race relations and has a great many colored members and a very decent record on this subject—the teamsters came before the Board and said that they had proof that the machinists were discriminating against Negroes and they would not give them equal representation, and they asked for an opportunity to present that evidence.

The Board would not even permit the teamsters to present their evidence, and they went further in the Board. They said to the machinists when they came forward and offered to present some evidence showing that they did not discriminate, "We are not interested in that. We find that issue is not pertinent, and you therefore do not have to submit any evidence to show that you do not discriminate."

The record of the machinists is notorious on that point. There is a great volume of evidence, gentlemen, that the rank-and-file members of that union wish to do the right thing on this race question. They have had votes up and down, and generally they have tried to overthrow that system of excluding colored people from unions altogether. In California, for example, at the Lockheed Aircraft Co., the local lodge of the machinists defied the international, which had a provision in the constitution that a man had to be white in order to be a member of the union. And these people said, "That must mean 'white of character,' and therefore we are going to initiate these colored people."

And they did. And they are there today as members of that union.

In the State of Washington, the local lodges of the machinists did initiate colored people and had them as members of the union, and the international officers came in and tried to keep them out and tried to make the people in Washington put these colored people out of the union.

All that adds up to this, that in those States where there are fair employment practice laws, such as New York, New Jersey, and others, and in those States where we have one court decision, as in California and Kansas, the International Association of Machinists admits Negroes to full membership, and does so because it is required by the courts and the law to do so. But in the South, they still have a system of intense discrimination against colored people, and they confine themselves to separate locals everywhere, so that it was a very short-sighted policy on the part of the Board to say that this union did not discriminate against colored people, and not even to admit this issue to the question of discussion.

We believe that there is a tremendous growth in the trade-union movement of a realization that unions have to operate on a democratic basis. Both the American Federation of Labor and the CIO have taken long steps in the direction of achieving democracy within the structure of trade-unions.

I would just like to read this brief section of my testimony, because I wanted to point out some of the things that are concrete evidences of the nature of the picture around the country.

In Charlotte, N. C., colored and white members of a carpenters local are on excellent terms and treat each other fairly. On the other hand, at this very moment, there is extensive discrimination against colored carpenters who seek employment on the atomic energy construction projects in Tennessee. They are full-fledged members of the carpenters union. Their trouble arises because they are consigned to locals, separate and apart from those for white people. The white locals usually get the lion's share of the work. The colored union men are frequently denied employment after they have traveled many miles in response to calls for carpenters.

In Charleston, S. C., colored men are important officials of the bricklayers' union. In Louisville, Ky., they are an important part of unions bargaining for dairy workers, and in Atlanta, Ga., there are unions in the building trades with mixed memberships of colored and white persons with colored officers. On the other hand, in Cleveland, Ohio, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers have threatened to close down certain training courses offered in public schools if colored people are admitted.

Our testimony includes these illustrations because we wish to have the record show that the pattern of discrimination is varied and not necessarily based on geography. We also condemn those who make wanton and generalized attacks on the whole labor movement. This is a problem which the Congress has power to solve. In passing constructive labor legislation the United States Government throws a mantle of dignity and protection over the shoulders of the working man. We ask that this garment be made in the American style and tailored to fit all of our citizens of all races and faiths.

We feel that as one looks back over the experience under the Taft-Hartley Act, there is no justification that there should be a continued ban on the closed shop. The NLRB's figures on elections held to determine whether persons wished to be represented under a union-shop contract have shown overwhelmingly—and we cite the figures in here—that workers desire this form of protection and we think they are entitled to have it. We recognize for the purposes of this testimony no difference between the closed shop and the union shop.

We feel when the closed shop is restored, as the present legislation proposes, that there must be some adequate safeguard introduced which will say that all persons as a matter of right, regardless of their race, shall be members of a union. That was left to administrative determination under the Wagner Act, and the Board, as I said before, held that where you had a closed shop and the union didn't want to admit people to membership, it was just decided that they could remain on the job but they didn't have to be members of a union.

We also feel that even though you may take care of that particular phase of the law which relates to the closed shop, that does not include the great majority of workers in industry. We have some figures which appear in our testimony concerning the number of persons who were covered by collective-bargaining agreements of various kinds in 1945. The reason we selected that period was because it was before the Taft-Hartley Act and it was still possible, of course, then legally to have the closed shop.

Out of some 13,000,000 persons who were covered by collective-bargaining agreements, only about 30 percent of them were covered by closed-shop agreements. Hence, about 70 percent of the workers of the country who are covered by collective-bargaining agreements would not be reached under this amendment which we have suggested as a protection in closed-shop situations.

Therefore, we have suggested our other amendment to the effect that no union be certified as the bargaining agent when it segregates or discriminates and that any union which subsequently starts discriminating—you know, a lot start off all right, but when they get going they change around and decide to exclude Negroes—and we would make this a condition of revocation of contract when they begin to discriminate.

Of course, the final thing that we suggest in the way of an amendment deals with this question of employers not being required to bargain with unions who segregate or discriminate. There are many instances, if we are realistic, in which unions are big enough to go around the employer and not bother with the National Labor Relations Board; and that is a good thing, but we don't feel that it is fair if a union is strong enough to avoid the machinery of the National Labor Relations Board and at the same time segregate and discriminate, we do not believe it is fair for them to force an employer to bargain with them and possibly work out conditions of employment which will be detrimental to persons of certain minority groups.

These remedies which we propose are supplementary to what will be required if President Truman's civil-rights proposals are adopted in full, and we have a Federal fair employment practice law. They are not intended to give to the National Labor Relations Board fair employment practice functions. They are designed to make equal treatment for all citizens regardless of race a part of labor relations and a part of the thinking and action at the bargaining table.

We believe that the majority of persons who work for a living and who have seen the curse of divisive tactics on the part of employers will welcome legal restraints against discrimination.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Powell.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Mitchell, the NAACP has about how many dues-paying members?

Mr. MITCHELL. We have approximately a half-million dues-paying members.

Mr. POWELL. Five hundred thousand?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. They are in every State of the Union?

Mr. MITCHELL. We have branches in 43 States.

Mr. POWELL. Forty-three States?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. It was the unanimous vote at the past two national conventions of all the delegates that they were opposed to the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct. The majority of colored people work for a living. We have some employers, but they aren't as numerous as those who work for a living. Those who work for a living recognize that this law has not been in the best interests of labor. They want to see it off the books and replaced by something that gives everybody a fair deal.

Mr. POWELL. These amendments which you have brought forward represent not your personal view solely, but they represent the view of the NAACP board, do they not?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct. As the labor secretary, I have the responsibility of pulling the things together and stating them in such a fashion that they will represent the views of our organization, and these are the objectives that we seek.

Mr. POWELL. Are there any union men serving on the national board of the NAACP and, if so, what are the names of some of them?

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, we have Mr. Philip Murray as one of the members.

Mr. POWELL. Philip Murray is a member of the national board of NAACP?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct, and also Mr. Walter Reuther of the automobile workers. However, I would not wish to say that I had cleared these amendments with them. I am certain from the way they conduct their union affairs that this kind of thing represents their sentiment, but I would not say this has been cleared with them.

Mr. POWELL. I am bringing this out because suggesting amendments such as this might be construed as being inimical to the cause of labor, and I want the testimony to show that the NAACP has always been prolabor and could not be other than prolabor and have on its board people such as Mr. Philip Murray, Mr. Walter Reuther, and others.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Congressman, I would like to comment on that. I have been unable to understand why when we have these broad attempts at social legislation brought up, if a group of the population which is discriminated against comes forward and says, "All right, we are in favor of building this wonderful new dream house, but all we ask is when you give out the room assignments you have our name on the list." Somebody then says, "You are rocking the boat; don't raise these questions because they will destroy the legislation."

I think that is a very short-sighted and selfish point of view and it is certainly something we most strongly condemn.

Mr. POWELL. It is my purpose, Mr. Mitchell, it was before your testimony was made and before I even talked to you, to introduce this kind of amendment, not these exact words, although I may accept your words, because I think that what you have said is absolutely correct. You cannot have part-time democracy.

For the sake of the record, do you know any places in the United States south of the Mason and Dixon's line where Negroes and whites belong to the same locals and get along perfectly all right?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. As I mentioned in my testimony, I have been in a number of places where that is true. It is true in South Carolina; it is true in Georgia; it is true in Louisiana, and Alabama. In fact, one of the outstanding examples of that is the United Mine Workers. They have through the years done the decent thing, and there are many A. F. of L. unions in the construction business which have colored and white members, and they get along very well. It is the renegades that usually cause us trouble.

Mr. POWELL. What about the machinists now? The machinists have written in their international constitution "only whites." What about the Texas machinists?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad you brought that up because in the case that I mentioned, the Texas and Pacific Motor Transport case, the NLRB said there was no evidence that the machinists were discriminating and wouldn't even take the question seriously.

We have a situation coming before us from down in Houston in the Texas and New Orleans Railway. The machinists represent the employees who are in the shops there.

There was a colored man there named Calloway Gaddis. He started work back in 1924 in that shop. He got into some kind of dispute with management in 1944, and he was fired and kept off the job for about 10 months.

Finally he was reinstated; he won his point, and went back on the job. He was then entitled to seniority beginning in 1924. The company restored it to him. The machinists then moved in and said management couldn't give him that seniority. The union said that his seniority had to date from 1944.

Mr. Gaddis took the question up with the local union of the machinists, which represented those employees, and in that situation the local union was very disturbed about it. Again, as I said, most people would like to do the right thing. The union's local officers said they felt that it was destroying the union not to give this colored man his seniority. They wrote a letter to one of the district officials saying, "Please give him back seniority."

That official said, "You have got to have a vote in order to do it." They had the vote and then he said, "Well, after you get the vote you have got to go to individual members and ask them whether it is all right."

We took that up with the international officers of the machinists here in Washington, and they referred us down to a vice president in Alabama. That man referred us to the same man down in Texas who was responsible for the discrimination, and we got a letter back from him saying, "Well, this colored man went outside of union channels to get his grievance settled and, therefore, we can't do anything for him."

That is reprehensible, and I think there must be some legal protection to keep that from happening.

Mr. POWELL. One thing in your written testimony that should be brought out for the benefit of all of us is that it wasn't until the Taft-Hartley law was enacted that segregation and discrimination in trade-unions became a matter of law; isn't that correct?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is quite correct.

Mr. POWELL. The Taft-Hartley law made that a matter of trade-union law, and very few people know that.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct.

Mr. POWELL. That is, when the Taft-Hartley Act incorporated the Larus & Brother Co., Inc., decision, 62 NLRB 1075.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct. If I may, I would like to say that the language of the Taft-Hartley Act is so beautiful. It says:

> No employer shall justify any discrimination against an employee for nonmembership in a labor union if he has reasonable grounds for believing such membership was not available to the employee on the same terms and conditions generally applicable to other members.

Then they go on to say that—

> No union shall cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of this subsection.

Now, when that became law, a lot of people got out wonderful statements saying that here is a little FEPC and this is something that is going to give the colored people a real break. But they failed to read the conference report on the Taft-Hartley Act, and I have included that language in my testimony. The authors of this law, in a mean, conniving, sneaking way, include in the conference report a statement saying that the doctrine of the Larus case shall be the controlling doctrine in situations of this kind.

In other words, the Taft-Hartley authors said go ahead, segregate them, discriminate against them, kick them out, but you are not mistreating them under the Taft-Hartley Act.

If there is anything that I want to leave with you gentlemen, it is the clear and firm statement that this is a fraud which this Congress has a duty to correct.

Mr. POWELL. I would like to also bring out that whenever the union has segregated and discriminated and there have been local laws enacted or there have been court decisions that that segregation or discrimination, of course, immediately ceased; and then what were the results? Were there any riots or any type of physical violence that resulted from the fact that men who were American men, regardless of color of skin, were then put in the same unions? What has been your experience?

Mr. MITCHELL. Our experience has been that whenever persons in trade-unions say that we are going to admit all people to membership without regard to race, the results are most healthy and most satisfactory. You get a better working relationship on the job, you get a better type of relationship between men. The old-line trade-unionists that I know, people who have come up through the union movement through the years, who have seen the evils of certain groups being set apart so that they might be used as strikebreakers, certain groups set apart so that they might be used to keep wages low, are opposed to segregation and discrimination, and they want to see all people in on a basis of equality.

Mr. POWELL. I have 1 minute left, and I would like to say this in conclusion: That there is before this committee, not this subcommittee but this entire Committee on Education and Labor, several bills pertaining to the enactment of fair employment practices legislation, and I am sure there will be hearings held on them; but, just in case they are not held, as you point out in your testimony, these amendments should be included and should be considered.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, with or without the fair employment practice law, they are needed because this legislation gives a kind of Government protection to people who are bargaining for other workers, and a review of the practices of the NLRB shows that unless there is some legal protection in the law, the minority groups are not given proper treatment.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Mitchell, continuing your summation of discriminations under the Wagner Act and the fact that you say it was legalized under the Taft-Hartley Act, I note on page 3 of your formal presentation you sum up your opinions of those discriminations by saying, and I quote from your statement:

> The authors of this legislation tried to make it appear that they were giving minorities a pat on the back. In reality the lawmakers were pinning a donkey's tail of second-class citizenship on all of the colored people in the labor movement of this country.

I would like to ask you, Mr. Mitchell, if the parties that controlled the Eightieth Congress haven't been pinning the donkey's tail on you folks for about 80 years and you only found it out before the last election.

Mr. MITCHELL. I might say, Mr. Bailey, unfortunately, in America neither party has done what it should do on this question. We are mightily pleased with the position of the President on the civil rights program, and we are delighted that there are many of you gentlemen who stand with him on that. But we have been just exposed to the very awful spectacle of a filibuster over in the Senate which we know has been engineered by the worst kind of connivance between Republicans and Democrats. We hope that you gentlemen who believe in the principles the President has enunciated in the civil rights program and those of the Republicans who say they stand for the same thing will jointly write into law some of the things we have been hearing about in campaign speeches. We will then be able to pin the donkey's tail where it belongs, and that is on those who are opposed to democratic principles, so that they may be held up to ridicule and scorn before all the world.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Mitchell, are you familiar with an article or editorial that appeared in, I believe, one of the Texas papers, possibly the Houston paper, wherein a writer extolled the principles and benefits, and so forth, of the Taft-Hartley law in regard to a new charter or something for the Negro people?

That is, in my opinion, a contradiction to the position your group has taken. Have you seen that article or heard of it?

Mr. MITCHELL. I would not be able to comment on it because I haven't seen it, but I would certainly say this position we have taken is not one which is based on an empty theory. The facts speak for themselves.

Anybody who reads the record, if he can understand English, knows that the Taft-Hartley law says that it is O. K. to segregate. That is what our association and millions of other people who believe in decency and freedom have been fighting through the years. I think it is very clear from the language of the act and from Senator Taft himself, who said on the floor of the Senate during the debates on this law that is all right for unions to segregate colored people, it is all right to put them in auxiliaries and B-class locals.

That is in the Congressional Record, so the intent is clear. I don't know who would endorse that kind of thing, but I know he would certainly not speak for the great majority of colored people.

Mr. IRVING. I thought that was rather peculiar because of the situation and the experience that you show here right in Houston. I think the paper—I saw the paper and I didn't remember the man's name, nor I didn't remember exactly the town or the name of the paper. I was just saying I think it was from Houston, and I would say it is peculiar after your exposing certain things that you have here.

I am wondering if that is a bit of propaganda or is it a stand by a few of your people?

Mr. MITCHELL. I would say that among honest men there is always room for differences of opinion. It may very well be that somebody who has not studied this legislation, but who read one of the releases that was gotten out by some of the people who were interested in rallying support for the Taft-Hartley Act thought it was a good thing. However, I believe that it certainly didn't speak for the majority of the people of Houston who have come to our conventions and who were among those who voted to call for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. IRVING. I think that is all. If I have any time left, Mr. Chairman, I will yield it to the next member.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. What union was involved in the Marinship Co. in California?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am happy you brought that question up because there is the concrete illustration of the kind of thing that I have been talking about. The Marinship Corp., the Kaiser Corp., Calship, and others went out to California to do a war job, and they were hiring a great many people.

The companies signed a closed-shop agreement with the metal-trades council of the American Federation of Labor. The first time the agreement was challenged was in the employment in the Bethlehem-Alameda shipyards. Then when the matter came before the NLRB it was contended that two of the unions in the metal-trades council—namely, the boilermakers and the machinists——

Mr. JACOBS. Wasn't the lawsuit against the boilermakers and the company? Wasn't that the way it was?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is true. I would like to show you how it ties in with the philosophy of the Board I have been talking about. The Board said that it may be that there is discrimination, but then the machinists and boilermakers set up auxiliaries for the Negroes, and the Board said all right. You no longer discriminate.

That phase finally went into court in the Marinship case and in the Moore Drydock case and several others. The California Supreme Court in the most vigorous language condemned the auxiliary set-up, saying it was totally unfair to say that when a closed shop is established, Negroes cannot be members of the parent union; they have to be members of an auxiliary.

As the result of the Supreme Court decision in California, both the boilermakers and the machinists had to change practices and admit colored people to full membership, but they did not extend it beyond the borders of California, except in some other States where court decisions and fair employment practice legislation made it necessary to do so.

That, I think, is most unfortunate.

Mr. JACOBS. Can you tell me whether or not any other State has adopted the California rule by court decision?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. In the State of Kansas there was a decision—and here is another illustration, if you gentlemen will indulge me I would like to mention—here you had the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen. They went into the shops of the Santa Fe Railroad and organized the employees there, who happended to be colored and white.

Colored people joined just as everybody else did, and they were told they were going to be full-fledged members. Then after they got in as full-fledged members and the company began bargaining with the Brotherhood of Railway Carmen, the colored people were told they had to be members of a separate outfit, as they couldn't be a part of the white group.

The colored people took that case to the courts in Kansas. They took it all the way to the State supreme court and won. There is a paragraph of that Kansas decision that I would just like to read, if I may. It is very brief. It says this:

> It is urged, however, that since membership in the union is voluntary and not compulsory, the petitioners have no right to complain about limitations placed upon membership under the constitution and bylaws of the union. The argument is specious and unrealistic. Note might be taken of the allegation that in soliciting the members prior to organization of the local lodge, the organizers had assured the plaintiffs that all member would have equal rights and privileges. But, passing that, we come to the more fundamental matter. This court cannot be bland to the present-day realities affecting labor in large industrial plants. The individual workman cannot just it alone. Every person with an understanding of mass production and other features of modern industry long ago recognized the necessity of collective bargaining by labor representatives freely chosen if human rights are to be safeguarded.

And in speaking of the denial of the right to join the union, the court said:

> Such denial is repugnant to every American concept of equality under the law. It is abhorrent both to the letter and to the spirit of our fundamental charter Never was it more important than now to reject such racial discrimination and to resist all erosion of individual liberty. The acts complained of are in violation of the fifth amendment.

Mr. JACOBS. Wasn't it in the California Ship Co.——

Mr. MITCHELL. Marinship.

Mr. JACOBS. I thought it was Marinship. Was that the decision where the Supreme Court of California referred to the situation and said that the labor union was more than a country club or a church, that it involvd the economic rights of people and the denial of membership constituted a tortious act; was that the decision that used that language?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think that generally was the language. I would hasten to say, sir, that we felt in the California case—I happened to have been out there in those cases when we were attempting to settle them short of court action—we felt that if the employers in the beginning had taken this discrimination factor into consideration, there would have been avoided a great many of the problems that arose afterward. We certainly do not wish to assess the blame merely to the union. We feel, after all, the employer has the power to hire and he has an obligation not to sign a contract with a group that will discriminate against any part of his working force.

Mr. JACOBS. At any rate, the controversy did result in a court decision which fixed the law in California?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is correct.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Sims?

Mr. SIMS. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. Mr. Mitchell, as you know, I am a member of the A. F. of L.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, I do, sir.

Mr. WIER. Primarily I have no question on the fundamental basis that your group presents here tonight. I am interested in whether progress has been made in behalf of the colored people of this country in their relationship to the trade-union movement. I am familiar in the State of Minnesota——

Mr. MITCHELL. I am, too.

Mr. WIER. With the membership increase there. Some years ago, 12 years ago, I think there was listed possibly 15 internationals—at the top level—about 15 internationals that failed to shown any membership of the colored race. Is that the figure you people used to use?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is about 15. It may have been 17, but 15 is close enough.

Mr. WIER. How many on the top level by international law forbid the membership of colored people today, without naming them, just the number?

Mr. MITCHELL. I would be unable to answer that question because from time to time I have asked the officials of the American Federation of Labor to aid us in getting together the unions which had changed their constitution and bylaws so that everyone could be admitted without discrimination.

I frankly and freely admit that while they never gave us any very reliable figures, they had honest intentions, and I will concede that so far as the letter is concerned, many of the international unions have gotten straight, but the whole point of my testimony is not that you have got simply a nice, righteous statement saying we don't discriminate.

The reason why I cited the illustration involving the carpenters in Tennessee and those in North Carolina was to show that in the same union where colored people are members and where there is no question of excluding them, selfish individuals create a situation under which they deprive individuals of the right to work.

That cannot be reached by abolishing requirements in constitutions which exclude people because of race. It cannot be reached by anything other than saying that if you are found on the record to discriminate, then you have to get straight or you can't represent these people.

Mr. WIER. I said I wasn't going to touch on the fundamental question raised here tonight. I am trying to get information, thinking you had it on a national scale.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am trying to give it and, as I said before, I am sure you will find that there has been a substantial reduction, probably down to 6 or 7 of the top international unions of the A. F. of L. which have eliminated this provision in their constitutions and by-laws, but that, as I said, does not hit the problem.

Mr. WIER. Let me ask you this: Have you any knowledge of how many members of your race are in the entire trade-union movement?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. There are approximately one million and a half.

Mr. WIER. One million and a half of your race?

Mr. MITCHELL. Seven hundred thousand members in the A. F. of L.

Mr. WIER. A million and a half are now members of the trade unions. How does that figure compare with 1937 and 1938?

Mr. MITCHELL. Offhand, I couldn't answer that, but I would say it probably represents a 50- or 60-percent increase.

Mr. WIER. On the fundamental question, Mr. Mitchell, to the best of my ability I am observing what has taken place in the State I come from because what you bring up here tonight is running the gantlet in the State Legislature of the State of Minnesota right now. I don't know if you are familiar with it or not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I might say I am an adopted citizen of the State of Minnesota and I talked with them last night on the long-distance telephone about it.

Mr. WIER. You are familiar with the fact that with the support of Governor Youngdahl of the State of Minnesota, there was introduced legislation in the interest of FEPC?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. I might say that I know Governor Youngdahl personally and I have the highest respect for him, and I have the highest respect for the members of the Minnesota Legislature, as I know you were at one time a member, and I believe they are doing an excellent job.

In the State of Washington they have passed fair employment practices legislation.

Mr. WIER. Let's don't go to the State of Washington. Just stay in Minnesota.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was mentioning it because you might be interested in the whole record.

Mr. WIER. Let's stay in Minnesota. I know it better. Are you familiar with what has happened in the activities to process that FEPC out of the senate committee and out of the house committee in the State of Minnesota?

Mr. MITCHELL. I don't recall offhand what has happened in the house, but I know that in the senate it was defeated, as I recall, by the committee.

I believe an effort is being made to get it out on the floor. I have had some experience with the Minnesota Legislature on that point, and I know committees can do an awful job on legislation, but when you get it on the floor sometimes it is a different story.

Mr. WIER. What I wanted to make known to you was, if you didn't know it, that in the senate where it was defeated by a vote of 7 to 6, what you present here tonight played its part because the labor movement and many other liberal groups in the State of Minnesota for a long period of time have been sponsoring FEPC. Last year they got it out of the senate committee very favorably and it got stuck in the house committee.

This year, with a lot of support and the Governor's friends, a couple of smart antilabor senators who sat on the committee thought up a swell idea, and so they amended the FEPC, and under our State Labor Conciliation Act they included the question of labor unions being charged with discrimination, unfair practices, and carried that on so that the labor movement backed away for a couple of days until they could get themselves together again in meeting these amendments.

I just wanted to point that out to you, that it is worth watching.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is. I feel this, though, that in connection with any decent fair employment practice legislation there must be a provision which says that you can't segregate and discriminate in your union membership. That is a part of the New York law. Because of that provision I think some 20 or 30 unions, some of them railway brotherhoods, which are notorious discriminators, have come forward saying they will take colored people into membership.

They never would have said that if it hadn't been in there under the law. I feel that most of the people in the trade union movement who spend a lot of money promoting educational programs so that people will learn to work together as humans will not resent that part of the law.

I know many people in Minnesota in the American Federation of Labor and many in the CIO—I am convinced that those people for the most part stand for fair treatment.

I had many, many personal experiences with them, which would indicate that they do. So I would assume that once they study these provisions, if they are like the normal provisions that go in the FEPC laws, labor certainly will be for them.

Mr. WIER. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. Who wrote that decision in the Kansas report?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it was Judge Hoch. Yes, it was.

Mr. SMITH. Do you believe that the advancement of your race would be better served by abandoning the closed shop in any rewrite of this bill?

Mr. MITCHELL. No, I would not. I would say that the closed shop, as I pointed out in my testimony, is a form of union security, and it has ben devised for the purpose of protecting workers. I think it is a good thing, but I believe there must be some safeguard so that you just don't say because a man is colored he can't be a member of the union.

I think that has been the reasoning behind the Kansas Supreme Court decision, the reasoning behind the California Supreme Court decision, and it is also the reasoning behind the Supreme Court decision in the Steele case and the Railway Mail Association case that came out of New York.

Mr. SMITH. You favor, then, putting in the closed shop, permission for the closed shop in the new law?

Mr. MITCHELL. With the addition that we have suggested that no one shall have it if he segregates or discriminates.

Mr. SMITH. Are you in favor of the union shop?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, we believe that the union shop is important because it covers a number of unions where a great many colored people are employed.

For example, I mentioned the mine workers awhile ago. One of the characteristics of their contracts is that they have union shop provisions and they have a substantial number of colored people who, we believe, are protected by such provisions.

In other words, we think, in the evolution of labor relations, certain things have been devised which will promote industrial peace, the closed shop is one, the union shop is another, the check-off is another, and so forth; and these forms of security, when properly administered and when used for the benefit of all people, are good things.

We just say that we want everybody to have access to them.

Mr. SMITH. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Mitchell, that was an interesting and intelligent statement. I want to thank you for coming here and giving the information to the committee as you have.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to request that my full statement be incorporated into the record at this point.

Mr. BAILEY (presiding). Very well, it will be done.

(The statement is as follows:)

STATEMENT BY CLARENCE MITCHELL, LABOR SECRETARY OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE, ON THE REPEAL OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

In two national conventions, members of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People have called for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. Now that this matter is before the Congress, we ask that any legislation adopted carry safeguards against discrimination and segregation based on race. Our testimony before your committee relates to this phase of the proposed law. For purposes of clarity we have prepared our suggestions as amendments to the Wagner Act. These amendments apply to sections 8 and 9 of that legislation.

We ask that no union be certified as the bargaining agent if it segregates or discriminates against employees because of race, religion, or national origin. We also ask that any union following this unjust practice to be decertified if it already has obtained bargaining rights. No employer would be required to bargain with a discriminatory union and the closed-shop would also be denied, if the organization seeking it refused membership to persons because of race, religion, or national origin.

Under the Wagner Act, the National Labor Relations Board could have achieved the results our amendments would make possible. Instead the Board gave its blessing to segregation and exclusion in Larus and Brother Company, Incorporated (62 N. L. R. B. 1075). The Taft-Hartley Act incorporated the Larus doctrine into law.

In the Larus case, it was contended that the colored employees of the company could not be represented properly by a union which segregated them into a separate local because of their race. The Board made the following statement in this case:

"This Board has no express authority to remedy undemocratic practices within the structure of union organizations * * * but we have conceived it to be our duty under the statute to see to it that any organization certified under section 9 (c) as the bargaining representative acted as a genuine representative of all the employees in the bargaining unit. Lacking such authority to insist that labor organizations admit all the employees they purported to represent to membership, or to give them equal voting rights, we have in closed shop situations held that where a union obtained a contract requiring membership as a condition of employment, it was not entitled to insist upon the discharge of, and the employer was not entitled to discharge, employees discriminatorily denied membership in the union. In such situations, being without power to order the union to admit them we have ordered employers to reinstate them."

The Board had previously held in the matter of the Atlanta Oak Floor Case, 62 NLRB 973, that the bargaining agent could segregate racial groups in its membership into separate locals. A principle was then evolved from these cases under which unions could exclude persons from membership because of race, or segregate them and still remain within the law.

The conference report of the Eightieth Congress on the Taft-Hartley Act states on page 41 that:

"As a protection to the individual worker against arbitrary action by the union, it is further provided that an employer is not justified in discrimination against an employee with respect to whom the employer has reason to believe membership in the union was not available on the same terms as those generally applicable to other members, or with respect to whom the employer has reason to believe membership was denied or terminated for reasons other than failure of the employee to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership. In determining whether membership was available on the same terms as those generally applicable to other members, it must be borne in mind that in some unions the dues and initiation fees of persons who became members many years ago may have been more or less than those currently in effect, or the terms or conditions of membership may have been different. The conference agreement hence does not contemplate availability of membership on the same terms as those applicable to all of the members, nor does it disturb arrangements in the nature of those approved by the Board in Larus Brother, Co."

Thus, the framers of the act made it clear in the conference report that auxiliaries, B-class locals, and even complete exclusion of certain racial groups would be perfectly legal and proper. The authors of this legislation tried to make it appear that they were giving minorities a pat on the back. In reality the lawmakers were pinning a donkey's tail of second-class citizenship on all of the colored people in the labor movement of this country.

The Board was quick to use this continued license for immoral conduct in four decisions under the Taft-Hartley Act. These decisions were: (1) Norfolk & Southern Bus Corporation (76 NLRB 76); (2) Texas & Pacific Motor Transport Company (77 NLRB 87); (3) F. W. Wint Company (76 NLRB 71); (4) Veneer Products, Incorporated (34–RC–30).

In the Veneer Products case, the Board's opinion states:

"The constitution of the international union which chartered local 457, International Union of Operating Engineers, contains no statement of discrimination against Negroes. It appears, however, that there exists in the employer's plant another local, also chartered by the International Union of Operating Engineers, known as local 457–D, which, according to the petitioner's representative, has a membership almost entirely of Negroes, and which was established for the purpose of keeping funds contributed by Negro members separate from funds contributed by whites.

"In opposition to the statement of the petitioner's representative the employer offered to prove that local 457–D restricted its membership to Negroes alone. This offer of proof was rejected by the hearing officer."

In the Texas & Pacific Motor Transport case, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America, AFL, contended that the International Association of Machinists would not admit Negroes to membership.

The Board recognized that some of the employees concerned were colored, but said that there was no showing that the IAM would not accord adequate represenation to all employees. The machinists even sought to reopen the record on this point to submit evidence which it was contended would show that colored people could be admitted to full membership, but the Board refused the request of the machinists.

The record of discrimination by the machinists is notorious. There is considerable evidence that a large part of the membership of this union abhors discrimination against colored people. There have been several instances in which leaders of lodges in the machinists' union have defied their international officers and admitted colored persons to full membership. In Los Angeles, Calif., the lodge which represents employees of the Lockheed Aircraft Corp., has colored members because the leadership of the union interpreted a provision requiring that members be white to mean white of character, rather than identification with the white race. In the State of Washington, when lodges of the machinists admitted colored people to membership, representatives of the International body sought to have the union oust the colored members.

The IAM has changed its policies in those States where it is required to do so by fair employment laws, pressure from local lodges, and court decisions. However, it still discriminates throughout the South.

There is a growing realization among members of trade unions that division of individuals into separate locals based on race, or any other artificial factor, undermines the strength of those who seek to safeguard their economic interests through collective bargaining. There has been a tremendous growth of democracy in both the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations. We would like the record to show that the wise leaders of labor are uncompromising foes of segregation and discrimination. On the other hand, there are some persons among employers and labor unions who, by conspiracy and collusion, with or without closed-shop agreements, exclude colored people from jobs for which they are qualified. Only court action and fair employment practice legislation in certain States have been effective in dealing with such situations.

In Charlotte, N. C., colored and whtie members of a carpenter's local are on excellent terms and treat each other fairly. On the other hand, at this very moment, there is extensive discrimination against colored carpenters who seek employment on the atomic energy construction projects in Tennessee. They are full-fledged members of the carpenters union. Their trouble arises because they are consigned to locals, separate and apart from those for white people. The white locals usually get the lion's share of the work. The colored union men are frequently denied employment after they have traveled many miles in response to calls for carpenters.

In Charleston, S. C., colored men are important officials of the bricklayer's union. In Louisville, Ky., they are an important part of unions bargaining for dairy workers, and, in Atlanta, Ga., there are unions in the building trades with mixed membership of colored and white persons with colored officers. On the other hand, in Cleveland, Ohio, the International Brotherhood of Electrical workers has threatened to close down certain training courses offered in public schools if colored people are admitted.

Our testimony includes these illustrations because we wish to have the record show that the pattern of discrimination is varied and not necessarily based on geography. We also condemn those who make wanton and generalized attacks on the whole labor movement. This is a problem which the Congress has power to solve. In passing constructive labor legislation the United States Government throws a mantle of dignity and protection over the shoulders of the workingman. We ask that this garment be made in the American style and tailored to fit all of our citizens of all races and faiths.

The time has come for Congress to strengthen the hands of those within the labor movement who seek to promote democracy by admitting all persons to membership without regard to race, creed, color, or national origin. This cannot be accomplished merely by outlawing the closed shop. Elections held under the Taft-Hartley Act show that whenever they are given an opportunity to choose the majority of workers will select the union shop, which, for purposes of this testimony, we recognize as the same as the closed shop. The NLRB's own figures from April 1 to June 30, 1948, show that out of 11,882 elections held on the question of union shop, 11,568 resulted in the union's favor. In these elections over a million valid votes were cast by employees. The desire for this protection is natural and important. The Congress should give it to workers in organized labor. At the same time, the Congress is duty bound to include an adequate safeguard to protect persons who would otherwise be discriminated against because of race. Therefore, we recommend that the following amendment be inserted in the labor legislation.

This amendment is to section 8 (a) (3) of the Wagner Act:

Strike the period, substitute a comma, and add the following language: "And is eligible for certification by the Board pursuant to the provisos to section 9 (c); Provided further, That no agreement requiring such membership or payments, although valid when made, shall justify an employer's subsequent discharge of, or refusal to hire any employee whose membership in said labor organization has been denied, segregated, or restricted because of race, religion, color, or national ancestry.

Action on the closed shop, however, will not affect all of the persons who fall within the purview of decisions given by the National Labor Relations Board. A survey of collective-bargaining agreements made by the United States Department of Labor showed that, out of about 29,000,000 workers engaged in the occupatrons in which unions were organizing or endeavoring to obtain written agreements in 1945, about 13.8 million were covered by collective-bargaining agreements. Only 30 percent, or about 4,000,000, were covered by closed- and union-shop agreements with preferential hiring. We quote this study because it was made prior to the time Congress outlawed the closed shop. In order to protect the persons in plants where there is no closed or union shop, the following amendments must be added to the Wagner Act, if it is restored.

Amendment to be inserted at the end of the first sentence in section 9 (c):

Strike the period after the word "selected" and put a colon. Provided, That the Board shall not certify as such representative any labor organization which denies full membership rights or privileges to, or which segregates or otherwise discriminates against, any employee because of race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry.

Amendment to be inserted at the end of the second sentence in section 9 (c):

Provided that neither the certification of a labor organization nor a collective-bargaining agreement with an employer shall constitute a bar to said hearing or to the certification of other representatives where it appears that subsequent to the certification or the execution of the agreement the labor organization has denied full membership rights or privileges to, or has segregated or otherwise discriminated against, any employee because of race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry.

Amendment to be inserted to section 8 (a) (5):

Strike the period, insert a colon, and add the following language: "Provided, That no employer should be required to bargain collectively with a labor organization which is ineligible for certification by the Board pursuant to the provisos to section 9 (c)."

These remedies which we propose are supplementary to what will be required if President Truman's civil-right proposals are adopted in full and we have a Federal fair employment practice law. They are not intended to give to the National Labor Relations Board fair employment functions. They are designed to make equal treatment for all citizens regardless of race a part of labor relations and a part of the thinking and action at the bargaining table.

We believe that the majority of persons who work for a living and who have seen the course of divisive tactics on the part of employers will welcome legal restraints against discrimination.

Mr. BAILEY. At this point there will be included in the record the statement of Elmer W. Henderson, director, American Council on Human Rights.

(The statement is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF ELMER W. HENDERSON, DIRECTOR, AMERICAN COUNCIL ON HUMAN RIGHTS, RELATIVE TO REPEAL OF THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT OF 1947 (THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT)

I have the honor to represent the American Council on Human Rights, composed of seven national fraternities and sororities joined together in a cooperative program to secure the extension of fundamental human and civil rights to all citizens within the United States. They are Alpha Kappa Alpha, founded in 1908 at Howard University in Washington; Alpha Phi Alpha, founded in 1907 at Cornell University in Ithaca, N. Y.; Delta Sigma Theta, founded in 1913 at Howard University; Kappa Alpha Psi, founded in 1911 at the University of Indiana, Bloomington, Ind.; Phi Beta Sigma, founded in 1914 at Howard University; Sigma Gamma Rho, founded in 1922 at Butler University in Indianapolis, Ind., and Zeta Phi Beta, founded in 1920 at Howard University. All of these are very old and established organizations with a combined total of more than 1,200 chapters on college campuses and in cities throughout the United States. They have pooled their resources and the influence of their collective memberships, undergraduate and alumni, in the great American fight to remove discriminations and injustices based on race, color, or religion from our national life.

We have carefully studied the measure before you, and are generally familiar with the original Wagner Act and the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947. We feel the Taft-Hartley Act should be repealed, but we do not feel that the Wagner Act is satisfactory in every respect.

Our primary concern, and this is our main reason for coming before you, is to urge that whatever new labor legislation is enacted by this Congress contain a clear prohibition against racial discrimination on the part of unions covered by it. We do not believe that unions which practice racial or religious discrimination in membership should be allowed the privilege of certification as a bargaining unit. Further, we believe it entirely inconsistent with the spirit or intent of this legislation to permit unions covered by it to exclude, segregate, or separate members of potental members on the basis of race.

It is a well-known fact that a number of prominent labor unions do bar from membership Negro Americans and other minorities. The International Association of Machinists, the Plumbers and Steamfitters Union, A. F. of L., are examples of unions whose constitutions or rituals bar Negroes from membership. The Boilermakers' Union, A. F. of L., is an example of a union which segregates Negroes into auxiliary locals who have no voice in the affairs of the union and are not even allowed to represent themselves in grievances or in bargaining with management. During the war the discrimination practiced by these and certain other unions caused a serious bottleneck in war production. Officials of the Army, the Air Force, the War Production Board, the War Manpower Commission and the Fair Employment Practice Committee will testify to this. These unions are very powerful and have a monopoly in large areas of the industries in which they are engaged. Other unions practice discrimination in various ways all to the detriment of Negroes or other minority workers. This discrimination is not characteristic of the majority of labor unions, of course, but there is no reason in justice or equity why those unions who do discriminate on grounds of race or religion should be allowed the benefits of this legislation. Is it not only just and fair that a union coming to the NLRB demanding recognition should have clean hands? Should the Federal Government put its stamp of approval on this form of discrimination?

We, therefore, strongly recommend the following:

(1) That the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (the Taft-Hartley law) be repealed.

(2) That the original Wagner Act or any new legislation adopted contain provisions prohibiting the certification by the NLRB for bargaining or any other purposes any union which refuses membership to workers because of race or religion or which segregates workers or discriminates against workers because of race or religion.

(3) That the closed shop be prohibited where the union involved refuses membership to workers because of race or religion, or segregates or discriminates against workers because of race or religion.

87579—49——53

We believe these proposals to be only fair and reasonable and should in no way deter the progress of this legislation.

Mr. BAILEY. The next witness will be Mr. Ira Mosher, chairman of the finance committee and former president of the National Association of Manufacturers.

TESTIMONY OF IRA MOSHER, CHAIRMAN OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE AND FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MANUFACTURERS, ACCOMPANIED BY RAYMOND S. SMETHURST, GENERAL COUNSEL

Mr. MOSHER. Mr. Chairman, my name is Ira Mosher. I am chairman of the finance committee, a director and a member of the executive committee of the National Association of Manufacturers. This association has a membership of more than 15,000 companies, 83 percent of which are small and medium-sized businesses, with fewer than 500 employees.

I want to thank you for this opportunity to be heard on a question of such importance to the American people as presented by the consideration of H. R. 2032. That is the question of a national labor policy that will promote industrial peace in this country.

I would like to first repeat what I said before this committee just 2 years ago when Congress was considering legislation to curb the most prolonged and costly strike siege in the history of this Nation. I said then:

No more important task now faces the Congress than the achievement of a practical and workable national labor policy which will permit normal and constructive labor-management relationships and the resumption of free collective bargaining so essential to industrial peace and the health of the Nation's economy.

The task is no less important today in this period of economic readjustment. We have about 2 years' experience operating under our new national labor policy as conceived by Congress in the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. That is the experience which should be weighed carefully and calmly before any decision is made to scrap that policy, as now is proposed by H. R. 2032. This bill would repeal the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, and, except for minor amendments, would reinstate the Wagner Act of 1935.

Few people realize the full implication of a return to the old Wagner Act, and I hope that I can give you an accurate picture of some of the defects which developed in that law from 1935 to 1947. Simple common sense demands that we take a good look at those defects before we take such a backward step. We can do no less than review our experience under the Wagner Act and be guided by the record. It is a voluminous record and I can only summarize a few of the high lights.

First, the Wagner Act was in 1935 and would be in 1949 unfair, one-sided and totally inadequate to safeguard the public interest or to protect the legitimate rights of labor and management.

Second, the Wagner Act permitted in 1935, and would again in 1949 permit biased and unfair administration, which, of itself, encourages labor strife and disunity.

Third, the Wagner Act in 1935 launched the country into a period of strikes, violence, and economic loss, which mounted steadily, even during the war, until enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. These are broad statements, but they are supported by the record.

I want to take those three statements and develop the factual proof of their accuracy. In my brief I have gone into considerable detail. With your permission, I am going to emphasize some of those high lights.

Under the Wagner Act good faith bargaining was not required by the unions and without good-faith bargaining on both sides, there can be no satisfactory collective bargaining. There can't be any real collective bargaining under those situations.

The Board under that law held that employers had to bargain; mere rejection of a demand was not enough. He had to explain his reasons for objection, and he had to offer counterproposals. He had to bargain during the existence of a strike, whether the strike was called to exert bargaining pressure or otherwise.

Since there was no comparable requirement of good faith bargaining, the union wasn't under any obligation. The union wasn't under obligation to make counterproposals or to retreat from original demands, and there are plenty of occasions in the record where strikes were called in the complete absence of any negotiations.

I don't think there is any question but as a principle, No. 1, unions as well as employers should be obligated by law to bargain collectively in good faith, provided that a majority of the employees in an appropriate unit wish to be represented by a union.

Bargaining agreements unenforceable against unions: If you are going to have a contract, I don't see how we can have contracts if they aren't equally enforceable against the other party, each of the two parties concerned.

Neither the Wagner Act nor any other Federal statute made unions legally responsible for their contract obligations.

In the absence of a statute, unincorporated labor organizations were, in this particular, largely governed by State laws. State laws too frequently provided so many obstacles to effective action that unions enjoyed practical immunity from legal responsibility under collective agreements.

The seriousness of this inequitable situation was recognized by President Truman in opening the Labor-Management Conference in November 1945. In 1945 President Truman said, and I quote:

> We shall have to find methods not only of peaceful negotiation of labor contracts, but also of insuring industrial peace for the lifetime of such contracts. Contracts once made must be lived up to and should be changed only in the manner agreed upon by the parties. If we expect confidence in agreements made, there must be responsibility and integrity on both sides in carrying them out.

I have quoted President Truman's own words to the Labor-Management Conference in November 1945.

The inevitable result of the Wagner Act and its administration was to encourage unions to disregard collective agreements whenever expediency would thus be served. There wasn't any stability of relationship, and one of the very purposes of the Wagner Act was defeated.

So I quote principle No. 2 on page 6 of my brief:

> Unions as well as employers should be obligated by law to adhere to the terms of collective-bargaining agreements—collective-bargaining agreements should provide that disputes arising over the meaning and interpretation of a provision should be settled by peaceful procedures.

And that

In that connection, I want to point out that arbitration is of little value unless the union is legally obligated to live up to that award. In fact, it can be confidently predicted that the use of voluntary arbitration rather than strikes would be greatly expanded if unions were responsible for living up to their agreements.

The charges have been made and repeatedly made that the liabilities of unions for violation of collective-bargaining contracts would open the way to court action and lawsuits on the part of employers. This accusation simply isn't supported in any way under the experience of the present law.

The chief argument against the Taft-Hartley provision that makes unions responsible for contract commitments was that it was unnecessary since they were already responsible under State laws wherever they operated.

How do we compare that statement with what actually happened, according to the record, that the minute the Taft-Hartley Act was passed certain unions went to extreme lengths to get provisions into their contracts which completely nullified the intent of the statute?

Free speech of employers: I shan't take your time. I think the subject has been covered, but I hope you will agree that employers and employees should both be protected in the right to express their respective positions.

The administration's proposal now before this committee, without justification or rationalization of any sort, seeks a return to that era in industrial relations when unions, their officers and agents, were the only ones permitted full exercise of their first Amendment right of free speech.

As to the right to strike: The right to strike under the Wagner Act, included not only the right to quit work as a group, but also the right to return to work if and when desired. The strikers retained their status as employees, and were entitled to reinstatement unless as economic strikers their places had been filled.

Specific types of strikes held by the National Labor Relations Board to be within the protection of the act included strikes engaged in before the legal processes of the Board had been invoked, strikes carried on in violation of a State injunction, strikes declared to be illegal under State law, sympathetic strikes, and jurisdictional strikes by a minority union to compel the employer to violate the Wagner Act.

And in one case, the NLRB voluntarily considered a strike in violation of a contract, but did not consider it a ground for discharge. That was corrected later by a Supreme Court decision.

It is apparent, therefore, that the Federal Government's past efforts to equalize bargaining power, created such strength on the side of labor unions as to render true collective bargaining impossible.

No strike should have the protection of law if it involves issues which do not relate to wages, hours or working conditions, or demands which the employer is powerless to grant. Such issues and demands are involved in jurisdictional strikes, sympathy strikes, strikes against the Government, strikes to force employees to ignore or violate the law, strikes to force recognition of an uncertified union, strikes to enforce featherbedding or other work-restrictive demands, or secondary boycotts. The protection of law should not be extended to accomplish those results. There certainly is not any justification in national labor policy for sanctioning the use of strikes in organizational drives or to force union recognition. Government agencies are provided for peaceful settlement of such disputes. Neither industry nor the public should bear the losses resulting from such industrial disputes.

During the past year strikes to compel employers to make concessions which constitute unfair labor practices or which subject the employer to criminal liabilities have been increasing. A sound national labor policy must deal frankly and firmly with this type of abuse.

I would like to point out that on page 10 of my brief we have gone into some detail as to boycotts, and I shall not take up your time to emphasize that further. I just want to quote one paragraph, and I am reading from page 11:

> With one exception, the administration bill would open the door for unions promptly to return to the unrestrained use of secondary boycotts. This single exception would prohibit unions from engaging in secondary boycotts only where the purpose would be to compel an employer to deal with a particular union if another is certified or recognized, or where the purpose would be to compel an employer to assign work contrary to Board award.

That is just one case, and that case could lead to arbitrary decisions and enforced decisions which could control a whole plant as to allocation of work.

Under the Wagner Act there was mass picketing, and company officials were barred from their property; homes were picketed, and local law enforcement had for all practical purposes broken down when confronted with the massed might of organized labor.

Ordinarily, picketing is a vital part of a jurisdictional dispute in which the employer is completely helpless. The picket line normally is also an essential ingredient of the secondary boycott, including the "hot cargo." These weapons in combination are sufficient to force employers either to meet union demands or go out of business.

No individual should be deprived of his right to work at an available job, nor should anybody be permitted to harm or injure the employee, or his family, or his property, at home, at work, or elsewhere. Mass picketing and any other form of coercion or intimidation should be prohibited.

Adequate protection of the individual workers should be a major obligation of the Congress in the formulation of the Nation's labor policy.

Management certainly should not be compelled to bargain collectively with foremen or other representatives of management. I suggest to you that the Taft-Hartley Act reasonably well covered that. There were many disputes, and since the Taft-Hartley Act settled the question by statute, those disputes have practically disappeared. Union spokesmen have made no case nor can they make a case for the return to the uncertainty, confusion and turmoil of the Wagner Act provisions.

Even Mr. William Green of the A. F. of L. testified in 1946 that a line should be drawn between management personnel and rank-and-file union members.

The right to work: One of the fundamental rights recognized under our constitutional system of government is that an individual has a right to work in his chosen trade or profession. Protection of this right is essential to any adequate labor law. However, the right to work was limited through union security provisions encouraged by the Government and protected by the Wagner Act.

That act contained a proviso making closed-shop contracts lawful. Under such contracts no person may be employed unless he is a union member, and unions have the power to exclude from a trade any prospective worker. Moreover, after a person is admitted to membership and permitted to start work, his right to continue work depends almost entirely on retaining good standing in the union. Ordinarily few, if any checks and balances are provided to protect individuals against an autocratic determination of what constitutes good standing.

The basic evil of the closed shop is also present in union shop and maintenance of membership types of union security, since continued employment is conditioned upon membership in good standing. There are cases on that matter, but I shall not bother to quote the exact cases.

The closed shop must be considered in the light of present-day conditions. We now have large international unions possessing such great financial resources and power that they can, and on occasion do, throttle the national economy. While these unions have grown in size and strength, they have compelled employers and the Government to guarantee their continued financial independence and the entrenchment of the union hierarchy, through union security clauses, compulsory check-off of union dues and assessments, and taxes on production through royalty payments.

I suggest that no employee or prospective employee should be required to join or to refrain from joining a union, or to maintain or withdraw his membership in a union, as a condition of employment. Compulsory union membership and interference with voluntary union membership both should be prohibited by law.

At various times during these hearings, the suggestion has been made that perhaps the closed shop could be legalized if its more serious abuses could be abolished, that is, provided certain restrictions or regulations could be established, safeguarding the freedoms of the employer to hire and affording the individual worker adequate protection with respect to access to and retention of his job.

I have given this whole matter a great deal of thought as to whether it is possible to regulate or control the closed shop. I am convinced that adequate regulations or provisions safeguarding the individual employees and employers against the known abuses of this form of union membership would involve such a degree of regimentation and dictation of the internal affairs of labor organizations as to be wholly impractical and probably entirely unacceptable to organized labor. The whole matter comes down to this, that the closed shop is an assignment of monopoly over work opportunity which is contrary to democratic principles, contrary to the public interest, and, as a matter of public policy, should not be permitted either to the employer or a labor union.

The bill before this committee goes much further than the professed desire to reenact the Wagner Act of 1935.

The Wagner Act, in its closed-shop proviso, left to the States their traditional power to legislate with respect to the predominantly local activities of their citizens. The Taft-Hartley Act, in order to avoid any possible doubt, expressly stated that this traditional power of the several States was to remain undisturbed by any actual or presumed exercise of the Federal power over commerce.

H. R. 2032, on the other hand, proposes to have Congress say that the citizens of the sovereign States are to be denied their right to decide whether or not they wish to protect themselves against the abuses and discriminations inherent in the closed shop. Instead of leaving the power in the hands of the people of each State, this bill would delegate to each employer the power to decide whether there can be or should be a closed-shop agreement.

If this proposal is enacted into law, this Congress will nullify the laws of some 16—one-third—of the States of the Union.

The enormity of this proposal is apparent when it is realized that several of the States which have prohibited the closed shop within their boundaries have done so through constitutional amendments ratified by the citizens in a referendum on the precise issue.

Industry-wide bargaining: The Wagner Act promoted unionism in general and provided a basis for extension of industry-wide bargaining. The Clayton Act and the Norris-LaGuardia, at least as interpreted by the Supreme Court, removed labor-union activities from the coverage of the Sherman Act. Thus, union activities on an industry-wide basis, which formerly would have constituted violations of the Sherman Act are now not only permitted but are protected by law.

Labor unionism is, by its very nature, essentially monopolistic.

Professor Charles O. Gregory, formerly Solicitor of the United States Department of Labor, said:

> Now, labor unionism is a frankly monopolistic and anticompetitive institution, even if its major undertakings have been carried on and justified in the name of competition. This has been competition to suppress or combat competition, exactly as it always used to be in big business.

Union activities which restrain trade are congressionally permitted restraints. Congress has granted to private groups the power to impose restraints upon commerce and trade, at the same time denying that power to sovereign States of the Union. No comparable grant of private power exists in our history. Therefore, the question is simply whether Congress shall continue a policy which can and will have a seriously adverse effect upon the public interest. The long-range public interest demands that all trade restraints be outlawed, whether imposed by management or organized labor.

We have heard much about the necessity for legislation to meet national emergencies. We have heard claims of inherent powers residing in the Chief Executive. We have heard arguments for and against injunctions. We have heard proposals for Government seizure of plants and properties. These are but superficial aspects of this whole problem of protection of the public interest in wide-spread industrial strife. Practically without exception, the instances in which the Nation has been confronted with these emergencies have been those involving various degrees of industry-wide bargaining. The basic solution to this problem is not to invest the Government with more autocratic powers over labor and management, but to attack the problem at the source by regulating the practice of collective bargaining on a national industry-wide basis.

Such a shortcoming in national labor policy not only jeopardizes the cause of sound collective bargaining, but opens the way for Government intervention on an ever-increasing scale in the form of injunction, compulsory arbitration, and even Government seizure of private property.

Much has been said in criticism of the injunction feature of the present law as used in emergency cases. It is alleged that the injunction settles nothing, and may encourage the suspension of bargaining and allow a new "heating-up" period.

H. R. 2032 seeks to deal with this problem by use of fact-finding panels or boards, a procedure which not only fails to settle anything, but also which, judging from my experience with ad hoc boards, is even more destructive of bargaining than provisions of existing law. Certainly we have to consider this question: Is this Congress willing to delegate to the unlimited discretion of a temporary board the power to determine the vital economic issues which may be involved in these national emergency cases?

My opinion is that the present law has worked reasonably well. Its weakness may be due largely to the fact that the injunction is for a definite period, thus permitting the parties to gauge the profit and loss involved if agreement is not reached within the 80-day period. Instead of scrapping the injunction, therefore, I would recommend that the courts upon recommendation of the Government be authorized to extend the life of the injunction so long as public health and safety may require.

My suggestion is based on two observations:

First, I have seen little, if any, evidence that Congress is willing to deal with the root of the problem, namely, the monopolistic nature of national, industry-wide collective bargaining; and

Second, no other proposal has been advanced which, based upon experience, can be anywhere near as effective as provisions of existing law.

Gentlemen, I have tried to cover certain basic principles. I hold no brief for the Taft-Hartley Act, as such. What we need is a fair national labor policy.

I have two other points I would like to cover:

As to the biased, unfair administration of the Wagner Act, the record is very long, and I shall not take up your time to cover the points made in the briefs. I just want to refer to certain things that happened in 1939.

The American Federation of Labor endorsed and supported a bill to make it obligatory on the Board to respect the right of craft groups to decide for themselves by majority vote who their bargaining representative shall be; to curtail the assumed power of the Board to invalidate legal contracts between employers and labor organizations; and to correct the Board's procedure so that all parties affected by any case will be given due notice, accorded a fair hearing, protected against abuses of discretion and assured of adequate judicial review of wrongful decrees.

Separation of functions: One of the major factors contributing to loss of respect for the National Labor Relations Board as an impartial agency of government was the lack of separation of its prosecuting and judicial functions, which is a very necessary and vital feature in this situation.

The House committee investigating the Board went into it in considerable detail.

Such a separation of functions has long been advocated for other administrative agencies. For example, President Roosevelt, in transmitting the final report of the Attorney General's Committee on Administrative Procedure in Government Agencies to Congress, said:

> The practice of creating independent regulatory commissions, who perform administrative work in addition to judicial work, threatens to develop a fourth branch of the Government for which there is no sanction in the Constitution.

The plan submitted by the President at that time included the separation of judicial from all other functions performed by any agency, whether an independent board, or commission, or a bureau within an executive department.

I would just like to mention briefly the Conciliation Service. There has been a lot of conflicting testimony, and I want to point out to you it never has been the opinion of management that the Conciliation Service should be under the Department of Labor. They have never had any other opinion than that the Conciliation Service should maintain its independency of thought and action, and not be dominated by one of the other Boards responsible for other affairs. I have gone into that in detail in the brief.

I would like to mention briefly the record of industrial strife under the Wagner Act, on page 26. The figures are the figures of the Department of Labor, and they stand for themselves. The facts are that the annual average number of strikes during the war years, when labor's "no-strike" pledge was in effect, was 4,106—higher even that during the nonwar years immediately preceding. The one-sided nature of the Wagner Act was, in my judgment, largely responsible for creating this situation. The number of strikes and work stoppages has decreased materially from the high point reached in 1946. Bureau of Labor Statistics figures show that since the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act jurisdictional strikes and rival union strikes have all but disappeared. Much the same is true of strikes involving closed- or union-shop issues which have heretofore always been a fruitful source of labor disputes.

In closing, I would like to summarize. Since the present labor policy was established there is ample evidence of its effectiveness in improving relations between employees and employers in inividual companies. The most important benefits may be summarized briefly as follows:

(1) Recognition by both labor and management of the responsibility they share under law has increased the mutual respect, mutual confidence and the will of both parties to reach agreements across the bargaining table.

(2) The number and frequency of "quickie" or "outlaw" strikes have been materially reduced as the outgrowth of legal responsibility for observance of contracts.

(3) Employers, employees and the community have been afforded badly-needed protection against violence and coercion involved in mass picketing.

(4) Countless employers, employees and communities have been spared the bitterness and losses of jurisdictional strikes.

Testimony has been afforded this committee that in the case of the construction industry and the printing trades jurisdictional strikes have practically ceased since the present national labor policy became effective.

(5) Individual companies and their employees not directly involved in dispute have been protected against interruptions of work and loss of income by reason of the ban imposed on secondary boycotts.

(6) Elimination of Communist leadership in many unions, made possible by the present law, has greatly improved union-management relations and restored the confidence of employers in union motives and objectives.

(7) Safeguards thrown around the rights and privileges of the individual employee have given the worker an opportunity to express his will in the choice of his bargaining agents without fear of coercion or intimidation by unions or employers.

(8) Presidential intervention in national emergency disputes has saved large segments of the American public from losses in production and earnings resulting from inability to secure essential raw materials, supplies or services.

(9) Removal of the employers' legal obligation to recognize and bargain with supervisory groups has had a salutary effect upon the unity and effectiveness of the management group and has improved the supervisors' effectiveness in handling relations with employees.

These are specific benefits in terms of improved relations between labor and management in the plants and individual companies of American industry. For the most part, they never could have been realized under the old Wagner Act. Proposals for revision of present national labor policy now under consideration by this committee would seriously endanger, if not largely nullify, these gains.

Let me repeat my plea to consider improving the present national labor policy rather than go backward to a policy of proven failure. Nothing is more vital than labor peace to our national economy right now when we strive for more and more industrial production to meet the domestic and foreign demands of our nation. The best hope for industrial peace is through preservation of a sound national labor policy.

Mr. KELLEY (presiding). Mr. Mosher, how much did your organization have to do with writing the bill, framing or influencing it, in 1947?

Mr. MOSHER. I would say our organization, as such, sir, had nothing to do with writing the legislation. The principles—which I have tried to give you here in much too brief a form—came into being specifically as the result of the Labor-Management Conference called by President Truman. This is the first opportunity management has had, as a whole, in and outside of the association of manufacturers, to sit down and go over the proposition. It so happens that it was approved by the Congress of American Industry, which had an annual meeting in December of 1945, and it was reaffirmed. It was under continual study, and had been for a good many years.

It was studied and reaffirmed in December 1946. Those positions were made known to all of our members, as a process of education is usually necessary in most of these things. That was made known to all of the organizations that we could reach. As to the actual writing of the bill, we stand on these principles.

I want to point out that a great many of those principles are not in the Taft-Hartley Act. They are much broader than even the Taft-Hartley Act is.

Mr. KELLEY. It is my understanding by "broader," you mean they would have a greater coverage?

Mr. MOSHER. They would have a greater protection for the American public. I think the industry-wide bargaining and the closed-shop issue are the particular ones. We have tried to look at the thing from a broad, over-all, public basis, and not from the standpoint of any particular statute, and certainly not from the standpoint of the Taft-Hartley Act, as such.

Mr. KELLEY. You said you held no brief for the Taft-Hartley Act, as such?

Mr. MOSHER. No, I stand on the principles, 8, 9, or 10, in number, which are broader than the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you think it is possible to write a labor bill with as brief a time as a congressional committee or the Congress has to give to it? Do you not think the ramifications and the complexities of the relationship between management and labor is such that it would require more study and investigation than is given to it by Congress?

Mr. MOSHER. Mr. Chairman, I was hesitating and trying to remember what I said 2 years ago this month, in this same chamber, when the question was asked at that time. I had some facts and figures then, but I do not have them now, as to how many thousands and thousands of pages of testimony there were and how many weeks and months had been put into the problem through a great many committees, to answer your question specifically.

You asked me if I think that time would permit a congressional committee to write a labor bill, and I would like to make this answer, that if you are going to write a labor bill, there is only one thing for you to do, and that is to take whatever time it may take to write that bill.

Mr. KELLEY. That leads up to this thought I had, that a commission set up, with certain Members of the House and certain Members from the Senate, along with certain members from management and certain members from labor, to sit down and make a complete survey of management relations and problems, and by doing that they could go out to the grass roots, let us say, and investigate the complaints, complaints that come from labor and complaints that come from management, that I do not think the committee has ever been able to do.

Mr. MOSHER. The thought you express strikes a very responsive cord in me. To be frank, I spent about 4 years on this problem, starting in on it at the beginning of 1945. The Labor-Management Conference of 1945 was the first real attempt made—there were other spasmodic attempts, which were not productive of results for reasons I do not think we need to go into—but that was the first time labor and management ever sat down for a prolonged period to try to arrive at certain conclusions.

The history of that attempt is well known. As a matter of fact, we had no trouble in our various committees arriving at fairly good agreements. They never came into being because there were certain people who did not want labor peace. It is a broad statement, but I will let it stand on the record. We did everything we could to inform the public as to management's stand in those situations. The cold, hard facts are that labor did not want to do anything. That is almost 100 percent true. They just did not want to do anything.

It is true we made our position known to the public through every vehicle we had and, as a matter of fact, I might say that the public wrote the Taft-Hartley Act. There was no association that wrote the Taft-Hartley Act; it was the public who wrote it. It was public demand on Congress that created the Taft-Hartley Act. There can be no other explanation of the situation.

Mr. KELLEY. Many people feel the public has also said to Congress, "You have to do something else about it."

Mr. MOSHER. That has been one of the most cruel hoaxes pulled on the American public. Through the use of semantics the Taft-Hartley Act has become anathema to nearly everybody just because it is called the slave-labor law, and everybody thinks, a large portion of the public do, and they have not studied the bill, and they do not know the implications of it. When we try to secure from labor leaders themselves definite evidence of unfairness in the various parts of the bill, it is almost impossible to secure it.

Yes, you get a lot of imaginary situations, but they have not happened. I would not say they could not happen under certain circumstances, but they have not happened, and the Taft-Hartley Act has not hurt labor one bit. The labor unions have gained under it, and have continued to gain under it.

Mr. KELLEY. Of course, then, the question arises that the bill has not been in effect long enough to really prove the bad features of it.

Mr. MOSHER. If it has not been in effect long enough, I would suggest it should not be repealed. It should be allowed to run long enough to prove it is right or wrong. If it is wrong, we certainly should change it.

Mr. KELLEY. You said at the conference labor would not do anything?

Mr. MOSHER. No, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Maybe labor said management would not do anything. They might say management has asked for too much.

Mr. MOSHER. The best answer I can give to you is contained in my statement, that in the eight committees we had, with one exception, according to my recollection—it has been nearly 4 years ago now—we came to a substantial agreement with various union labor leaders only to have those agreements completely upset within the succeeding 24 hours. That is the record.

Mr. KELLEY. Of course, the bad thing about that conference was, it was of rather short duration.

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, it was of short duration. The President made the suggestion in the summer of 1935, and it took us—I know quite a few of us were involved—it took us at least 2 months, August, September, and October, to plan the details of the conference. I never saw harder work put into anything in my life than went into the planning, and the conference met for substantially 4 weeks.

Mr. KELLEY. That is not long enough for a job like that.

Mr. MOSHER. With the groups of individuals who were pretty well conversant with the subject—perhaps it was not long enough, but it was quite a long period, and there were certain principles developed. As you will remember, out of the conference came a report that showed right in one column what management wanted, and in the next column what labor wanted, and that was the first time, to my knowledge, that the respective positions of the two sides were ever put down in print like that.

Mr. KELLEY. You said a minute ago that the labor leaders say that it is a slave bill, but the strange part of it is when you go out and meet and talk to the members of organized labor the people who make up the unions, and talk to their families, they are just as bitter about it as the labor leaders are.

Mr. MOSHER. I will refer back to what I said a moment ago, that a job has been done to make that Taft-Hartley Act a very unpopular one. I would not want to refer to polls, particularly in view of certain things that have happened in recent months, but such surveys as have been made prove pretty clearly that the individual union members in this country do not find fault with the bulk of the specific points covered by the Taft-Hartley Act. In other words, they think the Taft-Hartley Act is bad—I agree with you on that, that is the general impression—but when you ask them about all the specific things down the line, they cannot find any fault with those provisions that are in the act. I have talked to a good many union labor leaders, and I have had some of them tell me it was the finest thing ever passed, and that they had made it work. I had one particular one say he had not made anywhere near the progress before the Taft-Hartley Act that he had made since.

Mr. KELLEY. I come in contact with a great many individual members of labor organizations, and I have yet to meet one who says it is any good. They feel it is an attack upon their liberties, and they feel they have been singled out as a group of people and legislated against. That is the way they feel about it.

Mr. MOSHER. You see, I am having a little trouble in answering. I am not quarreling with your statement when you say that is the way they feel. That seems to be so, but that is the result of a terrific amount of propaganda and statements that are not true, statements that are exaggerated, to say the least, and it is just general condemnation of the bill, and they do not go into detail, and the people with whom they talk do not go into detail, either.

Mr. KELLEY. It is a matter of opinion. That is the way you feel about it, but some people do not feel that way, and they are pretty bitter about it, those whom I have seen.

I suppose my time is up.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Mosher, you state on page 1 of your testimony, and I quote:

> Two years ago Congress was considering legislation to curb the most prolonged and costly strike siege in the history of this Nation.

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you know how many workers were involved in strikes in 1919, a comparable period, after World War I?

Mr. MOSHER. To answer your specific question, no, I do not know what the strike situation was.

I have some figures here from the Department of Labor which show that in 1919 there were 3,630 work stoppages, covering 4,160,000 people, and that is the BLS figure.

In 1946 there were 4,985 work stoppages, covering 4,600,000 people.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, at this time I would like to submit for inclusion in the record three official papers of statistics from the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

The first one is under the caption "Trends in Work Stoppages Following World War I and World War II," and it compares the periods of 1918 and 1948. It gives the number of strikes, the workers involved, and the percentages.

No. 2 is "Work Stoppages for the Year 1948 as Compared with 1935–39" and No. 3 is a series of comparisons on the period following World War I and World War II.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, they will be inserted in the record.

(The material referred to is as follows:)

Trends in work stoppages following World War I and World War II

5. Percent of estimated working time lost in relation to total time worked (percent)	0.4	0.3

[1] Preliminary estimates.

RELATION OF STRIKE ACTIVITY TO SIZE OF LABOR FORCE

Line 3 shows that in 1948 relatively more workers were involved in stoppages (as compared with the total employed) than the average for the 5 years 1935–39.

Line 5 shows that idleness resulting from stoppages in 1948 was somewhat greater (in relation to total time worked) than during the 5 years 1935–39.

STRIKE COMPARISONS

Obviously unfair to base comparisons on unlike periods.

1946 was a year of widespread readjustment, a postwar phenomenon similar to after World War I when industrial unrest was also great. For example, in 1919 (first postwar year), 20.8 percent of all workers were involved in strikes; in 1946 (again a "first" postwar year), only 14.5 percent of workers involved in strikes.

(See table, supra, for strike trends for World War I and World War II.)

A fair comparison is 1935–39 period (following enactment of Wagner Act, and 1947–48 (following passage of Taft-Hartley Act). Such a comparison shows that in the last 18 months under the Taft-Hartley Act:

(a) A rise of 8 percent in strikes.

(b) A rise of 50 percent in workers involved.

(c) A rise of 80 percent in man-days idle.

(d) A rise of from 4.4 percent to 5.6 percent in the proportion of all workers involved in strikes.

(e) A rise of from 0.3 percent to 0.4 percent in the amount of time lost because of strikes (see table, supra).

Thus, statistics show that Wagner Act (in normal economic period) promoted more peaceful industrial relations than has the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. MOSHER. Mr. Chairman, I have here the Bureau of Labor Statistics report on work stoppages in the United States for 1916 to 1948, which I would like to put in the record.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be inserted in the record.

[1] The exact number of workers involved in some strikes which occurred from 1916 to 1926 is not known. The missing information is for the smaller disputes, however, and it is believed that the totals here given are approximate.

[2] Not available.

[3] Preliminary estimates.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Mosher, on page 2, you begin your case that the Wagner Act was unfair, one-sided, and inadequate.

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. The committee has heard similar testimony from other employers as to the one-sided nature of the Wagner Act, and in this connection I would like to ask if during the operation of the Wagner Act you ever heard of any employee firing his boss or the president of his company?

Mr. MOSHER. I am not sure that I follow the question. I am sure I do not know the import of the question. I know there were plenty of attempts made to fire the boss.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you know of any instance where a boss or the president of a company was fired?

Mr. MOSHER. I would have to go to the record. I would have trouble remembering it.

Mr. BAILEY. I think your answer, Mr. Mosher, explains why the Wagner Act gave protection to the worker.

Mr. MOSHER. I do not see the connection, Mr. Bailey. I am at a loss.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, there is a connection.

Mr. MOSHER. I do not see it. I am asking you to explain it to me.

Mr. BAILEY. During that period, the employer could fire his employees, but the employee could not get away with firing the employer. That is plain enough; is it not?

Mr. MOSHER. Has it ever been so; that an employee could fire his employer? He can quit his employer anytime he wants to and get another one.

Mr. BAILEY. You are finding all kinds of fault with the Wagner Act. I wanted to ask you whether you ever heard of it occurring under the Wagner Act?

Mr. MOSHER. I do not see the import of your question, sir. I do not see what it means. You asked me if I ever heard of——

Mr. BAILEY. I think you get the point.

Mr. MOSHER. I simply do not. You will have to take my word for that.

Mr. BAILEY. On page 242, you state:

> A return to the discredited procedures followed under the Wagner Act would serve notice that Congress now approves the discredited practices which were sought to be corrected in the Administrative Procedure Act.

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask you if you think there is anything, after reading H. R. 2032, in that act that leads you to believe that any other procedures would be followed other than the procedures set out in the Administrative Procedure Act?

Mr. MOSHER. I assume that, under your present House bill, it means the virtual restoration of the Wagner Act, the reenactment of the Wagner Act with certain changes, changes which do not have to do particularly with administration.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask you——

Mr. MOSHER. I have not answered you, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Go ahead.

Mr. MOSHER. I would assume that the conditions which through a period of quite a few years existed under the Wagner Act would come back into being. I have no right to draw any other conclusion.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you know that the NLRB is now the only agency in the Government in which an exception was made to the Administrative Procedure Act under the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. MOSHER. It is the only agency where we needed that sort of thing. Our past experience has proved to us that you had to do something, and it was presumably done.

Mr. BAILEY. Why vary, then, from all other legislation? Why follow the Administrative Procedure Act in every case until you come to the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. MOSHER. I am inclined to believe that it should be done in any other similar situation. In any other similar Commission, where you have the right of trial and the assessment of damages, the right of investigation, to start with, all carried under one body, it cannot be judicial, and that unfairness arises under those situations, I think it is not a question of changing the Taft-Hartley Act to agree with other administrative procedures, but you ought to change the other administrative procedures to correct the difficulties.

Mr. BAILEY. You think, then, that it should not have been singled out for special treatment?

Mr. MOSHER. No; I did not say that. I said quite the opposite, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Going back to the matter of statistics, you state on page 26 of your presentation that the annual average of strikes during the war years 1941 to 1945, inclusive, when labor's no-strike pledge was in effect, was 4,106 higher than during the 9 years immediately preceding it. Now, for the record, Mr. Mosher, it should be stated that there were 14,731 strikes between December 8, 1941, and August 14, 1945. This is an annual average of approximately 3,700. You in your statistics evidently included in your figures 4½ months of dislocation after the war was over, including the peak month of September 1945, when there was a total of 572 strikes.

I would just like the record to show that. These figures are official figures from the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

That is all.

Mr. MOSHER. Let me read two sentences. Perhaps I had better read the paragraph:

> Between 1916 and 1935, the average annual number of strikes in the United States in the absence of compulsory collective bargaining of employers was, by Bureau of Labor Statistics figures, 1,867. Between the years 1936 and 1946, inclusive, the annual average amounted to 3,682, an increase of 97 percent. Nor does the fact that World War II intervened to introduce abnormal conditions disturb the trend of these statistics. Between 1935 and 1941, inclusive, nonwar years, the average annual number of strikes was 3,015. The annual average during the war years 1942 to 1945, inclusive, when labor's no-strike pledge was in effect, was 4,160—higher even than during the nonwar years immediately preceding.

Those are from the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Mr. BAILEY. Apparently there is a difference in the figures as presented.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. I yield my time to Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs, you have 20 minutes.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Mosher, I am somewhat in agreement with you on one proposition, I find; that is, you do not find out much about what is in the law by calling it by name.

Mr. MOSHER. No.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, it was not very revealing to say that it was a slave labor law; was it?

Mr. MOSHER. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think it was very revealing to refer to it as a bill of rights for labor?

Mr. MOSHER. I think quite a bit more so.

Mr. JACOBS. You think quite a bit more so?

Mr. MOSHER. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, I suppose it depends upon who happens to agree with the particular name; is that right?

Mr. MOSHER. That might have something to do with it.

Mr. JACOBS. We used to say every crow thinks its own chick is the blackest, in other words.

You said that there had been a job done last year, and I think I agree with you. I tried to help do the job, in a very small way. But was there not quite an effort to do the job before that? In other words, didn't your organization spend quite a bit of money advertising in favor of this law about the time it was passed?

Mr. MOSHER. We had ads as to these labor principles before the Taft-Hartley Act was drafted, according to my best recollection. They had to do with this set of principles which came out of the Labor-Management Conference.

Mr. JACOBS. And at the same time it was pending also; is that not correct?

Mr. MOSHER. Let me look in my record, if I may.

Mr. JACOBS. For example, I will ask you if you did not have about a half-page ad in the Indianapolis Star on the 13th day of May 1947 which carried a banner headline and said, "Road to Freedom for the American Worker."

Mr. MOSHER. Whether that was in the Indianapolis Star or not, I do not know. It may have been put in by the National Association of Manufacturers, or it might have been put in by any group of people who believed in the same thing. There was an ad published at that time.

Mr. JACOBS. I beg your pardon. The question was as to whether it was by the National Association of Manufacturers. It does bear your name, and I have a copy here.

Mr. MOSHER. Then it presumably was NAM's ad.

Mr. JACOBS. There is one thing there that stood out in my mind when I read it, and it sent me to the bill to examine it very carefully, because I happened to have a lawsuit that I was handling at that time, and I thought, "Now, if this is true, this lawsuit is going to be awfully easy to win."

And that is this statement: "The right to speak his own mind regarding his own welfare without fear of being kicked out of the union."

Now, the question I want to put to you, Mr. Mosher, is this. Can you tell me what section of the Taft-Hartley Act you can find that in?

Mr. MOSHER. It is in section 8 (a) (3). I am quoting Mr. Smethurst just now, because I do not know the law that well. It is in the bill.

Mr. JACOBS. That is section 8 (a) (3)?

Mr. MOSHER (reading):

That no employer shall justify any discrimination against an employee for nonmembership in a labor organization (A) if he has reasonable grounds for believing that such membership was not available to the employee on the same terms and conditions generally applicable to other members or (B) if he has reasonable grounds for believing that membership was denied or terminated for reasons other than the failure of the employee to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership.

Mr. JACOBS. That is what you refer to in saying that the man cannot be kicked out of the union?

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Does it say——

Mr. MOSHER. He will not lose his job.

Mr. JACOBS. Does it say that he cannot be kicked out of the union?

Mr. MOSHER. He cannot lose his job. He can be kicked out of the union.

Mr. JACOBS. Then, under the Taft-Hartley law, he can be kicked out of the union, and there is no remedy to put him back in the union, is there?

Mr. MOSHER. He cannot lose his job. That is what we are trying to protect.

Mr. JACOBS. I did not ask you that.

Read the question to the witness.

(The question was read to the witness.)

Mr. JACOBS. The question is, Does the Taft-Hartley Law give a man a remedy for reinstatement in the union?

Mr. MOSHER. I think you are trying to pick something out here. Let us read the whole text and see what we are trying to say.

Mr. JACOBS. Just a moment. I do not want you to read anything. My time is limited. I want you to tell me what section of the Taft-Hartley Act prevents—now, I am going to use the very words of your ad as it appeared in the Indianapolis Star on May 13, 1947. What section of the Taft-Hartley law prevents a man, a union member, from "being kicked out of the union"? Now, tell me what section it is.

Mr. MOSHER. Section 8 (a), which reads:

That no employer shall justify any discrimination against an employee for nonmembership in a labor organization (A) if he has reasonable grounds for believing that such membership was not available to the employee on the same terms and conditions generally applicable to other members or (B) if he has reasonable grounds for believing that membership was denied or terminated for reasons other than the failure of the employee to tender the periodic dues and initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership.

Then the act goes on.

Mr. JACOBS. Is that the section that you refer to which says that a man cannot be kicked out of the union?

Mr. MOSHER. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Does it say in that section anywhere that he cannot be kicked out of the union, or does it merely say that he may work without being a member of the union?

Mr. MOSHER. Well, the ad says, "The right to speak his own mind regarding his own welfare without——"

Mr. JACOBS. I am not referring to that, Mr. Mosher. I am talking about "being kicked out of the union."

Let us stay with the one point, because that is the point I was interested in, and your ad caused me to spend a lot of time reading that law looking for that point, and I have never found it yet. I want you to tell me just where it is in that law that it says that a man cannot be kicked out of the union. Let me say this, Mr. Mosher. We are not going to get off the point until you either tell me where it is or admit that it is not there.

Now, let us stick with the point.

Mr. MOSHER. The ad says, and I am reading from it, "Kicked out of the union or fined or fired from his job."

Mr. JACOBS. All right.

Mr. MOSHER. And the intention of this clause 8 (a) as I interpret it just simply indicates that. That is the intent of it.

Mr. JACOBS. To let him work without belonging to the union; is that it?

Mr. MOSHER. That is right; surely.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Now, does it say anywhere in the law that the man cannot be kicked out of the union?

Mr. MOSHER. Except as I quoted from section 8 (a), I do not know. I have quoted from section 8 (a), which is intended to cover that phase of it, I assume.

Mr. JACOBS. Which allows the man to work without belonging to the union. That is what it does, is it not?

Mr. MOSHER. That is what it does.

Mr. JACOBS. So, if the man had death benefits or pension rights under his union and is kicked out of the union, he could go to work, but it does not protect his pension rights, does it?

Mr. MOSHER. I do not suppose it does.

Mr. JACOBS. No.

Mr. MOSHER. It probably does not go anywhere near far enough. I think the statement should have been a lot broader one.

Mr. JACOBS. And it does not protect his pension rights nor his death benefits nor any other benefits that he might have; is that not right? Do you agree with that?

Mr. SMETHURST. Let me——

Mr. JACOBS. Well, put the microphone over and let the other man answer the question if he wants to.

Mr. MOSHER. No; he is just trying to interpret your language to me. I am not familiar with this law from a legal standpoint, you understand, Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. You are not familiar with it?

Mr. MOSHER. I am not familiar with the law from the legal phraseology that you are using.

Mr. JACOBS. There is not anything that is too technical about kicking a man out of the union and saying that the law will not permit that. I just want those simple words pointed out to me.

If you have anyone with you on your staff that can point it out, I will be glad to receive it from them.

Mr. MOSHER. Well, you have section 302 (a), (b), and (c), the whole section, that has to do with——

Mr. JACOBS. If you can find the language that says that a man cannot be kicked out of a union, I want you to read it to me.

Mr. MOSHER. If I may, I will let Mr. Smethurst answer it. Is that satisfactory, sir?

Mr. JACOBS. If anybody can point that out to me, I shall be very happy to hear it.

Mr. SMETHURST. May I have the permission of the Chair?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Mr. SMETHURST. Apparently we have two questions here now.

Mr. JACOBS. No, Mr. Smethurst. We have only one.

Mr. KELLEY. Will you state your name?

Mr. SMETHURST. Ray Smethurst, counsel for the NAM.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, Mr. Smethurst, we have one question, and not two. The question is a very——

Mr. SMETHURST. May I interrupt a moment?

Mr. JACOBS. Just a moment until I finish.

Mr. SMETHURST. May I have the reporter read the question back?

Mr. JACOBS. Just a moment. I will tell you what the question is.

Mr. SMETHURST. May I have the question read back?

Mr. JACOBS. No; you may not. I will state the question to you exactly as it was before, to point out to me the language in the Taft-Hartley Act which says that a man is protected from "being kicked out of the union," and I am reading from your ad.

Mr. SMETHURST. Well, No. 1: I would not read an ad to learn the law. That would be my first point.

Mr. JACOBS. That would be very good advice. Now, will you answer the question?

Mr. SMETHURST. The second answer is that the ad has to be interpreted and read in the light of the first line, which is talking about a man's losing his job by virtue of being or not being a member of a union.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words——

Mr. SMETHURST. So that the statement——

Mr. JACOBS. I just want to ask you this one question. Can you point out to me the language which says that a man cannot be kicked out of a union? That is what I want. If you can do it, point it out to me. If you cannot, will you please say so?

Mr. SMETHURST. The question is asked without reference to the accuracy of the ad.

Mr. JACOBS. No. I do not want an argument from you. I just want you to tell me whether or not that is in the act and, if it is, point it out to me.

Mr. SMETHURST. May I answer the question without being argumentative?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes; without being argumentative.

Mr. SMETHURST. If you want an answer without reference to the ad, the answer is "No," and the law should be clarified to cover that.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. That answers the question. That is what I was trying to get at all the time.

So we finally arrive at the point where this bill of rights that protected the worker actually protected him in permitting him to work without belonging to the union. That is what it amounts to.

So we will proceed to the next question. I have heard a great deal about the right to work, and I think that a man should have a right to work. I agree with the witness that preceded you, who testified here.

Mr. SMETHURST. Thank you for the compliment.

Mr. JACOBS. I am wondering what becomes of the man's right to work when the man to whom he applies for a job will not hire him. Does he have a right to work then?

Mr. SMETHURST. Is that directed at me?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes; anybody who wants to answer it. Mr. Mosher can answer it.

Mr. SMETHURST. I defer to the witness.

Mr. MOSHER. No; that does not protect him, except as you go by the principles of the union shop as expressed in the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. I think that when the Government tried to give a man the right to work back in the early thirties, when there was no work, they invented a word for that, which they called boondoggling.

I want to ask you one more question, Mr. Mosher, about the matter of industry-wide bargaining. And I am dead serious about it, because I think it is a very serious matter. When you get to the end of your delay period, as I understand it, you say that the deficiency of the law is that the injunction should continue.

Let us take a case. Suppose that I was working for you and you and I had a dispute, and it is just assumed that there are enough of us so that it creates a national emergency. And suppose we cannot settle that dispute and it goes to injunction. How long would you continue the injunction until you would have the Government come in and fix my wages? Or would you have me work at the wage that was prevailing at the time the injunction was entered?

Mr. MOSHER. I would provide for your working. Bear in mind that we have no law, and I hope we never have a law, that says a man has got to work at any particular time. I do not advocate under any conditions any law which makes the individual continue to work. The individual has a right to quit work when, as, and if he pleases.

We are talking about concerted action, general strikes, country-wide strikes, strikes that are of such importance as to reach country-wide proportions. I think that an injunction would well be continued until the parties involved have come to an agreement.

Mr. JACOBS. On a tide of rising cost of living, then, you would say this. Take the coal industry. That has been the most drastic example we have had. We will take the coal industry where there are some 400,000 or 450,000 men working. Let us say they are working, just to make it simple, at $1 an hour, and the cost of living increases to almost 180 points. You would say that the injunction would continue, and all these miners would just quit and fade away from the coal mines and seek employment some place else; is that right?

Mr. MOSHER. I do not think that is the history of the coal situation, from what I know about the coal industry.

Mr. JACOBS. I am using an illustration, now. Would you think that would be the proper thing to do?

Mr. MOSHER. No; I do not think under such conditions that would be the proper thing to do, because in the first place, that is not the way it works out in practice.

Mr. JACOBS. But you would continue the injunction in force, forbid the men to strike, without fixing their wages; is that right?

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, I guess that would not leave much of an argument. You might be able to make this law what the union leaders said it was if you worked it up a little bit further.

Mr. MOSHER. I do not think so. I am not proposing and have not insinuated in any way that any individual should be forced to continue at his job. We are talking about national emergencies, in which we have no other recourse. They threatened to assume proportions to tie up the whole country, and it was the management's side of the labor-management conference that agreed that under certain conditions where an emergency was declared by the President, he should be given the right to go certain distances. And out of that general feeling came the provision in the Taft-Hartley Act. I assume it came from that. I do not think it goes far enough.

Mr. JACOBS. I think the legislative history will show that it was a trend that has been going on almost 60 years that has culminated in those provisions.

Mr. MOSHER. There is one other point, Mr. Congressman, that we must not lose sight of by any manner of means, and that is that the public was pretty well aroused, and was on the verge of demanding compulsory arbitration of labor-management disputes. And when you get compulsory arbitration, I see no end to that.

Mr. JACOBS. I know what you are talking about. I have thought about that, too. But at the same time, I wonder if a man could possibly conceive of a large number of workers in an industry being enjoined from striking for higher wages permanently without fixing their wages. I wonder how practical that is.

Mr. MOSHER. That is a little difficult to say, but I do not think it would happen that way, because the employer is no more anxious to have his plant closed up permanently than the employee is to lose his job. We have two people at interest.

Mr. JACOBS. He is not going to have it closed. You are going to have an injunction.

Mr. MOSHER. No. But under your example, he is going to quit, and there is not going to be any industry. That was your example.

Mr. JACOBS. You mean, if the men all fade away.

Mr. MOSHER. If the men all fade away, there would be nothing left.

Mr. JACOBS. That is, if they go into another industry.

Mr. MOSHER. And you and I as employers do not want to see that happen.

Mr. JACOBS. But it seems to me—and here is where you and I separate—that you are going on the basis of the individual employee making up his mind that he would work for the wage prevailing at the time the dispute arose or he could leave and go somewhere else. You are going on the theory that the individual can cope with or compete with, the employer. I am a little afraid I cannot agree with you.

Mr. MOSHER. No, I am not going that far. I am not going that far at all. I think that under actual practice, the employer is just as anxious to keep that business operating as is the employee to work, and their interests to that extent certainly are mutual.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, as long as the employee was under the injunction, he would not have very much of a choice in the matter, would he, unless the wages fell so utterly low that he would have to seek employment elsewhere?

Mr. MOSHER. You could take injunctions for 90-day periods and continue them, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. JACOBS. Sir?

Mr. MOSHER. If you do not like the idea of the long, permanent injunction, you certainly can do it in steps. This whole subject is relatively——

Mr. JACOBS. You mean, you would make it easy for the dog by cutting his tail off just an inch at a time?

Mr. MOSHER. Well, that happens sometimes. It is a little easier.

Mr. JACOBS. I want to ask you a question about this free speech. I understand that it is your view that section 8 (c) should be retained.

I do not believe I will ask you about that. You said that you were not a lawyer and not very well versed in technicalities.

Mr. MOSHER. No, I am not a lawyer.

Mr. JACOBS. Then perhaps this question would not be fair to you.

Mr. MOSHER. All I can say is that I believe in free speech and quote the experience under the law. That is all.

Mr. JACOBS. You do not believe in recognizing the section that we talk about as being a rule of evidence?

Mr. MOSHER. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. You do not understand that at all?

Mr. MOSHER. No, sir. I think that I have heard your point, but I am not qualified to discuss that.

Mr. JACOBS. You did make some reference to the financial power of unions, did you not?

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Are you familiar with the total wealth of, say, the first 32 international unions?

Mr. MOSHER. No, I cannot quote that. I have seen the figures at times, but I do not remember what they were.

Mr. JACOBS. I think you will find it in Life magazine. The total is about $220,000,000. That is a right smart lot of money, is it not?

Mr. MOSHER. A lot of money.

Mr. JACOBS. It would be, for me or you. But are you familiar with the value of the first——

Mr. KELLEY. You mean billion, do you not?

Mr. JACOBS. No. I mean million.

The first 32 unions have $220,000,000 in their international treasuries.

Are you familiar with the wealth of some of the largest corporations?

Mr. MOSHER. I have a reasonable acquaintance with those figures.

Mr. JACOBS. The first 50?

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, I have some reasonable idea of what it is.

Mr. JACOBS. What would be your notion?

Mr. MOSHER. Well, it is a fairly large percentage of the total wealth, a matter of——

Mr. JACOBS. Sir?

Mr. MOSHER. Let me get the figures.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, I have them here, if you do not know what they are. They run from $9,500,000,000 down to——

Mr. MOSHER. Of course, the figures are not comparable. There is no degree of comparison.

Mr. JACOBS. No. I think you are right. I agree with you.

Mr. MOSHER. Now, you are assuming that I am saying that they are not comparable because of the vast differences in the figures. That is not what I meant, sir. I say that you cannot take your total assets of all these corporations, bearing in mind what those assets are in, what those assets consist of, and compare that as relative strength. I venture——

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, you will agree with me that money talks, will you not?

Mr. MOSHER. Colloquially, yes, money talks.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Now, what is $9,500,000,000, we will say, as compared with $220,000,000?

Mr. MOSHER. Suppose we take the amount of cash that might be available for the same purposes for which the $220,000,000 is available, and see what the comparison is. We would get quite a different picture.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. I think that would be fair. Suppose, on the other hand, we take the number of members in the union and divide them into the amount of money we have, and get some comparison that way. It really becomes a rather small amount of money, does it not, when you divide it among them?

Mr. MOSHER. As to what the unions have?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. MOSHER. No, I do not think so. I think it is a very large amount of money for the purposes to which it can be devoted. I think we can compare the number of union members, employees in these organizations, with the number of stockholders you have. That is one good comparison you can make, as to the relative number of people concerned. You can take the amount of money that might be in these corporations available for purposes extraneous to the ordinary operations of the corporations and compare it with the cash.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, let us see about the stockholders. Do you know how many stockholders there are in this country?

Mr. MOSHER. No, I do not remember. I cannot remember those figures.

Mr. JACOBS. I think you will find the figure is 14,000,000.

Mr. MOSHER. All right.

Mr. JACOBS. And do you know how many own over half of the stock?

Mr. MOSHER. The bulk of that 14,000,000—it was 14,000,000, you said?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes, 14,000,000.

Mr. MOSHER. All right. I will take your 14,000,000. They own the bulk of the corporations.

Mr. JACOBS. They own all of it if they own the stock.

Mr. MOSHER. Well——

Mr. JACOBS. How many people does it take in your larger stockholders to own over half of the value of the stock? Do you know?

Mr. MOSHER. No.

Mr. JACOBS. I think you will find it is about 60,000.

Mr. MOSHER. Well, I think you have to question that figure considerably.

Mr. JACOBS. If you find that it is different, will you write me and let me know?

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Burke? By the way, Mr. Burke, you yielded your time to Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. BURKE. Five minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. All right. You have 5 minutes.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Mosher, in your verbal statement—I did not check your written statement as you went along—you made the statement that true collective bargaining was impossible under the Wagner Act.

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. In the light of the many thousands of agreements made between unions and employers during the years the Wagner Act was in effect, it would seem to me rather an extreme statement, would it not?

Mr. MOSHER. No, I do not think it is extreme. I think the record will show very clearly that there was such a tremendous number of cases, the way the agreements were forced on the employer, that he had no recourse except to accept.

Mr. BURKE. I know of a case where probably one of the largest local unions in the country, if not in the world, bargaining with some 70 to 80 employers over a period of 2 years, in those years negotiated probably some 150 agreements without a work stoppage.

Mr. MOSHER. I would assume that is probably true. I will not question your figures.

Mr. BURKE. There again, the employers must have been quite well satisfied.

Mr. MOSHER. There are various situations where the record stands high. There is no question about that.

Mr. BURKE. Then true collective bargaining could not have been impossible.

Mr. MOSHER. Well, going back to before the days of the Wagner Act, we had plenty of collective bargaining back in those days that was successful in a good many ways. The fact still remains, and I think the record will prove it, that under the administration of the Wagner Act, in countless numbers of cases there was no real collective bargaining.

Mr. BURKE. Might it not be, then, that the Wagner Act gave opportunity to many new millions of people to sit down across the bargaining table from their employer, people that did not have the opportunity before?

Mr. MOSHER. As under the Wagner Act, unionization was encouraged, surely there were a great many individuals who came in under collective bargaining contracts who had not been under collective bargaining contracts before. I agree to that. There is not any question about it.

Mr. BURKE. Then we cannot say that true collective bargaining was impossible, absolutely impossible, during those times.

Mr. MOSHER. I rest on the statement that under the Wagner Act as it went through the year and as it was administered, collective bargaining in countless numbers of cases became not only difficult, but quite impossible.

Mr. BURKE. The present House Committee on Education and Labor in the United States Congress has recently had before it two bills affecting what is known as the Fair Labor Standards Act. One of those bills is known as H. R. 858. Several employers and representatives of employers came before that committee and testified that they had a history of 25 years of successful collective bargaining, including the years of the Wagner Act, and they were quite satisfied, and they felt, along with the unions involved, that they had to have some relief in regard to this overtime-on-overtime situation of the Supreme Court in the Bay Ridge decision. They testified to this committee that they were quite satisfied with their collective-bargaining agreements.

Mr. MOSHER. I certainly do not want to render the impression that I do not know of a great many cases where we have had collective bargaining, and very successfully, with certain unions. And the record is very, very good. I still rest on my original statement, which was that under the Wagner Act, collective bargaining was becoming impossible, and it became impossible in countless numbers of cases.

Mr. BURKE. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Sims?

Mr. SIMS. No questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. Yes.

In the concluding pages of your statement, you made the statement that your interest, or the interest of your association, was one concerned with the public interest.

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. This public interest is the great mass of American people; that is correct, is it not?

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. That is, that you are concerned with.

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Did we not have a little test on that, about November 2?

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. In one State in particular, it was a real test. I know that you are going to say that a number of advocates of the Taft-Hartley Act returned. That I subscribe to. But there was one State in which the Taft-Hartley Act was the prime issue, and in one election it was the sole issue, and that was in the State of Minnesota, where you had a fair-haired boy. And the campaign, as I remember, for 2 months was devoted entirely to ex-Senator Ball and the Taft-Hartley Act. And the public, or the people of Minnesota, disagreed on the basis of the Taft-Hartley Act. Do you agree to that?

Mr. MOSHER. I do not know your situation in Minnesota.

Mr. WIER. You know that Senator Ball is not back?

Mr. MOSHER. Who was Senator Ball's opponent?

Mr. WIER. Who was what?

Mr. MOSHER. Who was Senator Ball's opponent? I do not even know that.

Mr. WIER. You do not know that?

Mr. MOSHER. No.

Mr. WIER. Well, you have been over in the Senate committee, have you not?

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. You met Senator Humphrey over there, and saw him?

Mr. MOSHER. Yes. He sat behind the bench.

Mr. WIER. Yes. That is the present Senator, in answer to your question.

I raise that question because you have laid a lot of stress upon freeing American workers and defending this act on the basis that it was in the public interest. Are you still satisfied that all of the legislation in the Taft-Hartley Act ought to be continued?

Mr. MOSHER. No. I have not said that. I said quite the opposite.

Mr. WIER. I am asking you a question.

Mr MOSHER To the extent that the Taft-Hartley Act does not cover certain situations, I think the Taft-Hartley Act should be changed.

Mr. WIER. It should be changed?

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Are there any sections of it that you would take out?

Mr. MOSHER. I am not talking about the act. I am talking about certain labor principles.

Mr. WIER. Well, you have been upholding the act here all night on certain principles.

Mr. MOSHER. I pointed out in considerable detail the extent to which the Taft-Hartley Act covers those general labor principles.

Mr. WIER. Again, I call your attention to the fact that your organization was one of the decriers for freeing the American workers from the labor czars. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. MOSHER. That would be a construction of the situation.

Mr. WIER. That is a construction. It is a good construction. And in spite of that, the act carried the right of the workers to free themselves. It carried a section which gave the workers a right to free themselves from union domination.

Mr. MOSHER. Yes.

Mr. WIER. Are you familiar with the results of your experiment in the desire of the workers to free themselves under union-shop elections?

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. The result has been rather disappointing, has it not?

Mr. MOSHER. No, I do not think so.

Mr. WIER. Well, it did not attain its goal, I will ask you?

Mr. MOSHER. I know now from the way you are asking the question that the goal was to get them out from under the unions. That was at no time the goal.

Mr. WIER. It is the same thing.

Mr. MOSHER. No, sir.

Mr. WIER. In other words, by the experience of the National Labor Relations Board in holding these very disadvantageous elections, it has been demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt even to your group and to the people of these United States that the workers still maintained that they want their unions to represent them, and they want union shops; is that not correct?

Mr. MOSHER. I think that is all covered in your Taft-Hartley Act, as a matter of fact, and reasonably adequately covered, except to the extent that we do not believe in the closed shop as such.

Mr. WIER. I am not talking about the closed shop. There is not at present any closed shop.

Mr. MOSHER. You are asking me——

Mr. WIER. About the union shop.

Mr. MOSHER. You are asking me to try to indicate that we were opposing unionization, and that is no part of our program and has not been at any stage in the game. We are firmly on record, and have been——

Mr. WIER. Why was it inserted in the act?

Mr. MOSHER. To give the employees, if they did not want to be run by the union, the chance to get out from under the union.

Mr. WIER. Are you satisfied——

Mr. MOSHER. Now, that is not attacking unions as a whole.

Mr. WIER. That probably gives lip service to the answer. Are you satisfied?

Mr. MOSHER. It is no more lip service than the words that you are trying to put into my mouth.

Mr. WIER. Are you satisfied with the results of the workers' decisions that you led up to?

Mr. MOSHER. I am satisfied to go by what the majority of the workers want. If they want——

Mr. WIER. Then it should be removed, should it not?

Mr. MOSHER. No, sir.

Mr. WIER. You were upholding the contention that that is what the workers wanted.

Mr. MOSHER. The Taft-Hartley Act provides an escape if the union member wants to have it. If he does not want to have it, that is quite O. K.

Mr. WIER. And they gave you the answer, did they not?

Mr. MOSHER. They what?

Mr. WIER. They gave you the answer. They wanted it.

Mr. MOSHER. I do not follow you at all, sir.

Mr. WIER. I say, the workers gave you the answer by this long process of elections that they want the unions; they want the union shop.

Mr. MOSHER. Of course, there are various other facets to this same picture. You are asking me to say that the union people gave me the answer that "We want it."

Now, what do you mean by the answer, "We want it"? Apparently the answer that you think we want is not the answer that we wanted at all.

Mr. WIER. You were trying to paint a picture of the fact that the workers were under union domination and that they were seeking freedom; they were seeking to be relieved of unions; is that correct?

Mr. MOSHER. Not generally speaking; no, sir.

Mr. WIER. Not generally speaking?

Mr. MOSHER. No, sir.

Mr. WIER. Let us go on to free speech, then. That is another one that you defended tonight.

Mr. MOSHER. All right.

Mr. WIER. Free speech. What do you term "free speech" in the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. MOSHER. The right of the employer to speak, to tell his side of the story, and not to be guilty of an unfair labor practice by telling the truth.

Mr. WIER. What does the Taft-Hartley Act say in regard to an employer's right under free speech?

Mr. MOSHER. Instead of my guessing at what it said, let us look at the act. I am reading from section 8, clause (c):

The expressing of any views, argument, or opinion, or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic, or visual form, shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice under any of the provisions of this act, if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

Mr. WIER. Are you familiar with what has occurred under that provision of the act?

Mr. MOSHER. I think I have a reasonable knowledge of what has occurred, yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Are you familiar with the fact that the Labor Board has denied most of the cases of unfair labor practices brought to its attention by the unions?

Mr. MOSHER. I think that follows, yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Because as of today, from practical knowledge, employers have gone much further than the right of free speech. The law is at this time allowing them to use punitive actions.

Mr. MOSHER. I don't think the record shows that, sir.

Mr. WIER. I have had a couple of cases before the Labor Board in which——

Mr. MOSHER. I won't say there haven't been cases. It is a big country, and you have a good many situations running into a hundred thousand or more.

Mr. WIER. A couple may be multiplied by many because I made the inquiry.

Mr. MOSHER. What are the cases to which you refer?

Mr. WIER. Penalties.

Mr. MOSHER. Penalities of what kind?

Mr. WIER. I will refer to one that happened recently, which brought about a strike primarily on the basis of the law, and that was in the case in which an employer, in addition to using his right of free speech, took from the workers employment that they had been enjoying, gave the overtime work to those that he felt were loyal, took away from the workers that were interested in the organization of a union their overtime that they were working continuously.

The union preferred a charge against them, the Labor Board said they couldn't carry through and process it because it wasn't specific enough.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time is about up.

Mr. WIER. I am not even started yet.

Mr. MOSHER. What has that got to do with free speech?

Mr. WIER. I am trying to point out that the language in that section under the Taft-Hartley Act does not protect the worker against punitive actions.

Mr. MOSHER. What has that got to do with free speech?

Mr. WIER. That is what I want to know.

Mr. MOSHER. You are asking me, and I am saying I don't know what it has to do with free speech.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Mosher, I have a few questions I would like to ask, but before getting into them, I couldn't help but observe certain things, and I would also like to ask your opinion about them.

As I have listened to the complex and diverse discussion here regarding the Taft-Hartley Act, and I listened to some of the legal lights during the last few days discussing the pros and cons of whether we repeal the Taft-Hartley law or whether we do not repeal it; and when I listen to the excellent plan of my good friend, Mr. Kelley, that we ought to have a commission to study this whole matter and go over it thoroughly in a calm and judicial way, I can't help but wonder why this great haste to repeal the Taft-Hartley law and then reenact another law about which we know very little.

When I think of the procedure in the Senate where you couldn't even amend that particular law, H. R. 2032, I am still at a greater loss to understand what this great haste is all about unless it might be due to the political campaign promises of certain individuals.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCCONNELL. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. KELLEY. I think the commission should have been set up before the Taft-Hartley Act, and you wouldn't have the Taft-Hartley Act as it is.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I would have been glad to consider a commission at that time, but even in going over the hearings, as I have, of the Taft-Hartley law, I discovered we took over 2,000,000 words before there was any attempt to sit down and write a bill.

Here we have a bill handed to us, and we are told to shove it right through before we know very much about it. In fact, we work all day in the House and have about four or five roll calls and then we work until 10 or 11 o'clock at night, and I can't figure what all this rush is about.

Mr. MOSHER. I listened to that today while we were waiting.

Mr. KELLEY. Trying to do the same thing as in 1947.

Mr. MOSHER. Except in 1947, using Congressman McConnell's own words, there were over 2,000,000 words. I will have to plead guilty that many of you kept me here so long that there are quite a few pages of my own words in that rather voluminous testimony.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I would like to ask a few questions that bothered me at times. How long should a person out on strike be considered an employee of a company, in your judgment?

Mr. MOSHER. That offers some real difficulty. I don't know quite how to answer it. I will try to answer it in parts.

If he gets another job, he certainly is no longer an employee. If under certain conditions his job is filled, he is no longer an employee.

If he has quit voluntarily in an economic strike situation, no unfair labor practice being involved, I think he has willingly and of his own volition, subject to the union situation, whatever it may be, he is no longer an employee.

As you undoubtedly know, we have had many, many cases under the Wagner Act where employees went on strike for one reason or another, no unfair labor practice being involved in the one I think of, and in many others—those employees continued to meet, in one case they met every week and continued to call a strike when I am told 90 percent of them were working elsewhere and didn't intend to work there again. They intended to close that employer up.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Should bargaining procedure be spelled out?

Mr. MOSHER. No; I do not think so. I think that all we should try to do is provide a framework of equality before the law where the two parties can meet on an equal basis with equal rights, and we have to leave it to labor-management.

The less we try to cover by law all these details, the better off we will be. The sooner we can get labor-management bargaining back to where the work is—and that means back to the plants where the employees know their employer and where the employer knows his employees—the better off we will be. That covers a lot of territory. That covers your Nation-wide bargaining, and many other issues come into that, but that is a fundamental thing we have to strive for: To get this bargaining back just as close to where the work center is as we can get it. We certainly need to get it out of Washington.

Mr. McConnell. Fundamentally I have the feeling when you spell out bargaining procedure, that you are then requiring a sort of straitjacket type of procedure or bargaining, which breaks it down and takes away a lot of the freedom.

Mr. Mosher. I think that is absolutely true.

Mr. McConnell. Now, on national emergency strikes, you realize that was the result of a compromise, and I have never felt for certain we had solved the problem. We have searched and searched and searched in order to find a good procedure.

I am not entirely sure of what the final answer is. We tried to avoid extremes, as you can see, anything like compulsory arbitration at the end of it or the idea of complete freedom to just go ahead and strike, we tried to strike a balance between them.

Are there parts of the present procedure as outlined for national emergency strikes in the Taft-Hartley law that could be changed to advantage, in your judgment?

Mr. Mosher. I think so.

Mr. McConnell. What parts would they be within that national emergency procedure?

Mr. Mosher. The authority to continue the injunction should be extended. As you indicate, there is no tougher subject than this particular one. By and large, we didn't face it until fairly recent years, and you will remember that we went through the compulsory-arbitration stage.

The public, as I indicated before, was demanding it, and I think the national survey showed that a very large proportion of the public believed in compulsory arbitration. I have to say I don't think they understood the implication of it.

You remember about that time it was proposed that we draft people into the Army. I am happy to say I opposed that measure and it never came into being.

I don't pretend to know the answer to this national picture. I don't want to see compulsory arbitration. I don't want to see people told they have to work. I don't want anybody to tell me I have to work there for that much money and that is all. I want the right to work where I choose.

But this national economy of ours is so complex and certain individuals, at least, or certain groups of individuals, undertake at times to tell this whole country what it has got to do, and they have gotten themselves into positions where they can pretty well control this country, rather, be a controlling factor in the economy—they can't control the whole economy, but they can be a controlling factor.

Some way has to be found to curb that. When you go to such things as fact-finding boards with power of recommendation, you get the same results you get in a little individual case. I don't care whether employer or employee, it makes no difference, the side that thinks it has the advantage in front of that august body up above will not collectively bargain, they will wait and let it go. We have seen it work both ways. I am not putting the blame on the union or on the employers' side of the table, either one. Management will take the same advantage if you leave it to a fact-finding board with power of recommendation.

Under this 80-day clause under the Taft-Hartley Act they will measure the weight and estimate the advantage, and if they think there is an advantage in letting it go through to a settlement on that basis, they will let it go. Otherwise, we have to force them back to the collective-bargaining table.

Mr. McCONNELL. We speak of equalizing bargaining power and then usually quote the size of big corporations. Isn't it a fact that you find many a small manufacturer or businessman who really does not have equal bargaining power with some of these big union set-ups? I have observed that in my own community.

Mr. MOSHER. We have this situation and very definitely so. You have to bear in mind the big bulk of the companies in this country, 3,300,000 business enterprises in this country, something like that. There are only a few of them in this big class which is quoted from time to time. Of course, the bulk of our businesses are small companies.

Eighty-odd percent of the membership of NAM has less than 500 employees. Seventy-odd percent, I think it is, have less than 250.

Now, the trouble with all of the situations is that the big fellow somehow or other gets by. He seems to get by. He may make the public pay a high price for it, and he happens to be in a position to do it. When I say "big fellow," I am talking about big employer and big union.

It is the little fellow who makes up the bulk of our whole business. I represent several very small companies, and I am keenly aware of those situations.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Mosher, a lot of your testimony tonight dwelt upon the idea of the public interest in all those matters.

Mr. MOSHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. Now, isn't it true—and this is a generalization and they are generally faulty—but haven't we got ourselves in this country to the point where we are likely to disregard facts? Facts don't mean much to us in this country about anything.

Mr. MOSHER. We go by opinions, which have little to back them up on too many occasions.

Mr. SMITH. And we have adopted the smear technique as seeming to be the most successful way to get things over.

Mr. MOSHER. All I can say is I have had the displeasure of being in that position not very long ago.

Mr. SMITH. When we call the Taft-Hartley Act a slave-labor act, that is the old technique of smear.

Now, isn't it true that we have devoted too much of our time in this country to talking about 15,000,000 workers and disregarding the rights and benefits of 60,000,000 workers?

Mr. MOSHER. I believe I was quoted today, something like 63½ million people, some 60½ or 61 million being at work. It is true—it is my opinion—that we spend altogether too much time trying to protect certain interests, special interests, if you will use the slang phrase, and no trying to protect the whole picture.

It is why I put my emphasis on certain broad labor principles, and I do not hold any briefs for any particular law. I stand on those principles as I think they are for the interest of everyone concerned and not for any special interests.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to direct this question to Mr. Smethurst. Have you made any study of the matter of strikes affecting the broad general public interest like the coal strike, railroad, or telephone strike?

Mr. SMETHURST. I wonder if you mean as to the extent of the man-days lost or the economic loss flowing from those.

Mr. SMITH. I have this in mind: Do you think that the present law we are considering here is adequate to protect the public in those kinds of strikes?

Mr. SMETHURST. No, sir; for 80 days, and that is all.

Mr. SMITH. Do you think that this provision, this inherent right of the President to settle these things, do you subscribe to the doctrine that he has that power?

Mr. SMETHURST. I think if he ever had the power, the Congress repealed it by enacting the Norris-LaGuardia Act in 1932. In other words, in that law the Congress put limitations on the power of the courts to issue injunctions, whether they are requested by the Presiden or by any private party.

Mr. SMITH. That law was repealed.

Mr. SMETHURST. The Norris-LaGuardia Act is still the law of the land.

Mr. SMITH. They can use that?

Mr. SMETHURST. That is a limitation on the power of the court so that the President, in my opinion——

Mr. SMITH. Do you think that President Truman has any more or less power than President Roosevelt had?

Mr. SMETHURST. In this specific connection I would say "No."

Mr. SMITH. In other words, President Roosevelt had the same power that President Truman has?

Mr. SMETHURST. Right.

Mr. SMITH. And you know of nothing that has changed that?

Mr. SMETHURST. No, sir.

Mr. SMITH. And I will ask you whether or not you would take judicial knowledge of the fact that President Roosevelt was very prone and tried to help the cause of labor.

Mr. SMETHURST. I would agree with that.

Mr. SMITH. Now, this is a personal statement. I was in the Army, stationed at Little Rock, Ark., in the fall of 1941, and there was a coal strike on.

There was a division of men down there, 20,000. That division was told to get ready and, as a battalion commander, I was told as to the exact point in West Virginia that I was going to take my troops and that I would have certain jobs to protect certain mines; that division was going to be taken out of the camp at Little Rock, Ark., and sent there to open up those mines.

Now, if President Roosevelt didn't have the power and was going to take that method, I fail to see where the President has got sufficient power to stop a strike or control a strike that affects the general public interest.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you, Mr. Mosher and Mr. Smethurst. Thank you for coming tonight.

Mr. MOSHER. Thank you, sir. And in view of the fact that I only summarized my statement, I ask that the complete statement, exclusive of the opening, introductory remarks, be inserted in the record.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, that will be done.

(The remainder of Mr. Mosher's prepared statement is as follows:)

WAGNER ACT UNFAIR, ONE-SIDED, AND INADEQUATE

Good faith bargaining not required of unions.—The Wagner Act provided procedures for the selection and designation of employee representatives and made it an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse to bargain collectively in good faith with the representative chosen by his employees. As an outstanding example of its one-sidedness no comparable responsibility of good-faith dealing was imposed upon employee representatives.

Thus, for example, the Board held that the employer must bargain even though the thing demanded of him is something which he cannot do. Mere rejection of the demand was not enough. He must explain his reasons for rejection, and usually must offer counterproposals on the points in dispute. He must bargain even during the existence of a strike, whether or not the strike is called to exert bargaining pressure and even though the union previously has broken its contract.

Since there was no comparable requirement of good-faith bargaining, a union was under no obligation to explain its demands, or to modify them. Nor did NLRB impose any administrative requirements of good faith. Some demands were presented on a take-it-or-leave-it basis, and, upon the employer's refusal or inability to accede, he was often charged with a refusal to bargain. There was nothing in the Wagner Act which discouraged a union from being arbitrary in its actions or extravagant in its demands.

A union was under no obligation to make counterproposals and thus retreat from its original demands, but could strike with impunity if they were not met. This was demonstrated in December 1945 and January 1946, when the CIO steelworkers presented wage demands to over 100 steel-fabricating companies. In most instances, no negotiations or conferences were permitted by the union. Similar employer tactics, would have violated the Wagner Act.

On February 18, 1947, during hearings on proposed amendments to the Wagner Act, the National Labor Relations Board somewhat belatedly announced a concept which somewhat changed the position of unions in the bargaining process. In the Times Publishing Company case, the Board stated "The test of good faith in bargaining that the act requires of an employer is not a rigid but a fluctuating one, and is dependent in part upon how a reasonable man might be expected to react to the bargaining attitude displayed by those across the table." To what extent this view would have become a reality without the Taft-Hartley Act is open to question. It is, however, an admission of an existing inequality which could only be remedied permanently by appropriate legislation.

True collective bargaining cannot exist where only one party must act in good faith. The purpose of the act was to equalize bargaining power—to enable the individual employee to meet his employer on a level of equal economic strength. The result, instead, was to permit the pendulum of economic power to swing far on the side of labor organizations.

To me it is only simple justice and almost axiomatic that any national labor policy should include the principle that "Unions as well as employers should be obligated, by law, to bargain collectively in good faith, provided that a majority of the employees in an appropriate unit wish to be represented by a union."

If there is to be a legal obligation on the part of employers to bargain collectively in good faith, this obligation should apply equally to organized labor. Any national labor policy which imposes the obligation to bargain on only one of the parties is violating the basic principle of equity and jeopardizing the whole process of collective bargaining as a basis for adjustment of industrial disputes by peaceful means.

Labor leaders do not quarrel with the principle here involved. Their quarrel is with the method Congress adopted to try and make this equality a reality. They have offered no substitute, however, except a return to the Wagner Act which imposed upon them no obligation whatever.

Labor does not deny that good faith bargaining by both sides is a necessary first step toward harmonious industrial relations. Yet they are unwilling to be bound by the same statutory requirements they would require of employers. Despite a long record of industrial disputes—some national in scope—caused solely by union demands presented on a take-it-or-leave-it basis they would have you eliminate even this modest requirement.

Bargaining agreements unenforceable against unions.—Under the Wagner Act the terms agreed upon during bargaining negotiations must be reduced to a written contract if requested by the union. Since the law required contracts it would be assumed that they would be legally enforceable. Contracts have always been enforceable against employers but our one-sided labor laws failed to recognize that contract responsibility must work both ways if stability of industrial relations was to be achieved.

Neither the Wagner Act nor any other Federal statute made unions legally responsible for their contract obligations.

In the absence of a statute, unincorporated labor organizations were, in this particular, largely governed by State laws. State laws too frequently provided so many obstacles to effective action that unions enjoyed practical immunity from legal responsibility under collective agreements.

In addition to these practical difficulties, however, the NLBR further discouraged contract responsibility by ruling that employers could not insist upon a union posting a performance bond, even though such employer was willing to post a similar bond.

The seriousness of this inequitable siituation was recognized by President Truman in opening the Labor-Management Conference in November 1945.

In the following language he made it clear that collective agreements should be mutually binding on both parties to the contract:

"We shall have to find methods not only of peaceful negotiation of labor contracts, but also of insuring industrial peace for the lifetime of such contracts. Contracts once made must be lived up to and should be changed only in the manner agreed upon by the parties. If we expect confidence in agreements made, there must be responsibility and integrity on both sides in carrying them out."

The inevitable result was to encourage unions to disregard collective agreements whenever expediency would thus be served. Consequently, no stability of relationship was assured and one of the purposes of the Wagner Act was defeated.

Any objective, rational consideration of sound labor legislation must include the principle that "Unions as well as employers should be obligated by law to adhere to the terms of collective-bargaining agreements" and that "collective-bargaining agreements should provide that disputes arising over the meaning and interpretation of a provision should be settled by peaceful procedures."

Once parties have reached agreement, there is no reason why they should not resolve any dispute concerning the meaning of that agreement by submitting it to a competent arbitrator. In this case the arbitrator does not determine for the parties what their employment relations shall be. He simply interprets the agreement which they have both signed. It is becoming more and more common for the parties to include in their collective-bargaining agreement a provision that disputes as to interpretation shall be submitted to impartial arbitration. These and other methods of peaceful solution of interpretation disputes should be encouraged.

I must point out, however, that an arbitration award is of little value unless the union is legally obligated to live up to that award. In fact, it can be confidently predicted that the use of voluntary arbitration rather than strikes will be greatly expanded if unions are made responsible for living up to their agreements.

Charges have been made that liability of unions for violation of collective-bargaining contracts would open the way to court action and lawsuits on the part of employers to crush unions. This accusation is in no way supported by experience under the present law. There is no evidence in the record that this provision has been used by employers as an antiunion device. During the time this principle has been a part of national labor policy, there is record of only 37 suits having been lodged against unions and only 19 cases where suits have been processed against employers. In no instance, so far, has judgment for damages been rendered against either party. In most cases the suits have been dismissed after a settlement by mutual agreement or the conclusion of a strike. The very fact that this remedy is available has been a stimulus to and an encouragement of a deepened sense of responsibility on the part of both unions and employers. It has steadied and supported the efforts of union leaders seeking to achieve higher standards of accountability and responsibility in their own unions. This principle of equal responsibility for observance of collective-bargaining contracts is essential to the success of any national labor policy.

The chief argument against the Taft-Hartley provision making unions responsible for contract commitments was that it was unnecessary since they were already responsible under State laws wherever they operated. Strangely enough, one of the first developments after the Taft-Hartley law became effective was for unions to demand contract clauses designed to nullify this statutory provision. The inconsistency here is obvious. Yet with no justification whatever union spokesmen are demanding that you reestablish their freedom from contract responsibility as it existed under the Wagner Act. I urge the Congress to consider this demand carefully in the light of the record. There can be no doubt as to the answer if equality under law is to be genuinely accepted.

Employers denied freedom of speech.—Outstanding among the inequalities brought about by overzealous administration of the Wagner Act was the denial of free speech to employers in communicating with employees. The Supreme Court in 1941, after 6 years of the Wagner Act, stated the basic principle that the right of free speech extended even to an employer, and that he could express his views on labor problems or policy, provided only that he did not threaten or coerce his employees. Despite this mandate, however, NLRB denied employers such freedom of expression.

It would hardly seem debatable that "Employees and employers, should both be protected in their right to express their respective positions."

This right was not protected under the Wagner Act and Board decisions, in fact, unfairly circumscribed the right so far as employers were concerned.

With the exception of spokesmen for the CIO, I believe even most labor union leaders are willing that employers should have their right of free speech protected to the same extent that right is protected for other citizens.

The administration's proposal now before this committee, however, without justification or rationalization of any sort, seeks a return to that era in industrial relations when unions, their officers, and agents were the only ones permitted full exercise of their first amendment right of free speech.

No protection against unlawful strikes.—The right to strike, under the Wagner Act, included not only the right to quit work as a group, but also the right to return to work if and when desired. Strikers retained their status as employees and were entitled to reinstatement unless as economic strikers their places had been filled.

Specific types of strikes held by NLRB to be within the protection of the act included strikes engaged in before the legal processes of the Board had been invoked; strikes carried on in violation of a State injunction; strikes declared to be illegal under State law; sympathetic strikes; and jurisdictional strikes by a minority union to compel the employer to violate the Wagner Act. Nor did NLRB voluntarily consider a strike in violation of contract a ground for discharge until February 21, 1946, although the Supreme Court on February 27, 1939, 7 years earlier, ruled that "the act does not prohibit an effective discharge for repudiation by the employee of his agreement, any more than it prohibits such discharge for a tort committed against the employer." The Board, thus for 7 years chose to ignore the clear mandate of the Nation's highest court.

In contradistinction to the employees' unhampered right to strike was the complete ban imposed by the Wagner Act on employer lock-outs.

It is apparent, therefore, that the Federal Government's past efforts to equalize bargaining power created such strength on the side of labor unions as to render true collective bargaining impossible. The union was free to order employees to strike if it could not gain its demands through legitimate collective bargaining. On the other hand, the employer was denied any remedy against strikes and must continue to bargain. There was no economic coercion on strikers since in most instances they would be reinstated with back pay.

The Norris-LaGuardia Act and the Wagner Act in combination were in effect charters of freedom for the indulgence of union pressure in the form of strikes. The one-sided, inadequate character of our labor laws is nowhere better illustrated than in their lack of protection against unwarranted strikes.

In the light of experience, I suggest the following principle as being a sound, fair, and reasonable guide to any legislation designed to regulate strikes in the public interest.

ployer is powerless to grant. Such issues and demands are involved in jurisdictional strikes, sympathy strikes, strikes against the Government, strikes to force employers to ignore or violate the law, strikes to force recognition of an uncertified union, strikes to enforce featherbedding or other work restrictive demands, or secondary boycotts."

The right to strike is a perfectly normal and legitimate function of the collective-bargaining process but as a matter of principle it should be exercised subject to the overriding and paramount interests of the public. This means that in the interests of the public, certain well-recognized and defined abuses of this right should be forbidden as a matter of sound national labor policy. The protection of law should not be extended to strikes called to compel an employer to grant demands which in themselves are in violation of law. There is no justification for the use of the strike to enforce jurisdictional demands, to enforce secondary boycotts, to carry on sympathy strikes, to engage in political conflict with the Government.

Nor is there any justification in national labor policy for sanctioning the use of strikes in organizational drives or to force union recognition. Government agencies are provided for peaceful settlement of such disputes. Neither industry nor the public should bear the losses resulting from such industrial disputes.

During the past year, strikes to compel employers to make concessions which constitute unfair labor practices or which subject the employer to criminal liabilities have been on the increase. A sound national labor policy must deal frankly and firmly with abuses of this character.

One of the most conspicuous abuses of power on the part of organized labor is use of the secondary boycott. The utilization of secondary boycotts, together with closed shop and industry-wide agreements in basic industries, permitted the exercise of vast monopolistic power by unions.

The Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations report briefly describes 29 cases involving various illegal forms of the secondary boycott by unions.

Nineteen, or 65 percent, of these were cases where unions engaged in secondary boycotts to prevent one employer from doing business with others and although this type of boycott represented the majority, the underlying purposes of the unions were directed to a variety of objectives.

These objectives included—

(1) Boycotts to force an employer to recognize an uncertified union.

(2) Boycotts to compel employers to give work to members of a particular union.

(3) Boycotts to compel employers to recognize closed-shop union as bargaining agent for employees prior to their employment.

(4) Boycott to compel employers to employ members of a particular union.

(5) Boycotts in dispute over terms of employment.

(6) Boycotts to compel employers to pay for work not performed.

With one exception, the administration bill would open the door for unions promptly to return to the unrestrained use of secondary boycotts. This exception would prohibit unions from engaging in secondary boycotts only where the purpose would be to compel an employer to deal with a particular union if another is certified or recognized or where the purpose would be to compel an employer to assign work contrary to Board award.

Orderly collective bargaining with properly certified unions was immeasurably advanced by the Labor-Management Relations Act which outlawed this device when used by unions for the purposes set forth above.

The effectiveness of this change in bringing about better collective bargaining is shown by the report of the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations of the Congress which states, in part—

"The mere filing of a charge and the beginning of an investigation is serving to stop the secondary boycotts."

Thus, it is evident that the process of collective bargaining which is the cornerstone of our national labor policy has been largely freed from obstructions in the form of secondary boycotts.

No protection against mass picketing, boycotts, force, or violence.—Another shortcoming of the Wagner Act constituting an obstacle to good-faith collective bargaining was the lack of any legal restrictions against picketing. Unions were free under Federal law to picket at any time and under any circumstances, even where no dispute existed between an employer and his employees.

Mass picketing became commonplace. Company officials were barred from their property. Homes were picketed. Local law enforcement had for all practical purposes broken down when confronted with the massed might of organized labor. This condition was aggravated by the existence of State anti-injunction statutes, patterned after the Federal Norris-LaGuardia Act.

Ordinarily, picketing is a vital part of a jurisdictional dispute in which the employer is completely helpless. The picket line normally is also an essential ingredient of the secondary boycott, including the "hot cargo." These weapons in combination are sufficient to force employers either to meet union demands or go out of business. No remedy was available either to the public, the employer, or injured third parties. With such power at its command there was little incentive for unions to negotiate sincerely for the purpose of reaching an agreement. The result, of course, was dictation of terms by one party to the negotiations.

What possible objection can there be to legislation which fairly embodies the principle that "No individual should be deprived of his right to work at an available job, nor should anybody be permitted to harm or injure the employee, or his family, or his property, at home, at work or elsewhere. Mass picketing and any other form of coercion or intimidation should be prohibited."

Adequate protection of the individual worker should be a major obligation of the Congress in the formulation of the Nation's labor policy. The basic freedoms of the individual as a citizen are empty benefits without assurance of the right to work and access to a job. Without adequate protection by public policy, individual rights are at the mercy of the unscrupulous union. The record of industrial disputes during recent years reveals an increased dependence on mass and coercive picketing and the use of violence both with respect to the person and property of employees and of the company.

These basic rights of individuals can be assured only through prohibitions of compulsory union membership and all forms of coercion and intimidation as unfair labor practices backed up by effective penalties.

Labor spokesmen make no defense of unlawful tactics such as violent and mass picketing, threats of force, coercion and other intimadation against employees or a company. Yet under the Wagner Act they were a frequent, almost routine occurrence.

Taft-Hartley Act provisions dealing with such matters are deficient in important particulars. They have, nevertheless, made a contribution toward minimizing such unlawful practices. In the face of the record to date it is unthinkable that the Congress would remove even these modest restraints and return to the intolerable conditions which existed under the Wagner Act.

Management compelled to bargain with its own representatives, such as foremen.—Distortion of the basic objective of the Wagner Act further evidencing its unfair and inadequate character was nowhere more evident than in the Board's interpretation that foremen were employees within the meaning of the act. This, in effect, put the union on both sides of the bargaining table. In no sense can there be equality of bargaining power in such circumstances.

At one time unions generally and NLRB barred foremen from collective-bargaining units, but later the Board changed its mind.

In 1942 it held foremen to be employees under the act. In 1943, the Board reversed itself, denying foremen collective-bargaining rights under the act except in the maritime and printing trades. In 1945, a second reversal sanctioned foremen representation by independent foremen unions. In 1946 NLRB took the final step by holding that foremen may be represented by an affiliate of a rank-and-file union. Thus, in centravention of every principle against conflicting interests, foremen were held able to serve two masters.

Management's first line of contact with its employees is through its foremen and supervisors. To permit foremen to become subject to the pressure which can be exerted by the rank-and-file union is to strip management of its power effectively to select its own representatives.

Experience has demonstrated the soundness of the principle that "Employers should not be required to bargain collectively with foremen or other representatives of management."

In accordance with this principle, no national labor policy should subject an employer to the legal obligation to bargain with representatives of his own management group. A contrary policy is destructive of the fundamental integrity of management and disruptive of the collective-bargaining process itself.

The question of unionization of foremen was one of the most fruitful sources of labor disputes under the Wagner Act. As indicated earlier the Board has gone both ways on the matter at one time holding them not to be protected employees and later that they were within the protection of the act.

The Taft-Hartley Act settled the question by statute and disputes over this issue have all but disappeared. Union spokesmen have made no case nor can they make a case for a return to the uncertainty, confusion, and turmoil of the Wagner Act provisions.

Even Mr. William Green of the AFL testified in 1946 that a line should be drawn between management personnel and rank-and-file union members. His only disagreement was over where that line was drawn. Without arguing the precise location of the line of demarcation, I submit that the principle here is sound and the Congress should be slow to eliminate a provision which has clearly worked in the interest of industrial peace.

Right to work not protected.—One of the fundamental rights recognized under our constitutional system of Government is that an individual has a right to work in his chosen trade or profession. Protection of this right is essential to any adequate labor law. However, the right to work, was limited through union-security provisions encouraged by the Government and protected by the Wagner Act.

That act contained a proviso making closed-shop contracts lawful. Under such contracts, no person may be employed unless he is a union member and unions have the power to exclude from a trade any prospective worker. He has no appeal from such union action. Moreover, after a person is admitted to membership and permitted to start work, his right to continue work depends almost entirely on retaining good standing in the union. Ordinarily, few, if any, checks and balances are provided to protect individuals against an autocratic determination of what constitutes good standing. Thus, the union has absolute and unrestricted control over his right to work.

The basic evil of the closed shop is also present in union shop and maintenance-of-membership types of union security since continued employment is conditiond upon membership in good standing.

Records of your committee hearings contain many illustrations of how employees have been deprived of jobs because of expulsion from a union. In 1942, Mr. Thurman Arnold, then Assistant Attorney General, testified before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee that two men from Chicago had called upon his office for assistance. They had been expelled from a union in Chicago merely because they requested information concerning union management. Each union membership was worth about $5,000 because of the union's old-age-benefit fund. The expelled members fought the expulsion in court but were unsuccessful. Thereafter, they came to Washington and secured other jobs in their trade only to lose them when the Chicago local learned their whereabouts and demanded and secured their discharge.

It must be understood that blacksmithing, such as that illustrated in Mr. Arnold's testimony, deprives individuals of their right to earn a living. The enormity of this power is apparent when it is realized that no court of the United States has authority to enjoin individuals from working at their chosen occupation. Yet in the past we have granted the power to deprive men of their right to work to private organizations some of which do not even accord the accused member an opportunity to defend himself.

The closed shop must be considered in the light of present-day conditions. We now have large international unions possessing such great financial resources and power that they can, and on occasion do, throttle the national economy. While these unions have grown in size and strength, they have compelled employers and the Government to guarantee their continued financial independence and the entrenchment of the union hierarchy through (1) uniform-security clauses, (2) compulsory check-off of union dues and assessments, and (3) taxes on production through royalty payments.

In my judgment, as a matter of principle and sound public policy, "no employee or prospective employee should be required to join or to refrain from joining a union, or to maintain or withdraw his membership in a union, as a condition of employment. Compulsory union membership and interference with voluntary union membership both should be prohibited by law."

As a matter of public policy, individual employees should be free in their decisions as to membership or nonmembership in their unions and with respect to their union activities. There is ample experience to show that this is the only basis on which there can be a democratic and responsible labor movement in this country. In addition, there is overwhelming evidence that the closed shop, together with all other forms of compulsory union membership, is a major device for the coercion and intimidation of individual union members by their own unions.

Union leaders insist that the closed shop is necessary to enable them to maintain discipline among the members and to leave them free to improve worker morale, handle grievances, assist in stepping up production, and all the many other functions normally associated with trade-unionism. Unfortunately the record does not show improved discipline, worker morale, or increased production. Assurance of full compulsory union membership has too frequently led to a break-down of plant discipline and loss to the employer of control of work force and work schedules.

At various times during these hearings the suggestion has been made that possibly the closed shop could be legalized if its more serious abuses could be abolished; that is, provided certain restrictions or regulations could be established, safeguarding the freedoms of the employer to hire and affording the individual worker adequate protection with respect to access to and retention of his job.

I have given this whole matter of whether it is possible to regulate or control the closed shop most careful study. I am convinced that adequate regulations or provisions safeguarding the individual employees and employers against the known abuses of this form of union membership would involve such a degree of regimentation and dictation of the internal affairs of labor organizations as to be wholly impractical and probably entirely unacceptable to organized labor. The whole matter comes down to this—that the closed shop is an assignment of monopoly over work opportunity which is contrary to democratic principles, contrary to the public interest, and, as a matter of public policy, should not be permitted either to the employer or a labor union.

The bill now before this committee would go much farther than the professed desire to reenact the Wagner Act of 1935.

The Wagner Act, in its closed-shop proviso, left to the States their traditional power to legislate with respect to the predominantly local activities of their citizens. The Taft-Hartley Act, in order to avoid any possible doubt expressly stated that this traditional power of the several States was to remain undisturbed by any actual or presumed exercise of the Federal power over commerce.

H. R. 2032, on the other hand, proposes to have Congress say that the citizens of the sovereign States are to be denied their right to decide whether or not they wish to protect themselves against the abuses and discrimination inherent in the closed shop. Instead of leaving the power in the hands of the people of each State, this bill would delegate to each employer the power to decide whether there can or should be a closed-shop agreement.

If this proposal is enacted into law, this Congress will nullify the laws of some 16 (one-third) of the States in the Union. Under the guise of regulating commerce, the sponsors of this measure propose not only to blot out the public policy adopted by the one-third of the citizens who have expressed themselves on this specific issue, but also to disenfranchise the entire populations of each of the 48 States on this question.

The enormity of this proposal is apparent when it is realized that several of the States which have prohibited the closed shop within their boundaries have done so through constitutional amendments ratified by the citizens in a referendum on the precise issue.

Industry-wide bargaining.—The Wagner Act promoted unionism in general and provided a basis for extension of industry-wide bargaining. The Clayton Act and the Norris-LaGuardia Act, at least as interpreted by the Supreme Court, removed labor-union activities from the coverage of the Sherman Act. Thus union activities on an industry-wide basis which formerly would have constituted violations of the Sherman Act are now not only permitted but are protected by law.

It must be recognized that labor unionism is, by its very nature, essentially monopolistic. Like any other monopoly is cannot stand, or stand for, competition.

According to Prof. Charles O. Gregory, formerly Solicitor of the United States Department of Labor:

"Now labor unionism is a frankly monopolistic and anticompetitive institution, even if its major undertakings have been carried on and justified in the name of competition. This has been competition to suppress or combat competition, exactly as it always used to be in big business" (Labor and the Law).

Union activities which restrain trade are congressionally permitted restraints. Congress has granted to private groups the power to impose restraints upon commerce and trade, at the same time denying that power to sovereign States of the Union. No comparable grant of private power exists in our history. Therefore, the question is simply whether Congress shall continue a policy which can and will have a seriously adverse effect upon the public interest. The long-range public interest demands that all trade restraints be outlawed, whether imposed by management or organized labor.

As a matter of principle it seems clear that "monopolistic practices in restraint of trade are inherently contrary to the public interest and should be prohibited to labor unions as well as to employers. It is just as contrary to the public interest for a union or unions representing the workers of two or more employers to take joint wage action or engage in other monopolistic practices as it is for two or more employers to take joint price action or engage in other monopolistic practices."

Collective bargaining functions best when carried on at the plant or company level. The growing trend of industry-wide bargaining on a national scale is primarily responsible for the Nation's most critical national emergencies and the threat of increased Government intervention.

Much has been heard recently about the necessity for legislation to meet national emergencies. We have heard claims of inherent powers residing in the Chief Executive. We have heard arguments for and against injunctions. We have heard proposals for Government seizure of plants and properties. These are but superficial aspects of this whole problem of protection of the public interest in widespread industrial strife. Practically without exception the instances in which the Nation has been confronted with these emergencies have been those involving various degrees of industry-wide bargaining. The basic solution to this problem is not to invest the Government with more autocratic powers over labor and management but to attack the problem at the source by regulating the practice of collective bargaining on a national industry-wide basis.

Such a shortcoming in national labor policy not only jeopardizes the cause of sound collective bargaining but opens the way for Government intervention on an ever-increasing scale in the form of injunction, compulsory arbitration, and even Government seizure of private property.

Much has been said in criticism of the injunction features of the present law as used in emergency cases. It is alleged that the injunction settles nothing and may encourage the suspension of bargaining and allow a new "heating-up" period.

H. R. 2032 seeks to deal with this problem by use of fact-finding panels or boards, a procedure which not only fails to settle anything, but also which, judging from my experience with "ad hoc" boards, is even more destructive of bargaining than provisions of existing law. More important, is this Congress willing to delegate to the unlimited discretion of a temporary board the power to determine the vital economic issues which may be involved in these national emergency cases?

My opinion is that the present law has worked reasonably well. Its weakness may be due largely to the fact that the injunction is for a definite period, thus permitting the parties to gauge the profit and loss involved if agreement is not reached within the 80-day period. Instead of scrapping the injunction, therefore, I would recommend that the courts, upon recommendation of the Government, be authorized to extend the life of the injunction so long as public health and safety may require.

I am not wedded to the injunction, but my suggestion is based on two observations: First, I have seen little, if any, evidence that Congress is willing to deal with the root of the problem, namely, the monopolistic nature of national, industry-wide collective bargaining and, second, no other proposal has been advanced, which based upon experience, can be anywhere near as effective as provisions of existing law.

BIASED, UNFAIR ADMINISTRATION OF WAGNER ACT

Previously, I have specified how the unbalanced, one-sided nature of the Wagner Act fomented discord and strife—not labor peace or genuine collective bargaining. This defect in the law itself was made even more serious by its unjust and biased administration, and this biased administration was due to the absence of safeguards in the law itself, as well as to the crusading, pro-CIO personnel of the Board.

Considering the latter first, a special committee of this House was established in 1939 to make a full and complete investigation of the National Labor Relations Board and its administration of the Wagner Act. After exhaustive hearings in 1939–40 this committee in 1941 submitted a report which documented in detail the conclusions it reached. On the basis of this evidence and testimony, the committee concluded that the NLRB has been "unfair and biased in its conduct, its decisions, and its interpretation of the law." Further, that it had been "grossly partisan in its attitude toward certain labor unions, and most deplorably biased in its relations to employers and employees."

In commenting upon the effect of the act in increasing or decreasing disputes between employers and employees, the committee found that "the solicitation of litigation by the Board, the favoritism displayed by it toward the CIO, and the deliberate use of dilatory methods * * *" had induced and protracted many industrial disputes. It also found the Board remiss in its duty to promote equitable employer-employee relations through, among other things, its "refusal to grant full and fair hearings and the distortion of evidence."

This committee found ample evidence to support the conclusion that the Board had in a number of instances "exceeded its authority by arbitrarily substituting its autocratic judgment for the congressional mandate." Further, that "certain regulations and instructions promulgated by the Board, and many of its decisions, have been without any color of legal authority."

The committee then went on to summarize some of these Board practices, all documented in the hearings and report, which included: (1) blacklisting litigants before it; (2) promoting boycotts against parties whose cases were to be adjudicated; (3) denial to legitimate organizations the opportunity to appear and be defended in litigation which may destroy them; (4) refusing employees the privilege of testifying in their own cases; (5) requiring reinstatement of employees never employed and back pay to persons never on the payroll and even to some who never applied for employment.

In the light of such a record it is small wonder that a great friend of labor, the late Senator David I. Walsh of Massachusetts, with the endorsement and support of the American Federation of Labor was constrained to introduce a bill in 1939 (S. 1000) designed to amend the Wagner Act. In introducing this measure, Senator Walsh explained his purpose in these words:

"* * * These amendments, grouped in an omnibus bill, have one main objective—to guarantee fair and equitable administration of the law by the National Labor Relations Board. They propose:

"(1) To make it obligatory on the Board to respect the right of craft groups to decide for themselves by majority vote who their bargaining representative shall be.

"(2) To curtail the assumed power of the Board to invalidate legal contracts between employers and labor organizations.

"(3) To correct the Board's procedure so that all parties affected by any case will be given due notice, accorded a fair hearing, protected against abuses of discretion and assured of adequate judicial review of wrongful decrees."

Separation of functions.—One of the major factors contributing to loss of respect for the NLRB as an impartial agency of government was the lack of separation of its prosecuting and judicial functions.

The House committee investigating the Board recognized a separation of administrative functions from those of a judicial character as "the very cornerstone of our democracy" and recommended legislation to bring about such a change in the NLRB.

Such a separation of functions had long been advocated for other administrative agencies. For example, President Roosevelt, in transmitting the final report of the Attorney General's committee on administrative procedure in Government agencies to Congress, said:

"* * * The practice of creating independent regulatory commissions, who perform administrative work in addition to judicial work, threatens to develop a 'fourth branch' of the Government for which there is no sanction in the Constitution." (Sen. Doc. No. 8, 77th Cong., 1st sess.)

The plan submitted by the President at that time included the separation of judicial from all other functions performed by any agency, whether an independent board or commission or a bureau within an executive department.

Further commenting on this lack of separation of functions in administrative agencies, the report of the Attorney General's committee noted the conflict of principles involved in their make-up and functions. It was noted that in most instances they were vested with duties of administration and at the same time given important judicial work. The evils resulting from this confusion of principles were said to be insidious and far reaching" for the following reasons:

"* * * Pressures and influences properly enough directed toward officers responsible for formulating and administering policy constitute an unwholesome atmosphere in which to adjudicate private rights. But the mixed duties of the commissions render escape from these subversive influences impossible. Furthermore, the same men are obliged to serve both as prosecutors and as judges. This not only undermines judicial fairness; it weakens public confidence in that fairness. Commission decisions affecting private rights and conduct lie under the suspicion of being rationalization of the preliminary findings which the Commission, in the role of prosecutor, presented to itself."

Certainly if this was true of such agencies as the Federal Power Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, the SEC, and others engaging in what might be considered essentially as licensing functions in the conduct of business operations, it would be even more true in the case of an agency such as the NLRB, regulating as it does the most delicate employer-employee relationships to a large extent fixing a course of conduct for the employer as well as the employees affected by its decisions.

The separation of functions achieved in the Taft-Hartley Act has tended to remove this most obvious feature of the Wagner Act which destroyed confidence in the Board as an impartial agency of the Government. It is likewise in recognition of the long-considered policy, now established by the Administrative Procedure Act, that the investigating, prosecuting, and judicial functions of the administrative agencies should not be under the same direction and control.

A return to the discredited procedures followed under the Wagner Act would serve notice that Congress now approves the discredited practices which were sought to be corrected in the Administrative Procedures Act and the I. M. R. A.

Conciliation Service.—Impartiality is equally important in the work performed by the Federal Mediation Service, which H. R. 2032 would once again place under the control of the Secretary of Labor.

In asking that the Conciliation Service be placed under the Department of Labor, the Secretary of Labor, in his recent testimony before the Senate Education and Labor Committee, relied heavily on the action of the employer delegates to the President's Labor-Management Conference of 1945, agreeing that the Conciliation Service should remain in the Department of Labor. As a cochairman of that conference and as one familiar with the discussions and views of the management group, I would like to make it clear that this agreement was strictly a compromise and in no way represents the opinion of employers, then or now.

Management's proposals as dealing specifically with the independence of the Conciliation Service were recorded as follows in the official minutes of the employer delegates meeting:

"To assure impartiality, the United States Conciliation Service should be an independent agency. As a part of the Department of Labor it does not assure impartiality.

"The purpose of the Labor Department as stated by law is 'to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners.' The Service belongs no more in the Department of Labor than in the Department of Commerce."

Due to the adamant attitude of the labor representatives and in the interest of securing some measure of agreement, management was faced with the necessity of giving way on its initial proposal. I cannot emphasize too strongly that agreement on the matter of the Conciliation Service was a compromise made as a matter of expediency and in no way represented the considered judgment of the management group of the President's Labor-Management Conference.

In the light of experience of employers with the United States Conciliation and Mediation Service since its establishment as an independent agency, there is, I believe, general agreement among employers that it is now operated in a truly independent, impartial manner and has made an altogether new and unprecedented contribution toward industrial peace and labor-management relations.

During this same period, it has likewise become clear that the United States Department of Labor has become an exponent and supporter of organized labor. While this may be a valid objection, it certainly does not qualify it as an agency of the Government to be entrusted with the delicate functions of conciliation and mediation. Should the Conciliation Service be returned to the United States Department of Labor, I do not see how industry could have any confidence in its impartial administration, and if this is done, I fear that its usefulness as an agency for industrial peace will be seriously undermined if not eventually ended.

RECORD OF INDUSTRIAL STRIFE UNDER WAGNER ACT

The foregoing will indicate some of the reasons why the record, under the Wagner Act, was an era of almost unparalleled labor strife and unrest throughout the country. The figures reveal the extent of this industrial unrest.

Between 1916 and 1935 the average annual number of strikes in the United States, in the absence of compulsory collective bargaining of employers, was, by Bureau of Labor Statistics figures, 1,867. Between the years 1936 and 1946, inclusive, the annual average amounted to 2,682, an increase of 97 percent. Nor does the fact that World War II intervened to introduce abnormal conditions, disturb the tread of these statistics. Between 1935 and 1941, inclusive, nonwar years, the average annual number of strikes was 3,015. The annual average during the war years, 1941–45, inclusive, when labor's "no strike" pledge was in effect was 4,106 higher even than during the nonwar years immediately preceding.

The one-sided nature of the Wagner Act was, in my judgment, largely responsible for creating this situation. That law, more than any other factor, promoted the growth of powerful unions free from any comparable responsibility. That law, too, was chiefly responsible for stripping employers of effective methods for restraining excesses of organized labor.

Your committee is already familiar with the steady progress toward industrial peace since passage of the Taft-Hartley law. The number of strikes and work stoppages have decreased materially from the high point reached in 1946. Bureau of Labor Statistics figures show that since enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act jurisdictional strikes and rival union strikes have all but disappeared. Much the same is true of strikes involving closed or union shop issues which have heretofore always been a fruitful source of labor disputes.

Summary and conclusion.—Since the present national labor policy was established, there is ample evidence of its effectiveness in improving relations between employees and employers in individual companies. The most important benefits may be summarized briefly as follows:

(1) Recognition by both labor and management of the responsibility they share under law has increased the mutual respect, mutual confidence and the will of both parties to reach agreements across the bargaining table.

(2) The number and frequency of quickie or outlaw strikes have been materially reduced as outgrowths of legal responsibility for observance of contracts.

(3) Employers, employees and the community have been afforded badly needed protection against violence and coercion involved in mass picketing.

(4) Countless employers, employees and communities have been spared the bitterness and losses of jurisdictional strikes. Testimony has been offered this committee that in the case of the construction industry and the printing trades jurisdictional strikes have practically ceased since the present national labor policy became effective.

(5) Individual companies and their employees, not directly involved in a dispute, have been protected against interruptions of work and loss of income by reason of the ban imposed on secondary boycotts.

(6) Elimination of Communist leadership in many labor unions, made possible by the present law, has greatly improved union-management relations and restored the confidence of employers in union motives and objectives.

(7) Safeguards thrown around the rights and privileges of the individual employee have given the worker an opportunity to express his will in the choice of his bargaining agents without fear of coercion or intimidation by unions or employers.

(8) Presidential intervention in national emergency disputes has saved large segments of the American public from the losses in production and earnings resulting from inability to secure essential raw materials, supplies or services.

(9) Removal of the employers' legal obligation to recognize and bargain with supervisory groups has had a salutary effect upon the unity and effectiveness of the management group and has improved the supervisors' effectiveness in handling relations with employees.

These are specific benefits in terms of improved relations between labor and management in the plants and individual companies of American industry. For the most part, they never could have been realized under the old Wagner Act. Proposals for revision of present national labor policy now under consideration by this committee would seriously endanger, if not largely nullify, these gains.

Let me repeat my plea to consider improving our present national labor policy rather than go backward to a policy of proven failure. Nothing is more vital than labor peace to our national economy right now when we strive for more and more industrial production to meet the domestic and foreign demands on our Nation. The best hope for industrial peace is through preservation of a sound national labor policy.

Mr. KELLEY. The next witness will be Mr. Charles E. Wilson, president of the General Electric Co.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wilson, I notice you have a rather large statement. Do you intend to read it or summarize it?

Mr. WILSON. I would like to read what is not a very long statement, and then if you want to give Mr. Boulware an opportunity to simply summarize his statement or to ask him questions about it, that would be satisfactory. We have tried to divide it up between us.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well.

Mr. WILSON. I began my testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Labor and Public Welfare a few weeks ago with this statement:

> My assumption is that what we all seek here is labor law that serves the public interest—that is fair to employees, to unions, to employers—while adequately protecting innocent bystanders and the whole public.
> Three years ago, when I testified on this same subject before this committee in the Seventy-ninth Congress, I stated my belief that in this country we have passed the era of considering the interest of either management or unions as being preeminent. I urged then that the interest of the whole public should be accepted as paramount. I urge it again today.

I again urge here that the interest of the whole public be accepted by us all as paramount in the matter before us. I recognize that an employer, and especially a large one, can rarely expect to be credited with true objectivity in such an emotional field as employee and union relations—and I suppose it is only fair to say that no interested party is ever completely objective, no matter how hard he tries.

But I do want to assure you that, so far as it is possible, we have tried to be completely objective in our approach to our employee and union relations problems back home and to the problem you gentlemen have as to what are the various ingredients or provisions that should be included in a labor law you will pass with the intention of its serving equitably the best interest of employees and employers, and at the same time protect the paramount public interest.

To as great a degree as is possible then, I am here sincerely trying to offer such of our experiences and observations as may afford you some help toward the formulation of a labor law that will be fair to all. My company and I have no other interest than a law that is good for the whole public, while being fair to both employees and employers. And let me say that I do not think such a position needs to be dictated by good citizenship alone. I think enlightened selfishness on the part of an employer requires that he seek no unintelligent, selfish, temporary advantage, but that he seek that minimum regulation of both parties that will insure fairness and make certain the public interest is being served.

I think it is highly commendable that Congress is now reexamining present-day conditions and experiences under the present law less than 2 years after its enactment. If experience to date should show that amendments to the present law are desirable, I hope that constructive amendments will be enacted promptly now rather than waiting for some 12 years to improve our basic Federal labor laws, as was done in the case of the Wagner Act.

I further feel that it will be very profitable if Congress will hold periodically such hearings as these to supplement their own individual experience and knowledge of existing conditions with testimony as to the experiences of others with current labor laws and as to any changes in the conditions to which those laws apply.

Experience is our best teacher. Just as hindsight is necessarily more infallible than the foresight of even the most unprejudiced and wisest men in all matters, actual experience in the matter of employee-employer relations, and of the rules of conduct with respect thereto embodied in our labor laws, should not be disregarded lightly for prophecy.

In 1935 Congress found certain conditions which experience had demonstrated needed to be corrected. The result was the passage of the Wagner Act, designed to protect the public interest in the light of the then existing conditions. Certainly it cannot be said that the conditions existing in 1947, at the time the present law was enacted, could be reasonably regarded as the same as those prevailing at the time the Wagner Act was passed.

We have been dealing with unions of various kinds and strength for over 40 years in General Electric, and we now have forty-odd contracts with unions affiliated with the principal national and international organizations. One of our present contracts is with a union that has uninterruptedly represented employees in that plant since as early as 1903.

Our experience with unions has thus been long, and it has been generally favorable. Our relations, despite some admittedly trying circumstances, have in the main been characterized by mutual tolerance, understanding, and peace. We are proud of our record of no major strike in more than 25 years prior to 1946, when for some 9 weeks we were caught in the middle between two tremendously powerful and for the duration of that period, unyielding forces. On the one hand were the big unions demanding wage increases that would have been ruinous without price increases; on the other was the Government supporting the unions' demands but hesitating to modify its regulations against price increases.

When some of the newer national unions were being formed in the mid-1930's, we were among the first, if not the first, of the larger companies to be genuinely receptive without resistance. It has been our general policy to consent to representation elections rather than to insist that the unions try to obtain a determination by the National Labor Relations Board that there should be such an election. This has been our policy because of our desire that the majority of our employees be free to select at any time any desired representative that the Board would certify to us.

We believe that fair, able, and independent representation of employees by unions is thoroughly in keeping with the principles and actualities of such a highly industrial republic as ours. We think unions should be strong and sound, and we thoroughly recognize that it is within their very proper province to agree or disagree with us in whole or in part on problem after problem from time to time. At the same time we do not feel the law should aid unions in reaching such positions of improper power as to jeopardize the interests of the public as a whole.

Although I necessarily do not have the opportunity to get into the intimate details of even our own employee relations matters, I know that our experience, and I am of the impression that the experience of the country generally, indicates that the present law is a substantial improvement over the Wagner Act. I think there may well be room already for some improvement in the present law. I hope that we can continue always to improve all of our laws. But I do not think that in the process we should recklessly give up what seem to me unmistakable advances under the present law.

Increased production, and accompanying increase in real purchasing power, are the most important factors contributing to an improved standard of living. During periods of scarcity in housing and so many consumer goods, additional production becomes increasingly important both to supply the actual needs and to offset other forces making for inflation.

Experience has indicated that the present law has not reduced overall production through increased strikes as labor leaders and other opponents of the law predicted. I am told United States Department of Labor figures show that during the first year under the present law, the number of strikes decreased 38 percent, the number of employees involved in strikes decreased 46 percent, and the number of man-days of idleness due to strikes decreased 35 percent, as compared with the preceding 12 months. These same figures indicate that if the first 12 months under the act are compared with the year 1946, strikes are down 43 percent, employees involved are down 62 percent, and man-days of idleness due to strikes are down 72 percent—representing an increase of 84 million man-days of production.

This decline in strikes under the present law and this greatly decreased number of workers involved in strike—from 450,000 in June 1947, the last month prior to the present law, to 79,000 in September 1947, the first month after the present law became fully effective—appear to be more than purely coincidental. Eighty-four million man days of added production are not insubstantial during such periods of scarcity and inflation as we were experiencing in 1947. Our own loss of production, due to the one strike I have indicated we had in 1946, amounted to 7,000,000 man-days as compared with a loss of not more than 5,000 man-days during the first 12 months under the present law.

The intent of the present law was to reduce industrial strife by equalizing the responsibilities of labor organizations and employers, and especially to reduce the costly strikes that had been, and were then, so prevalent. The opponents of the present law predicted more strikes as a result of this law. But, when strikes declined sharply in accordance with the intent of the law, these opponents quickly shifted ground to claim that the law had nothing to do with the reduction in strikes. Yet unions continued their growth, employees continued to get increases, although these were now much more often achieved peaceably than by striking. If there had been an increase in strikes to accommodate the predictions of the opponents of the present law, I believe we can be relatively sure that these opponents would have loudly blamed the increase in strikes on the law rather than on any reverse of any other conditions now claimed as the cause of fewer strikes.

But perhaps far more significant than the reduction in the regular run of economic strikes has been the substantial, if not complete, elimination of the national emergency strike under the power or influence of the present law. Perhaps just as important as such additional protection from national paralysis has been the substantial elimination of jurisdictional strikes, which have no defenders, and the substantial reduction in secondary boycotts and featherbedding, thus greatly reducing the human and economic waste that had been so prevalent from these sources before the passage of the present law.

Yet certainly American workers have not lost the freedom to strike. I am informed that more than 1,500,000 workers participated in 2,800 strikes during the first year under the present law, even though this is a substantial reduction from the 4,600,000 workers who participated in 5,000 strikes during 1946.

Of course, it would not be in the public interest to obtain these reductions in strikes and even the great advantages of additional production and increased purchasing power if it resulted in the loss of freedom of the workers.

Freedom to work or not to work, freedom of speech, freedom from human and economic waste, and freedom from national paralysis, must certainly be jealously safeguarded. It seems to me that employees, as well as all other segments of our society, have enjoyed such freedoms to a constantly improving extent under the present law—in sharp contract to what they did under the Wagner Act or to what they would under the proposals to return to that act with only such amendments as I understand are proposed in the bill under consideration by your committee. Provisions of the present law protecting a man against the loss of his job due to some offense to those in power in his union certainly is a step in the direction of increasing the freedom to work.

The provisions of the present law protecting the employees against reprisals for daring to oppose those in power in his union, as well as the freedom given equally to employers and unions to express themselves, providing they are not accompanied by threats, force, or bribes, has certainly contributed to freedom of speech.

Employees have certainly not suffered the wage cuts or loss of jobs which some opponents of the present law predicted. On the contrary, employees, including union members, have enjoyed the most favorable wage settlements and highest periods of employment in our history. Average weekly earnings in American industry rose from $49.44 in August 1947, to $54.52 in September 1948, an all-time high. This was an increase of 9.5 percent, as compared with a cost-of-living increase of 8.9 percent. Contrary to the normal tendencies in inflationary periods, the increase in wages actually exceeded the rise in prices. Employment reached an all-time peak of 61,000,000, with more than 16,000,000 employed in manufacturing alone, as compared with 10,000,000 in 1939. In our own case, employment has increased by over 20,000 people during the 1947–48 period.

Union membership certainly has not suffered under the present law or its ban on the closed shop, as so many predicted. The contention of some union leaders that the ban on the closed shop would destroy unions is not supported either by experience under the present law or the Railway Labor Act under which I am told not only the closed shop, but any form of compulsory union membership, has been banned for many years, and under which the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen has become one of the biggest, richest, and strongest unions. That unions should have continued to so increase their membership substantially is particularly significant in view of the degree to which the larger industrial units had been organized previously and the degree to which new membership has had to come in such smaller individual increments. Union membership among our own employees, as evidenced by the number for whom we check off dues, has continued to increase.

Unions have also continued to win new bargaining units through NLRB elections and otherwise. Here again the continuance of the steady growth of bargaining units is in the face of a declining opportunity in the typical area of organization, the industrial unit, because such a high percentage of the industrial units have already been organized. While it may or may not be especially significant, since the passage of the present law there have been in our own case three bargaining elections for new units that were successful for the unions, and there have been two where the unions were unsuccessful; whereas in the 6 months preceding the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act the unions had lost six straight elections.

Our own experience has certainly indicated a substantially increased sense of responsibility by many of the unions with which we deal, which I understand has been the experience generally. Although we have not sued any of the unions with which we deal, and have been sued only once since the enactment of the present law by one of our unions, and that as a result of action which we undertook in compliance with an order of the Atomic Energy Commission, the increased responsibility of unions has been notable, both at the bargaining table and in their subsequent conduct, due, we believe, to the fact that under the present law, for the first time, both sides are required to bargain in good faith, can file unfair labor practice charges, can sue or be sued in Federal courts, and are responsible for the acts of their agents. There has been a substantial reduction in the number of wildcat strikes, both in our own experience and, we understand, generally.

The prediction of the opponents of the law that the injunction provision would be abused has not been borne out, I believe, by experience. I am told the statistics of the Board show that out of nearly 4,000 strikes occurring since the present law became effective, only 43 injunctions have been sought and the courts have granted only 24. In national emergency strikes, however, the Government itself has six times requested injunctions against a labor organization and in each case the restraining order has been granted. I believe the facts show that in only six-tenths of 1 percent of the strikes occurring under the present law have injunctions been granted.

I think the charge was frequently made that unions would be harassed under the present law as to seriously reduce their effectiveness in representing employees. Let's again look at the experience with respect to this prediction. I am told the record of the NLRB shows that in the first 15 months under the present law 5,324 unfair labor practice cases were brought to the Board. Of these 4,136, or nearly 80 percent were instituted by unions against employers. Unions and individual workers filed 528 of the remaining cases against other unions. Employers brought only 668 cases or about 13 percent of the total number against unions.

One would have to be naive indeed to believe the affidavit requirement would solve the Communist problem some unions apparently have. Yet we think we see, at various places, some examples of members in unions having been aided—by the non-Communist affidavit requirement—in making progress toward purging their unions of what they feel may be Communist leadership. Certainly, the very wonder by union members at some officials' refusal to sign has led to a great deal of new local consideration of the national problem. In a great many cases they have elected new officers where the determining factor seemed to be the belief of the membership that it would be getting new leadership with less Communist taint or certainly with less public suspicion of that taint.

As I testified before the Senate committee a few weeks ago, I feel that any adequate and fair labor law, by whatever name, should, in my opinion, provide at least the following:

(1) Protection of the public.

(2) Protection of the rights of individual employees from abuses either by employers or unions.

(3) Protection of legitimate rights of both unions and employers.

(4) Requirement of equal responsibility on the part of both employers and unions.

(5) Protection of free speech for both employers and unions.

(6) Protection of freedom to earn a livelihood.

We have some eliminations to suggest from the present law, we have some additions and some strengthening to suggest, and we want especially to suggest the continuance of some particular provisions of the present law where the experience under those provisions has seemed to us to be an improvement.

I would now like Mr. L. R. Boulware, who is our vice president directly responsible for employee and union matters, to make these specific recommendations to you based on our experience. In view of the late hour, he will move to that.

Mr. BAILEY (presiding). You may proceed.

Mr. BOULWARE. I presume you want this as brief as possible. The eliminations about which Mr. Wilson spoke are two principal ones in number.

We think the vote in the union-shop election might very easily be eliminated. We think the vote on the last offer in national emergencies might very easily be eliminated from the present law.

Added to the present law we think should be an affidavit by employers as well as employees and that the affidavit, the non-Communist affidavit, should be extended to bargaining agents both of the employer and of the employee so that salaried people other than officers in the unions and among the employers are covered.

We think there should be some strengthening of the mass picketing and violence provisions of the present act. We think there should be some strengthening of the "featherbedding" to cover made work as well as work not done, although we recognize the problem of identifying that.

I do not mention it in the summary that was prepared here, but Mr. Jacobs in a letter to us gave a very interesting bill of rights, which I think could properly be explored for consideration now or later.

That is, secret elections, remedy for fraud and duress in these elections, right to inspect or audit books, keeping national officers from enslaving the local or imposing on the locals, remedies for capricious imposition of heavy penalties.

The things that we think ought to be continued that are in the present law, which developed out of the Taft-Hartley and the Wagner combination is: First, we think the ban on the closed shop should be continued; second, we think the present regulation about jurisdictional strikes should be continued, and the same applies to secondary boycotts; third, we think the "featherbedding" should be broadened, if it is possible to do it clearly; next, we think the provision about national emergency strikes as it is in the present law is good. We would not extend that. We think we need one more round of experience with that before taking anything more drastic even in the face of the threat.

I mentioned that we think mass picketing, the present provision should be kept and strengthened, and the anti-Communist affidavit should be kept and broadened to cover the employer in order to get away from the one-sided nature of that.

We think that the present provision in regard to free speech should be kept if there is any difficulty about the wording or some problem about the evidence, but I am not a lawyer and not competent in that field, but we think the idea behind the present free-speech provision is good.

We like mutual responsibility provisions in the present act and the provisions against political contributions that are not authorized separately, and the separation of the advocate and judge in the conciliation and in the counsel and the exception of supervision from unions. Those are the principal things that we mentioned. There are others that we could cover.

Mr. BAILEY. Does that end your formal presentation?

Mr. BOULWARE. That is all in the formal presentation, sir, except the only thing that I added was Mr. Jacobs' bill of rights, which we think you may not get to this time, but which we think are very worthy of consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Wilson, at this time I would like to inquire what has been the experience of your company under the Wagner Act? Did you ever have any strikes for recognition under the Wagner Act?

Mr. WILSON. Strikes for recognition? No; I think we had none. We always consented to the election.

Mr. BAILEY. The bargaining agent there for the General Electric is UE-CIO, I believe.

Mr. WILSON. We have some 40 unions in our plants.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe you have about 75 plants affected; have you not?

Mr. WILSON. We have at least that that have these 40 unions in them. Forty contracts, to make it clear.

Mr. BAILEY. Did the General Electric Co. ever suffer any strikes to require them to bargain with a particular union in the face of an NLRB certification of another union?

Mr. WILSON. No; I think not.

Mr. BOULWARE. No.

Mr. BAILEY. The company says that the Taft-Hartley law has produced an increase in responsibility on the part of unions to bargain in good faith. GE does not tell us here as members of the committee that since the Taft-Hartley Act has been in effect that it has refused to accept arbitration as a method of settling grievances, as provided in the contract with the union, and has resorted to legal moves to block these arbitration awards. Is that true?

Mr. WILSON. I will let Mr. Boulware answer that. No; it is not true.

Mr. BOULWARE. We are in arbitration in several cases now, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me have placed in the record this quotation from your existing contract with UE-CIO, and I quote:

> In the event no agreement is reached on any matter involving the application or interpretation of any provision of this contract, such matter shall be submitted to arbitration on request of either the union or the company. The arbitration decision shall be final and binding on both parties.

Mr. BOULWARE. That is interpretation of the contract provision, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, under this contract the UE has in the past year taken two cases to arbitration. The arbitrator ruled against General Electric in both cases, and in both instances the company had gone to court and engaged in extensive litigation to have those arbitration awards set aside. That is true. I can give you the citation of your court action.

Mr. BOULWARE. My assistant says—I am not familiar with the language, the wording, but that is not an accurate interpretation of the findings.

Mr. BAILEY. But you did go to court to have the award set aside?

Mr. BOULWARE. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to ask you why you don't bargain in good faith. That is a part of your contract.

Mr. BOULWARE. We agree, to the best of our belief, sir, we agree to bargain in good faith, but we had not agreed to arbitrate those questions that were brought into those two cases.

Mr. BAILEY. Is there any doubt about what I read there out of that contract that says it shall be left to arbitration and the decision of the arbitrator shall be final and binding, which means without appeal, and yet you appealed.

Mr. BOULWARE. That was as to the interpretation of the contract, sir, and other elements were brought in.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it not true that you took advantage of the provision of the Taft-Hartley Act where the union has no right of appeal and the company has? They have no right of redress and you took advantage of that and instituted these suits because the Taft-Hartley law permits you to do so and gives them no redress of grievance whatever.

Mr. BOULWARE. I don't think we took any advantage of anything, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. What is the meaning of those suits, then?

Mr. WILSON. This is a legal question and I do not think either of us can answer it. We will let the lawyer answer it.

Mr. DAY. My name is Day, Mr. Chairman.

In these instances of which you speak there is a controversy between the union and the company as to whether or not this specific issue was arbitrable.

Two cases went to arbitration. One arbiter ruled in favor of the company's contention that the specific subject matter was not arbitrable under our contract. If you are familiar with those clauses, sir, I think you will recognize that that particular clause very clearly is restricted to questions concerning the application and interpretation of the contract.

Now, these were issues which were not covered in the contract, according to the company. The union took a diverse view.

The arbiter in the other case ruled in favor of the union's contention. The union went into court in one case. The union went into court to have the award of its favorable decision confirmed.

The company went into court, conversely, to have its favorable decision confirmed. At the present time both of those cases are still pending.

Mr. BAILEY. I still cannot understand why, in the face of that provision in the contract, there is any necessity for court action, on either the part of the company or the union.

Mr. DAY. I think you are fairly familiar with the fundamental principle of law that no individual can be forced to arbitrate without clearly consenting to do so.

Mr. BAILEY. You mean, you did not consent under that provision?

Mr. DAY. Precisely.

Mr. BAILEY. Why?

Mr. DAY. We think certain subjects matters are properly the subject for arbitration, but after a union and a company had agreed on a contract, we think that it is very proper, in the interest of industrial peace, to arbitrate on the interpretation of the contract, but we think it is highly improper and undercuts collective bargaining to hand it over to a third person, the making of a contract between the company and the union.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me ask you this question: If the Taft-Hartley law remains on the statute books, and the time comes around when you draft a new contract with GE-CIO, will you write that same provision in the contract that is in there now, as to arbitration?

Mr. DAY. We have had no difference—I think I am stating this correctly, sir—we have had no difference of opinion between the company and the union in this instance, or in the case of our many other unions, as to the propriety of arbitration of matters involving the application or interpretation of any contract.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask this question directly of Mr. Wilson:

Yours is a right sizable concern? I am reading now from an article from the New York Times, under date of March 11, in which it states that the profits of your company for 1948 were $216,535,316 before taxes. There were $123,000,000 after taxes.

That is a 30-percent increase over your 1947 figures.

Is that true?

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

Mr. BAILEY. And the profit for each individual employed by the company was $1,102 before taxes, and $620 after taxes, and your wage increases granted in 1948 were $239 per employee, is that true?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know whether that is true.

Mr. BAILEY. I am asking you these questions, Mr. Wilson.

Mr. WILSON. Give me time, and I will figure it out for you. You come too fast with those questions, and I cannot answer them that fast. I will tell you the first figure was right, $123,000,000.

Mr. BAILEY. $123,000,000.

Mr. WILSON. $123,000,000, that is right; and I will tell you how much we had in the pay roll, but if you ask me how much per employee, I do not know. I cannot figure that out per employee. I am no mental arithmetician.

Mr. BAILEY. I take it the figures were released to the newspaper?

Mr. WILSON. Those figures were released from the union, or by the union. They were not in the paper.

Mr. BAILEY. The reason for asking you this question is this: This committee heard testimony from a gentleman the other day, and he was discussing the emergency provision set up in section 302 of the proposed act of H. R. 2032.

He brought pretty forcibly to the committee's attention the fact that not all the parties interested would be brought into this conference, this Presidential conference, as the final resort, after your injunction had expired, and your 30 days coverage period had expired—this national Presidential emergency board—and he insisted it was not strong enough in that it did not make provision for bringing into this conference, this conference of last resort, all of the interested parties.

For instance, in the case of General Electric, you have members on the General Electric board of directors who are directors, and, in some cases, officers in 107 other corporations. They are directors or officers in 10 banks, 12 trust companies, 3 investment banking houses, 17 insurance companies, 7 railroads, 1 steamship line, 4 public utilities, 3 mail-order houses, and 49 industrial companies.

What is the use of having a conference if you can only bring in one party? How can you settle any dispute affecting the national welfare unless the provisions of the act are strong enough to bring in all the parties concerned? He suggested that the proposed legislation should be strengthened by the addition of another subsection that would provide and make it possible to bring into that conference every party of interest in connection with any industrial concern that they might care to bring in. What do you think about the suggestion?

Mr. WILSON. I do not understand what the proposal is. I do not know what this conference is, to be frank with you.

Mr. BAILEY. It is the conference provided under section 302 of the proposed H. R. 2032. It is the conference of last resort after your injunction procedure is entered.

Mr. WILSON. And you propose——

Mr. BAILEY. He proposes.

Mr. WILSON. Who is "he"?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Beirne, I believe, who is connected with the telephone group.

Mr. WILSON. The employer, or the union, or what?

Mr. BAILEY. The representative of the employees.

I am asking you if you think that this section 302—and I assume you have read it—whether it should be so strengthened.

Mr. WILSON. I have not any opinion on it.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. You know the American Federation of Radio Artists is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. I have a correspondence from A. Frank Reel, National Assistant Executive Secretary of the American Federation of Radio Artists, in which he says in the letter that his organization had had amicable relations with the General Electric Co. until the advent of the Taft-Hartley Act, and then he goes on to say what his relationship has been, and explains his relationship.

He says:

The vicious and uncalled for action of the General Electric Co. in the WGY case has had no result other than to make possible the calling of a strike which, although originally involving only 10 announcers in this unit, might well result in a disastrous tie-up of the entire General Electric plant or plants. We recognize that such a strike would do no one any good, except that it would dramatically show the American people just exactly how the Taft-Hartley law has wrecked decent labor relations.

Do you know anything about that?

Mr. WILSON. No; I do not. The chances are that Mr. Boulware could answer that.

Mr. BOULWARE. That is where we had negotiations, and they formerly had a closed shop, which was illegal under the Taft-Hartley Act; and we have settled with them as to hours and working conditions, and everything else, to their satisfaction. These are the announcers, I believe?

Mr. KELLEY. That is right.

Mr. BOULWARE. And the union man from New York wanted a union shop, and we have no union shop in the Schenectady works.

Mr. KELLEY. Apparently the relationship is not good today, because he complains about it here, and he says it resulted in a strike.

Mr. BOULWARE. What is the date of the letter?

Mr. KELLEY. March 14.

Mr. BOULWARE. That was unquestionably from a gentleman in New York. The people in Schenectady are working very happily now, so far as we can tell. He was trying to get them to go out on strike, to have a union shop, as we get it; but they are working along all right, now.

Mr. KELLEY. He refers here to your appearance before the Senate Committee in which you told them the relationship is very good, and he says it is not.

Mr. BOULWARE. We said generally it is very good. We would never go any further than that.

Mr. WILSON. We have 200,000 employees, sir, and there are only 10 in the Schenectady works.

Mr. KELLEY. That is the WGY station?

Mr. WILSON. That is right. The station is located at Schenectady. It is a separate union from our shop union.

Mr. KELLEY. It is an American Federation of Labor affiliate?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, I will put this letter in the record.

(The letter referred to is as follows:)

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF RADIO ARTISTS,
New York 19, N. Y., March 14, 1949.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
Chairman House Labor Committee,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LESINSKI: I have been informed that you intend to call Mr. Charles E. Wilson, president of the General Electric Co., as a witness in the hearings on the Taft-Hartley law. I also notice that my good friend, Gerard D. Reilly, appeared before the subcommittee headed by Congressman Augustine B. Kelley on March 12, stating that among others, he represented the General Electric Co.

I do not know whether Mr. Wilson will appear, nor do I know what Mr. Reilly said on his behalf, but in this connection I believe you should have the following information which I sent in the form of a letter to Senator Thomas, chairman of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, after Mr. Wilson testified before that body.

My letter was dated February 18, 1949. It read as follows:

"Today's New York Times reports that Mr. Charles E. Wilson, president of the General Electric Co., and his labor relations aide, Vice President L. R. Boulware, appeared before the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee yesterday in support of retention of the Taft-Hartley law. These gentlemen are reported as having made the claim that the Taft-Hartley law has brought about a balance between labor and management, and Mr. Wilson is quoted as saying:

"'There is a spirit of unity or we are now on the road to get it, as a result of the improved relationship in the last year.'

"If the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee wishes to find an example of how false that statement on the part of the General Electric executives is, they need look no further than Mr. Wilson's own shop, and Mr. Boulware's own department in Schenectady.

"The American Federation of Radio Artists prides itself on being a good, clean, democratically run union that represents the performers in the radio field. For many years we have represented all of the staff announcers at General Electric's own radio station in Schenectady, WGY. For many years we have enjoyed very pleasant and peaceful relations with the General Electric Co.

"Starting in 1940, a series of collective-bargaining agreements between AFRA and General Electric covering the WGY announcers have been executed and regularly renewed. Those contracts had a union shop provision which allowed the employer to hire anybody it chose, and which simply required that membership in the union after 30 days of employment was a condition precedent to continued employment. Those contracts also provided that even if an announcer was suspended or expelled by AFRA, the company could retain him for as long as necessary for the company to fulfill all obligations or commitments made by the company prior to notice from the union that the member was suspended or expelled. These contracts further provided that AFRA agreed that it would not impose unreasonable entrance fees, dues, or assessments.

"All this was encompassed in the so-called union shop clause that is part of all AFRA agreements, and that practically all employers in this industry agree is fair. General Electric apparently thought it was fair—until the Taft-Hartley law was passed.

"Negotiations were undertaken for a new contract in the fall of 1948. As usual, the AFRA representatives negotiated with the managers of Station WGY. As they had many times in the past, they came to an agreement on the essential terms of the contract which of course, included the union shop as above described, which had in fact existed at WGY for many years. The agreement reached was subject to check by the legal department of General Electric.

"Much to our astonishment, this year the new agreement was not approved by the industrial relations department of General Electric. I personally made three trips to Schenectady. I had one conference with a Mr. Burnison, and two conferences with a Mr. Pfeif, both of whom are in Mr. Boulwar's division. On all three occasions these men stated in front of witnesses that there had never been any trouble with AFRA over the union shop, that there had never been a case of any man refusing to join the union or indicating that he was averse to joining the union. They also admitted that relations with AFRA had always been very friendly.

"At the last conference, in response to my question as to why the General Electric Co. was now insisting upon upsetting this hitherto splendid relationship, Mr. Pfeif stated that the change in attitude resulted from the existence of the Taft-Hartley law.

"AFRA has always complied fully with the Taft-Hartley law. Under the law we had a union authorization election at WGY on January 14. AFRA won that election by a vote of 9 to 1, with all members of the unit voting; not a bare majority of those eligible to vote, as required by the Taft-Hartley law, but 90 percent of those eligible to vote voted for the union shop clause, as permitted by the Taft-Hartley law. Mr. Pfeif insisted that these elections meant nothing to the General Electric Co.

"For these fine gentlemen to tell you that the Taft-Hartley law has improved labor relations is the sheerest hypocrisy, in view of the fact that they have used this law as an excuse to destroy what have been decent labor relations with this union for many years.

"The vicious and uncalled for action of the General Electric Co. in the WGY case has had no result other than to make possible the calling of a strike which, although originally involving only 10 announcers in this unit, might well result in a disastrous tie-up of the entire General Electric plant or plants. We recognize that such a strike would do no one any good, except that it would dramatically show the American people just exactly how the Taft-Hartley law has wrecked decent labor relations.

"I am willing to appear, at my own expense, before your committee, at any time, to swear to the truth of the statements above made and, if necessary, I can produce witnesses who would also swear to the truth of the statements above made, all to their personal knowledge."

May I repeat the same offer to you, to your committee, and to the subcommittee. In addition, there are a number of hidden, unpublicized "jokers" in the Taft-Hartley law that have wreaked uncalculable harm to unprotected radio employees, that, if given the opportunity, I should like to bring to your attention.

Sincerely,

A. FRANK REEL,
National Assistant Executive Secretary.

Mr. KELLEY. That is all I have.

Mr. BAILEY (presiding). Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. I just want to take a very short time, and then I want to yield my time to Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. BAILEY. Proceed.

Mr. IRVING. I would like to say that my purpose is to be constructive, and my attitude is to be neutral, as much as possible.

I feel that this act has not had a full opportunity to show whether it is good or bad. From experience I know that back in 1945 and 1946 the general attitude of the employers whom I know was that we are going to have a law whereby we can give labor a dose of their own medicine, or we can kick them back a little bit, and we can do a lot of things to labor that we have not been able to do in the past few years, and I of course think that was a bad attitude on the part of the employer, if that was the complete or general attitude of all the employers. It certainly would not lead to better labor relations.

I think that just before the enactment of the law many of the unions were advised to get contracts signed that would not be in violation of the law. I think if a contract was signed before June of 1947, that was no violation of a closed shop. I know in Chicago the building trades signed contracts for a period of 5 years, and other contracts had 1, 2 and 3 years to go. And, therefore, I think generally that the unions were satisfied with their closed-shop agreement, and a lot of the employers were satisfied, and wanted those agreements, and the full impact of the act has not yet been felt.

I also feel that possibly the 1948 political situation had something to do with the employers not invoking the more oppressive part of the act. The campaign had much to do with the Taft-Hartley Act.

I think the general instructions went out to the employers to modify their desires to invoke all of the act, and to take it easy. At least I have been told that, and then after the election results I think there was a hesitancy upon the employer to use the act, or that is my opinion, and it was the purpose of it. My confident opinion is that the act was to weaken and destroy unions, contrary to all of the testimony that has been given here.

And I again want to repeat that my approach and my purpose is to be constructive, and I am attempting to be as neutral as possible, and I want to bring that out that I do not think that the act has fully had an opporunity to show what the possibilities of it are. I think that is the great fear of the unions, and the union people, that a little later on they will feel to a much greater extent the full precedence and the full strength of this act.

I am bringing that out because perhaps the employers do not realize why the unions fear this act, and if they have that fear it is of no value to good labor relations. I think personally they feel like the soldier does who has gotten lousy, and he wants to get deloused as soon as possible, and that is the way they feel about this act, and they fear it greatly.

I understand Mr. Jacobs has given a great deal of study to some questionnaire, and has had some correspondence with Mr. Wilson personally, and I will yield the balance of my time to him.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs?

You have at your disposal your own time, plus 5½ minutes of Mr. Irving's time, and 5 minutes of my time, making a total of 21½ minutes.

Mr. JACOBS. It is getting pretty late to use that much time, Mr. Chairman. It will soon be early tomorrow.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that at the conclusion of the examination of Mr. Wilson, and the gentlemen who are with him, I want to request the permission to put in the record a copy of his answer to a communication I addressed to him. I started to do it the other day, but it was in the midst of testimony, and somehow it got back in my files, so I will put it in at the conclusion of his testimony, if there is no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. If there is no objection, the correspondence will be entered in the record, as referred to by Mr. Jacobs.

(The letter referred to was transferred to follow the previous correspondence between Mr. Jacobs and Mr. Wilson, to preserve continuity of the subject. See p. 224.)

Mr. JACOBS. That is only fair, inasmuch as my communication to him was placed in the record.

I first want to refer, Mr. Wilson, to the first paragraph on page 2 of your letter, which indicates to me that the questionnaire, concerning which we have heard so much, was not drafted for the purpose of sustaining the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. WILSON. It was just drafted for the purpose of trying to get facts for the benefit of the people to whom it was suggested that it be sent.

Mr. JACOBS. Specifically, it was not drafted for the purpose of sustaining the Taft-Hartley law, as such?

Mr. WILSON. As such, that is right.

Mr. JACOBS. I have here a copy of your questions; that is, the questions from your questionnaire, and I am going to ask that it be handed down so that you may see it.

Mr. WILSON. I have one here.

Mr. JACOBS. You do not have what I have, Mr. Wilson. I not only have your questionnaire, but also the questionnaire of Mr. Fulton Lewis, Jr.

Mr. WILSON. I see.

Mr. JACOBS. Your questions are placed first, and then Mr. Lewis' questions follow.

Mr. WILSON. I see.

Mr. JACOBS. And will you examine the first two or three questions, and state for the record whether or not you recognize that your questions and his questions are subtantially the same?

Mr. WILSON. Will you give me time to study this? I have never seen Mr. Lewis' questions.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us not waste time on it.

Mr. WILSON. I have never seen it, but if you will give me time to study it I will be glad to answer you.

Mr. BOULWARE. We will accept your statement as to whether they are similar.

Mr. JACOBS. We will put that copy in the record, if there is no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. Is there any objection to the request of the Congressman to include it in the record?

It will be included in the record.

(The combined questionnaires are as follows:)

1. (General Electric) Do you believe that labor laws should, in general, preserve the employee's right to strike?

1. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) Do you believe that the law should preserve the worker's right to strike?

2. (General Electric) Do you believe labor laws should give the President of the United States the right to seek, through courts of law, to delay a strike that would cause a national emergency endangering the health and safety of the entire country?

2. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) In the case of a strike that would cause a national emergency, endangering the health and safety of the Nation—should the President be empowered to get a court injunction to delay such a strike?

3. (General Electric) When two or more unions are fighting each other over who shall do a job or who shall represent the employees, and a strike is called to compel an employer to give to the members of one union the work or recognition being given to the other union—that is a jurisdictional strike. Should labor laws prohibit such strikes?

3. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) When two or more unions are fighting each other, over who is to do a job or who is to represent the workers, and a strike is called to get for one union the work or the recognition—that is a jurisdictional strike. Should the law prohibit strikes of that kind?

4. (General Electric) Should labor laws prohibit secondary boycotts—that is, prevent an employer and his employees, where there is no labor dispute, from being damaged by a union seeking to coerce another employer having a labor dispute?

4. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) When a union is engaged in a labor dispute with an employer, and seeks to coerce that employer, indirectly, by interfering with the business of other companies where there is no dispute between the management and the workers, but which merely do business with the employer who is being struck—that is a secondary boycott. Do you believe the law should prohibit such boycotts?

5. (General Electric) Should labor laws provide that an employer cannot deduct union dues or assessments from wages unless the employee gives his personal O. K.?

5. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) Should the law forbid management to deduct union dues and assessment from the worker's pay envelope, except when the worker gives his personal O. K.?

6. (General Electric) Do you believe labor laws should see to it that both employers and unions be required to bargain in good faith?

6. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) Do you believe the law should require both unions and management to bargain in god faith?

7. (General Electric) Should labor laws give to both employees and employers the freedom to express their own points of view on employee-relations problems—provided such views, or arguments, or opinions do not promise bribes or threaten reprisals?

7. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) Should the law guarantee to management and workers alike, the freedom to express their respective points of view on labor-management problems, provided there are no promises of bribes, or threats of reprisals—direct or implied?

8. (General Electric) Should labor laws protect the employee against unfair practices by unions and management?

8. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) Should the law protect the worker against unfair practices by unions or by management?

9. (General Electric) Do you believe that labor laws should require both union officials and company officials to swear they are not Communists or Fascists or members of any party or organization which plans to overthrow the Government of the United States by force and violence?

9. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) Do you believe the law should require union officials and company officials alike, to swear that they are not Communists, or Fascists, or members of any group which advocates the overthrow of the United States Government by force and violence?

10. (General Electric) Do you believe labor laws should require unions to make appropriate reports to members and Government as to handling of funds—just as companies are required to make appropriate reports to owners and Governments?

10. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) Should the law require unions to make financial reports to members and to Government, just as companies are required to make the same reports to stockholders and the Government?

11. (General Electric) Should labor laws make it clear that a collective-bargaining contract must be honored by both parties? And that each has an equal right to sue the other for breaking the contract?

11. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) Should the law require that a collective-bargaining contract must be honored by both parties? And that each party has an equal right to sue the other party, for breaking the contract?

12. (General Electric) Do you believe labor laws should make it unlawful for a union to compel an employer to engage in featherbedding; that is, to pay money for work which hasn't been done or won't be done?

12. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) When a union requires an employer to pay money for work that has not been done, and will not be done, that is called "featherbedding." Do you believe the law should forbid "featherbedding"?

13. (General Electric) Should labor laws permit the forcing of an employer to hire only workers who belong to a given union?

13. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) When a union, by contract or otherwise, requires an employer to hire only members of that union—that is a closed shop. Do you believe the law should permit such a "closed shop"?

14. (General Electric) Do you believe it should be unlawful for an employee to be prevented from working by the use of violence, force, or intimidation?

14. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) Do you believe it should be unlawful for a worker to be prevented from performing his job by the use of violence, force, or intimidation?

15. (General Electric) Do you believe foremen and other supervisors could properly perform their management duties of serving the balanced best interests of employees, customers and owners alike, if bargaining for supervisors by unions should be included in the labor laws?

15. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) Do you believe that foremen and supervisors, who have a divided responsibility to management which hires them and to the workers under them, should be permitted to have unions of their own?

16. (General Electric) Do you believe labor laws should protect individual workers in the right to join or not to join a union—to remain or not to remain members—just as they individually wish?

16. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) Do you believe the law should guarantee to every worker the right to join or not to join a union—to remain or not to remain a member—just as the individual worker wishes?

17. (General Electric) Should labor laws make clear that both unions and employers can now so affect the public for good or ill that the labor-management relations of both should be regulated equally by law?

17. (Fulton Lewis, Jr) Do you believe that unions and employers alike can now so affect the public interest for good or ill that the law should state, as a matter of national policy, that the relationships of each with the other shall be regulated equally by law?

18. (General Electric) Should labor laws provide that a striker who has been replaced in the course of an economic strike—not involving any unfair labor practice—be permitted to vote in an election to choose a bargaining agent at the conclusion of the strike?

18. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) Suppose that an economic strike—one that does not involve any unfair labor practices—is under way, and a given striker has been replaced by a new worker in his job. An election is held to decide what union, if any, is to represent the workers if and when the strike has finally been settled. Should the law permit this worker, who is out on strike, to vote in that election?

19. (General Electric) No question 19.

19. (Fulton Lewis, Jr.) Should the law place unions under the same prohibition against political activity or making political contributions in election campaigns, that applies to corporations?

Mr. JACOBS. I will give you another copy.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to have them. I have never read them.

Mr. JACOBS. What I want to ask is this: Did you know Mr. Lewis was using your questions on the air?

Mr. WILSON. I did not know that he was using the questions, no.

Mr. JACOBS. When did you first know it?

Mr. WILSON. It was after he went on the air about it. I think the morning after, when I came down on the train in the morning, a dozen people told me they had heard Lewis over the air, and they were all steamed up about the questions, and some of them knew about General Electric's questionnaire we put out, so they were quite excited.

Mr. JACOBS. Could you tell me how many copies of your questionnaire you had printed?

Mr. WILSON. I can find out for you.

Mr. BOULWARE. I cannot tell you exactly, but somewhere around 750,000. We produced 200,000 for the employees, and we sent them to neighbors and customers, and we have had a lot of repeat requests for it, but other people have started reproducing it, so we do not know the total of it.

Mr. JACOBS. Would you be able to tell me what it cost the General Electric?

Mr. BOULWARE. About $40,000.

Mr. JACOBS. And yet, I believe, Mr. Boulware, you list here one of the things you think should be in the labor law as being a prohibition against political contributions; is that right?

Mr. BOULWARE. We do not think that is political. That is raising the question.

Mr. JACOBS. It has had considerable political aspects from the viewpoint here in Congress, but that is neither here nor there.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to ask you a question in regard to free speech. Which one of your questions is that?

Mr. BOULWARE. No. 7.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you realize, Mr. Wilson, that the section in the Taft-Hartley law not only provides that a statement shall not constitute an unfair labor practice, but it shall not be evidence of an unfair labor practice? Since you received my letter are you aware of that fact?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you have an opinion as to whether or not those four words "shall not be evidence" of an unfair labor practice should remain in the law?

Mr. WILSON. I will ask counsel to answer that one.

Mr. JACOBS. Wait a minute before you ask counsel. We will come back to that in a moment.

You have two lawyers there with you?

Mr. WILSON. I have the general counsel of the company. He is my lawyer. And Mr. Boulware has his lawyer—his labor department lawyer.

Mr. JACOBS. You are the president of the company?

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. And Mr. Boulware is the vice president in charge of labor relations?

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. And each one of you has a lawyer?

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. I see a number of people back in the room. I see my good friend Mr. Reilly and, I believe, he is a lawyer for General Electric?

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. And I see Mr. Cherry, whom I have met and made friends with; what is his position?

Mr. WILSON. He is not a lawyer.

Mr. JACOBS. But he is an employee?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. It is very complimentary to you, sir, that we have to bring all this legal talent. We did that after meeting with you last night.

Mr. JACOBS. We had a very pleasant talk last night, and this examination is going to be very pleasant. There are certain things I want to develop for the record.

How many General Electric employees do you have here in this room now, besides the three lawyers and you two gentlemen?

Mr. WILSON. There are four General Electric employees here.

Mr. JACOBS. That is, besides——

Mr. WILSON. We four.

Mr. JACOBS. You four who are up at the table now?

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Four, including Mr. Reilly?

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Then there are three lawyers, the president and vice president, and three other employees?

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Now we have the record straight.

I want to ask you this question before we have the counsel answer the question in reference to question No. 7:

You came down here, of course, knowing that you would be questioned in regard to your questionnaire, did you not?

Mr. WILSON. I hoped it would not be confined to the questionnaire, because I think that is the least important of the matters we came down on, Mr. Congressman. That is something we hoped would be helpful to you gentlemen of the committee and of the other Members of Congress.

Mr. JACOBS. Our point is this: Your views are fairly well covered by the questionnaire, I assume, are they not?

Mr. WILSON. Our views are fairly well covered by the statement I made, and I hope are reasonably well covered by this letter I tried to write you in answer to your very enlightening letter that you sent me.

What was it, 23 pages?

Mr. JACOBS. Twenty-two.

Mr. WILSON. Twenty-two. I struggled with that.

Mr. JACOBS. I will say this: You and Mr. Boulware, in ganging up on me, did me better, because you wrote me 61 pages.

Mr. WILSON. I would not pretend that I could answer it as well as you asked the questions.

Mr. JACOBS. That brings us up to the point where I asked you a question in reference to question 7 on your questionnaire.

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. And that is one of the questions——

Mr. WILSON. Those four words.

Mr. JACOBS. No, I am getting at another point, and we will come to the four words in a few minutes.

Mr. WILSON. Pardon me.

Mr. JACOBS. That comes to the point of question 7 which was sent out by General Electric to the general public to answer "Yes" or "No."

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. And you have three lawyers, your vice president in charge of labor relations, and four other employees here, and when I asked you the question in reference to it, you called on your general counsel to answer it.

We have the record straight now; that is correct, is it not?

Mr. WILSON. That is right. You have set the set the stage beautifully. I do not know what it proves, but it is all right. You have stated it very well.

Mr. JACOBS. Then, before we actually put the question in reference to No. 7, and get an answer to it, I want to ask you if you do not think that maybe some of these questions involving legal propositions were a little complex for the general public just to check off "Yes" or "No?"

Mr. WILSON. I do not know whether that is so or not. I would think it was not, Mr. Congressman, by the reaction of the many people that I know who filled these in. They seemed to think they could give the answers intelligently, and they were just ordinary people, not attorneys or lawyers, you know, who have the extraordinary powers; but just fellows like myself.

Mr. JACOBS. But you, who are the president of a billion dollar corporation, turn to your general counsel to answer a relatively——

Mr. WILSON. I wanted to try to find the gimmick in your question. I knew since you asked it there must be a gimmick in it, and I was trying to find it.

Mr. JACOBS. I will confess I figured you would ask the lawyer when I asked the question.

Mr. WILSON. You bet. I found out last night you are a very keen gentleman.

Mr. JACOBS. You flatter me a lot. I have not progressed nearly as much as you people have.

Mr. WILSON. You have not? I am a good deal older than you are.

Mr. JACOBS. But I age faster than some people do.

Mr. WILSON. If you keep on keeping hours like this you will. I have 500 miles to go when I leave here, before morning, so I will age right along with you tomorrow.

Mr. JACOBS. I will move along as rapidly as I can.

Mr. WILSON. That is all right, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. At any rate, we are at the point where we are trying to get an answer to one question, and that is No. 7, so I will defer now to the lawyer and ask him whether or not he believes that those words "or be evidence of" in section 8 (c) should be stricken out?

Mr. LUEBBE. No.

Mr. JACOBS. I will ask you two or three questions in view of your answer.

You are under the impression, are you, that in the matter of evidence, what one man says in reference to another that might disclose his attitude, should be received in evidence when his treatment of the other fellow is under judicial inquiry?

Mr. LUEBBE. Generally, yes.

Mr. JACOBS. But you do not not think it should be in employer relations?

Mr. LUEBBE. As I understand, the reason the provision was put in the Taft-Hartley——

Mr. JACOBS. The point is this—I have a limited amount of time—you folks sent out a questionnaire in which you asked the public to answer "Yes" or "No," but I will not try to make you answer it "Yes" or "No." But just answer my question.

Mr. LUEBBE. I will answer "Yes," I think the provision in the Taft-Hartley law in this respect is a sound one.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us take a case. Let us suppose that I am an employer, and I make a speech in which I say that I think that the union is a bad thing for the people who are working for me. I have a right to do that, and there is no policeman going to tap me on the shoulder and take me to jail when I say it, but suppose the next morning I go down and I fire all the union officers, and there is an unfair labor practice charge filed against me. The question is whether I fired them because they belonged to a union, or whether I fired them because they were not performing their work properly, is it not?

Mr. LUEBBE. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think it would cast some light upon the subject, the fact that I had expressed myself in opposition to the union, and then fired the union officers?

Mr. LUEBBE. No.

Mr. JACOBS. In a similar let of circumstances, we will say where the same issue was being tried in a court of law, or in any other type of proceedings, do you not think that evidence would be admissible?

Mr. LUEBBE. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. But do you agree with me it is not admissible in the case I stated?

Mr. LUEBBE. Yes; I agree with you.

Mr. JACOBS. I think that is all the questions I want to ask on that point.

Mr. Boulware, I want to ask you a question, because you and I had a talk last night, and I gave you a question to study to see if you could get an answer for me.

In reference to section 8 (b) (4) (D), which is the jurisdictional dispute in crafts, I believe I asked you if you could tell me last night whether or not, if an award was made under section 10 (k), there was any provision whereby the union could enforce that award. Is that substantially the question I asked you when I was talking to you last night?

Mr. BOULWARE. As well as I understood it, and I got no comfort from discussing this with the lawyers when I got home, sir, so I—because, as I explained to you, I was not a lawyer, so I would like to pass that question to Mr. Day for such discussion as you want, Mr. Jacobs, although——

Mr. JACOBS. I am sorry, I cannot hear you.

Mr. BOULWARE. I would like to pass the question to Mr. Day.

Mr. JACOBS. But before you do I want to pursue it just a little further.

Mr. BOULWARE. All right.

Mr. JACOBS. The question was put to you last night, and put to you fairly clearly, was it not?

Mr. BOULWARE. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. And I laid it out to you last night, and told you I was going to ask you about it today?

Mr. BOULWARE. You told me to look it up. I had the natural assumption you would ask me about it, yes.

Mr. JACOBS. You have talked to the lawyers about it and you are not ready to answer it yourself, but you want to hand it over to the lawyer to answer; is that right?

Mr. BOULWARE. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. But you recognize, do you not, that that very question is definitely involved in your question No. 3, which calls for a "Yes" or "No" answer from the public? You will admit that, will you not, Mr. Boulware?

Mr. BOULWARE. That is a secondary boycott there, in No.——

Mr. JACOBS. Did I say No. 3?

Mr. WILSON. No. 3, you said.

Mr. JACOBS. That is it, is it not? Your secondary boycott is No. 4; your jurisdictional strike is No. 3. I am talking about the jurisdictional strike in the craft set-up: That is under section 8 (b) (4) (D), is it not?

Mr. BOULWARE. I do not remember it.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, take it from me that that is the jurisdictional strike in the craft. But after conferring with the lawyers, you are not prepared to answer that question now yourself; is that right?

Mr. BOULWARE. No. We are going to the principle here and to the objective of labor laws as to what the people would like to see tried to be accomplished. And we are sticking to the principle there as to whether or not people would like to see this sort of thing accomplished, and we think it is perfectly right to ask them if they want some kind of objective or not, and when it gets down to the issue in the law, then we will have to call on you experts to do that.

Mr. JACOBS. I agree with you, Mr. Boulware. I agree with you 100 percent. You have a perfect right to ask the question. And I have a perfect right to point out to the people that there are so many complicated things involved in those questions that they could not be answered yes or no. Do you not think that we both have those respective rights?

Mr. BOULWARE. Yes, indeed. But we disagree there. I think this question can be answered for the purpose for which it was sent out, to see if people had some ideas about what they would like to have accomplished. And if we get into complications such as the history of the law and things like that, they lead me astray awfully fast.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Now, let us have Mr. Day go into this. We have the second lawyer. If we could get Mr. Reilly up here now, maybe we can go ahead.

Give me the answer to my question.

Mr. DAY. I would like to suggest, Mr. Jacobs, that I think your question is absolutely immaterial to the question that is listed in our questionnaire.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, let me——

Mr. DAY. Just if you will permit me to finish, sir——

Mr. JACOBS. Permit me, Mr. Day, to say that I will have to be the judge as to whether my question is immaterial.

Mr. DAY. I would say that you have not shown its materiality. Now, whether or not, Mr. Jacobs, if I may suggest it, or regardless of what the answer to the question you asked may be, it seems to me it is very clear that question No. 3, like question No. 7, relating to free speech, involves only the principle at issue. Of course, the technicians and, of course, your committee must consider the ramifications of each of these principles. But in stimulating thought as to the principles involved, that was the purpose of this questionnaire. The purpose was not to sustain the present law at all.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Day, you have taken up considerable of my time telling me that I should not have asked the question. But I still press the question now, and I am going to state it again. The question is this. A jurisdictional strike of a craft nature is forbidden in section 8 (b) (4) (D) of the Taft-Hartley law. Section 10 (k) provides for an award in such a dispute in the event there is not a settlement.

Now, the question is whether or not you can point out any section in the Taft-Hartley law that gives the union or the employees the right to enforce that award. If you know what section it is, I would like to have the information.

Mr. DAY. I think I would agree with the answer given by the attorney for the union representative earlier this evening, when he pointed out that by reading the statute, plus the rules and regulations of the Board, which, of course, they are authorized to adopt, it seems rather clear that the answer is this, that if a jurisdictional dispute goes to the stage where you finally do have the Board award, and then there is a failure to live up to the award, an unfair labor practice would result, and presumably, in fact, very clearly, I think, under the Board rules—I do not happen to have them with me at the time—there would be the right to file an unfair labor practice charge. And the normal procedures of the Board following through sections 9 and 10, I believe, would then permit eventually the Board to go through to the circuit court of appeals for an enforcement.

Mr. JACOBS. We are getting too far away. I am not satisfied that we have an unfair labor practice charge yet. And we surely cannot get to the circuit court of appeals until we do.

What I want to know is this. Under what section can you file an unfair labor practice charge against the employer? You certainly cannot——

Mr. DAY. Well, any person——

Mr. JACOBS. Wait just a minute. I am not through. I do not want to be discourteous, but I am not through.

Mr. DAY. I beg your pardon, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Under section 8 (b) (4) (D), you certainly cannot do it, because that is a provision against the union only.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman has 3½ minutes remaining.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes.

Mr. DAY. If I may have a moment, Mr. Jacobs, I have not examined this question in some time.

Mr. JACOBS. Suppose you look that up while we go ahead with another question.

Mr. DAY. I can state from my general knowledge, however, that any aggrieved person could file a charge with respect to an unfair labor practice under the act.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, define where that is going to be an unfair labor practice, for the employer to fail to live up to that award.

While you are looking for that, we will go on to another question. I want to ask this question of Mr. Wilson.

You, of course, are familiar with the questionnaire, naturally, that your company put out.

Mr. WILSON. Yes; that is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Tell me this, Mr. Wilson. And I certainly would not ask you this question if I did not think you were a pretty fair and honest man, because you could give me the wrong answer. But I want to see what your answer would be. Do you think that those questions, those 18 questions there, would be fair to be read on the radio show with people asked to answer them yes or no without having the question in front of them?

Mr. WILSON. Do you mean to say that he did not read the questions to them?

Mr. JACOBS. No. I mean, would it be fair to ask people to answer those questions yes or no by just merely reading them on the radio?

Mr. WILSON. Did I not understand that he asked them to take the questions down and then to——

Mr. JACOBS. No. They were not asked to do that.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know. I did not hear that.

Mr. JACOBS. No. They were just asked to write down the certain numbers and then to check them off yes or no. You remember what I told you last night about some of the returns I got.

Mr. BOULWARE. Yes, definitely.

Mr. WILSON. The test would be in the person's ability to memorize the question as it was taken down. That would be a test of ability.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think there might be some test in the person's ability to give them out clearly, too?

Mr. WILSON. I presume he read the questions. Whether it was these questions or not, I do not know. And he could easily have given them out just reading them off, Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. You assume my question is that the questions were just read on the radio and people expected to check them off, 1, 2, 3, and so forth. You could assume that.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think that would be a fair way to take a poll?

Mr. WILSON. I would not think it was nearly as good a way as to get hold of a ballot and sit down and study it. And I think I could personally do a much better job if I sat down and studied it.

Mr. JACOBS. We have had enough trouble with these questions here with three lawyers and your vice president sitting here without just listening to them on the radio.

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. And if the announcer happened to be a fellow who fumbles a little bit now and then, it makes it that much worse, does it not?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; I believe that would add to the confusion, if he fumbles.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, let us take question 18, for example. We will examine question No. 18 for a minute. I do not know who wants to answer this. But I want to read it in the record first:

Should labor laws provide that a striker who has been replaced in the course of an economic strike—not involving any unfair labor practice—be permitted to vote in an election to choose a bargaining agent at the conclusion of the strike?

Mr WILSON. This is one of Mr. Boulware's subjects. He can answer that.

Mr. JACOBS. You are aware of the fact that the election can be held during the strike under the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. WILSON. Can be what?

Mr. JACOBS. Such an election can be held during the strike. Did the fact that your question stated "at the conclusion of the strike" indicate an opinion on your part that such bargaining elections should not be held during the strike?

Mr. WILSON. I think the answer is "No," is it not?

Mr. BOULWARE. No. We were simply trying to put the question in the simplest form that would indicate the time when it was most likely to be——

Mr. JACOBS. Take the microphone over with you, Mr. Boulware.

Mr. BOULWARE. I am sorry, sir. We were simply making up these questions, and we were simply trying to state them in the simplest form so that we felt they would fit the most characteristic circumstances that we thought would prevail any place.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, you have worse confusion than there was. Just keep the microphone. I will have to get clarified on this.

Your question certainly does not square with the Taft-Hartley law. We can agree on that, can we not? Question No. 18 does not square with the Taft-Hartley law. Will you agree to that?

Mr. BOULWARE. You mean, as to the words, "at the conclusion," we should have stated other cases? This is not all-inclusive; I certainly would agree to that.

Mr. JACOBS. At any rate, the Taft-Hartley law permits the election during a strike; that is correct, is it not?

Mr. BOULWARE. That is what I understand.

Mr. JACOBS. But this "at the conclusion of the strike" is a little different, and it does not mean that you think that the Taft-Hartley law in that regard should be changed. I understand that correctly, do I?

Mr. BOULWARE. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Do you not think that there was a slight possibility that the public might assume from your use of the words, "how would you revise our labor laws?" that these questions were drawn up pretty much in line with the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law, and therefore the public would get the impression that the election could not be held during a strike?

Do you not think it could have had that effect, whether you intended it or not?

Mr. BOULWARE. Well, I will say that, first of all, we certainly did not intend it. And secondly, I have no opinion as to whether we might think it or not. I assume we might get all kinds of replies.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us just start, then, from the beginning again. "How would you revise our labor laws?" would certainly indicate that you were referring to the Taft-Hartley law, because that is our current law now.

Mr. BOULWARE. The current law on the books. We do not mention the Taft-Harley Act or the Wagner Act or any other law, because we were trying to get it on the basis that we were going to get a new labor law. So what we were trying to put in here was to start some thinking on what might be the ingredients.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, look. Let us not go tiptoeing through the buttercups about this thing. We are not so naive that we do not know that the employers generally are supposed to be upholding the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. BOULWARE. We have said here in our testimony that we substantially endorse it with some changes and some additions.

Mr. JACOBS. That is generally known. So when this questionnaire went out, "How would you revise our labor laws?" do you not think—let us just be honest and objective about it—Mr. Wilson, do you not think that the public probably understood or believed that that was an effort to uphold the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. WILSON. The present law. Of course, I think myself, Mr. Congressman, that the vast majority of the people who may have gotten this, our own employees, have very little understanding, simply because they have not studied what is in the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. JACOBS. What is in the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. WILSON. Of what is in it, or what is in the Wagner Act.

Mr. JACOBS. I agree with you on that, Mr. Wilson.

Mr. WILSON. That is what we had found out.

Mr. JACOBS. And when they received this questionnaire with those words, "How would you revise our labor laws?" and they read about boycotts and jurisdictional strikes and emergency strikes, and then the voting to decertify, and so forth, they probably assumed——

Mr. WILSON. Some would, I am sure.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think the vast majority of them would? Just honestly, do you not think that is true?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know what the point is of my agreeing with you, but I am sure I would think it did, Mr. Congressman. I suppose those that were the most understanding of the thing might question that it did refer to it. But undoubtedly, a great many people would think that. I think that is reasonable.

Mr. JACOBS. There is no gimmick in it. I am not trying to put a gimmick in it.

Mr. WILSON. No. I have no idea that you are, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. JACOBS. The point I am making, Mr. Wilson, is this, that it might give a rather false impression in reference to this one point in regard to decertification, which is certainly a highly technical question, I think, as you will concede.

Mr. WILSON. I think the highly technical points of it are awfully difficult questions to cover on any questionnaire.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman has used about 36 minutes of the 38½ minutes allocated to him.

Mr. WIER. He has another 10 minutes, if he will give us some action here.

Mr. JACOBS. The point that I am making is this, Mr. Wilson. I think that your question No. 18 really goes to the heart of the Taft-Hartley law, the main complaints that have been made of the Taft-Hartley law. I believe counsel would agree on that, would you not?

Mr. LUEBBE. No.

Mr. JACOBS. I thought you would agree with me.

Mr. LUEBBE. That is just one of them.

Mr. JACOBS. At least from this viewpoint, it refers, of course, first of all to 9 (c) (1), where there can be a petition for decertification. I mean, we can agree to that, can we not?

Mr. LUEBBE. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. We are making headway, anyway.

And after the decertification takes place, we, of course, go back to 8 (b) (4) (C), where any further concerted action becomes an unfair labor practice because the union is decertified; is that correct?

Mr. LUEBBE. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Have you read the Life magazine editorial of November 29, 1948?

Mr. LUEBBE. I do not recall it.

Mr. JACOBS. It dealt with that. I wonder whether Mr. Wilson might have read it, because it referred to this as a gimmick in the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. WILSON. No. I have not.

Mr. JACOBS. You suspected, Mr. Wilson, that you read it.

Mr. WILSON. No. In New York, we bring in the gimmicks.

Mr. JACOBS. But this is referred to as a gimmick in the Taft-Hartley law by Life magazine. I believe that the reply stated that you did read Business Week for December 18, 1948; is that correct?

Mr. WILSON. Are you asking me?

Mr. JACOBS. Someone did, whoever wrote that letter. Did all of you write me that 61-page letter?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; that is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, then, somebody read Business Week. And did anyone here in your group read Fortune magazine, which referred to the gimmick, in the November 1948 issue, the same gimmick?

Mr. BOULWARE. I did not.

Mr. JACOBS. At any rate, we then go, do we not, to 10 (l), which provides for mandatory injunction under section 8 (b) (4) (C).

Is that right, Mr. Counsel?

Mr. LUEBBE. I do not know, offhand.

Mr. JACOBS. Pardon me?

Mr. LUEBBE. I do not know, offhand. I have to check this.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, it is a mandatory injunction feature. It does not make any difference what the section is. It does apply to that particular unfair labor practice; does it?

Mr. LUEBBE. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Now, then, will you agree to this, then, that question No. 18 on the General Electric questionnaire involves the interpretation of at least 3 different sections of the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. LUEBBE. No. I think question No. 18 is simply a question as to one point, or one situation, that might be involved in the application of the provision that you refer to.

Mr. JACOBS. You do not think that the average person who would read question No. 18 would understand that the decertification, the consequent unfair labor practice, and the mandatory injunction were involved in that?

Mr. LUEBBE. It was involved, but not necessarily limited to this period.

Mr. JACOBS. Oh, involved, but not necessarily limited?

Mr. LUEBBE. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, if we get 10,000 or 15,000 of these questionnaires on our desk and they are marked "yes" or "no," and so forth, how far can we rely upon them if we do not take into account the other features of the law which have a bearing upon the same subject? In your judgment, how far can we rely upon them?

Mr. LUEBBE. To the extent that they are covered in the language of the questionnaire.

Mr. BOULWARE. Isn't there another question there, Mr. Congressman? That is, the folks who reply to this assigned you all a job to accomplish this for them in this way, it seems to me.

Mr. JACOBS. I think that is right. Of course, I have said this to many people that I have written to, that one letter—probably I said it in a letter I wrote to Mr. Wilson.

Mr. WILSON. That is right, sir. You did.

Mr. JACOBS. One letter, reasoned out, would make more of an impression on me than 1,000,000 poll sheets.

Mr. BOULWARE. We agree with you.

Mr. WILSON. There are all kinds of people, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. JACOBS. We had a witness in here the other day from the Farm Grange who had a question put to him. We asked him what he thought about that, and he said, "I say that would indicate that you are against sin."

Now, I would say that if this questionnaire was answered "Yes" all the way through, with the exception of 13 and 15, and then if the fellow would make a fair guess on question No. 18, it would indicate that he was "against sin."

Mr. WILSON. If it stimulated thinking, Mr. Congressman, maybe it served some good purpose for you. If it did, we are glad to that extent.

Mr. BOULWARE. Mr. Congressman, I know you are keeping in mind that we asked for comments, too, for anybody that wanted to go beyond it.

Mr. JACOBS. Sir?

Mr. BOULWARE. You are keeping in mind that we asked for comments, rather than just the yes or no.

Mr. JACOBS. Oh, yes. I want to say that I had a few constituents that did write some comments on it.

Mr. WILSON. Did they paste it on with asbestos?

Mr. JACOBS. No. I was agreeably surprised at some of the rather intelligent comments that were on some of them.

Mr. WILSON. Good.

Mr. JACOBS. I want to read into the record at this time from the current issue of United States News, "Newsgram":

A flood of letters is coming in—referring to Congressmen—

in opposition to giving labor leaders what they ask.

This next is very significant:

These letters are stimulated by a radio and advertising campaign. * * * Workers are writing in some volume, favoring a higher minimum wage and extension of the minimum wage to employees not now covered.

I think that I have substantially established what I hoped to establish, and that is that these questions are not quite as simple as they were made to appear to the public. That was the main object. I really did not intend to go into the law too deeply at this point. I wanted to establish what I think is a very obvious fact, that these questions are not as easy to answer as it would appear.

That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Burke, you have 3 minutes of your time that you did not award to Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

I would like to ask Mr. Boulware a question, for two reasons: First, something that appeared in his statement; and second, I think that, after all these legal terms, you and I can talk in shop language.

Mr. BOULWARE. We will try, anyway.

Mr. BURKE. I want to refer, on page B–4, to your featherbedding statement. You say, "We get practically all our advances in production from incentive-inspired and owner-provided technological improvements that lengthen man's arms."

I quite agree with the latter part of that statement, and probably most of it. In our process of industrial evolution the hand tool was the extension of the man's hand, and the machine tool was the extension of the hand tool.

Now, do I understand your statement here to mean that simply because increase in production through technological improvement is, first, incentive-inspired, and, next, the technological improvement is owner-provided, then any challenge that the worker might make to the production standard that the owner of the machine tool might desire would be in the nature of featherbedding?

Mr. BOULWARE. Oh, no, indeed. We feel that the fair day's work as to the combination of skill, care, interest, and effort is something that should be going up all the time in the skill and care and interest, and should perhaps be going down as to physical effort, as we know how to take the work out of the work.

Mr. BURKE. I understand.

Mr. BOULWARE. And we do not——

Mr. BURKE. I have only 3 minutes, sir.

Mr. BOULWARE. What we are saying here is that this is the way we can provide—I do not know, but maybe a 4-day week.

Mr. BURKE. I understand that the theory of mass production is that the idea is to take the load off the man's back as much as possible.

Now, in writing a law, you would advocate, then, that that law provide that the setting of production standards shall not be subject to the process of collective bargaining?

Mr. BOULWARE. Oh, no, indeed. What we are after here is this: You have a full day's work, by reasonable modern standards. That is the way we describe it, a full day's work content. And what we are after here is that you cannot come in and by force set up the situation where a fellow is going to do a half day's work just because of some power involved, when it is unfair, palpably unfair, to other people. There are plenty of irregularities in a day's work. You cannot regulate the machines that well.

Mr. BURKE. But production standards can properly be subject to the processes of collective bargaining.

Mr. BOULWARE. That is right.

Mr. BURKE. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Wilson, were you not the chairman of the Civil Rights Commission appointed by President Truman?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; I was, Mr. McConnell.

Mr. MCCONNELL. That is what I thought. There are two Wilsons.

Mr. WILSON. That is right.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Frankly, the battle of statistics and questionnaires and polls and letters and the late hours have sort of worn me out physically and mentally, and I was wondering if you gentlemen would just accept a draw and let it go at that.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. McConnell, may I just say one thing? I am deeply impressed with certain parts of the testimony of Mr. Mitchell, who happened to be on at 7 o'clock when we came in. I would just like to express, if I may, for the benefit of the committee, my approval—that is not exactly the word, but put it that way—of his hope that you would find some way to minimize the discrimination of which he was complaining.

I mention that because of my interest in the civil-rights program, in which I had the privilege of having some very small part. But I felt Mr. Mitchell's points were very well taken, not with respect to the Taft-Hartley law or the Wagner Act or anything else, but just the point that this committee provide steps against discrimination.

I thought it was well taken, and I would like to have the opportunity of noting that fact to you.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I want to express my personal appreciation to your reference, not only in the field of civil rights and better relationships and so on, but I would also like to compliment you on a genuine effort to stir an interest in any possible changes in our labor laws. I think that is a fine type of procedure.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Is that all?

Mr. MCCONNELL. No questions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, it looks as though we were starting to count witnesses here and count spectators. I want the privilege tomorrow to be able to count, and put in the record, the number of people in the company of William Green when he is here to testify.

Mr. BAILEY. We will certainly accord you that privilege.

Mr. JACOBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. I have not received any questionnaires from Mr. Green yet that ask for a "Yes" or "No" answer, but I do want to say this, if the gentlemen will yield further, that I have enjoyed my correspondence with Mr. Wilson and Mr. Boulware. I had the occasion to meet them last night when they came down to see me, and I found them very pleasant gentlement to talk to, and I enjoyed it very much. I trust that they will not feel that there was anything personal in my attempting to dramatize the fact that these questions could not be answered yes or no, but that there was a whole lot more involved in them.

Mr. WILSON. It was a pleasure, Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. BOULWARE. We are for you 1,000 percent.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, the Chair would like to request both Mr. Wilson and Mr. Boulware that they make a formal request that their statements be incorporated in the record.

Mr. WILSON. It is so requested.

Mr. SMITH. I have not finished yet.

Mr. BAILEY. Pardon me.

Mr. WILSON. Pardon me, Mr. Smith.

Mr. SMITH. Now, I am supposed to come from that part of the country that is commonly and sneeringly referred to as the Bible belt, and is also on the kerosene circuit.

I have in my hands here a questionnaire, and I want the privilege of putting into the record how the people of my district voted on this questionnaire.

On the third question, they voted: Yes, 430; no, 10.

On question No. 7, they voted: Yes, 433: no, 3.

On question 18, they voted: Yes, 85; no, 345.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. If there are no objections, we will accept Mr. Boulware's prepared statement for insertion in the record.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you, sir.

(The statement is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF L. R. BOULWARE, VICE PRESIDENT, EMPLOYEE RELATIONS, GENERAL ELECTRIC CO.

1. The closed shop.—We believe the closed shop violates the right of free choice—as to jobs, as to association, as to free movement, as to buying and selling goods and services. We believe it makes for poor value in goods and services, arrests technological advances, and hinders a rising standard of living.

The closed shop begins by being wrong in its power over the individual employee and the employer. But that soon fades into insignificance as the power increases over individuals, or a trade, or a community, or an industry, or indirectly the whole country in such a situation as we see this week.

But the closed shop is not the agency in itself that performs all these antisocial deeds. It is the generator, the rallying point, the consolidator of that misuse of power often so evilly exercised against the public interest in jurisdictional strikes, boycotts, featherbedding, resistance to technological improvement. It is the classroom for teaching the disciplines of fear, force and prejudice, which are manifested in all these troublesome and wasteful situations.

Closed-shop unions help keep prices up and help minimize competition. The plain truth is that a businessman can get done through this type of union arrangement what he would be put in jail for doing directly.

2. Jurisdictional strikes.—General Electric has had experience with this type of strike. We believe this type of trouble springs largely from the closed shop influence. Just one recent instance concerned a dispute between two unions at a research laboratory of ours being prepared for secret United States Navy work. Under the present act there was quick relief from the NLRB. The settlement precipitated by this was, as usually happens, exactly in accordance with past practices in the community. Without the law, serious damage would have resulted to the company, to many workers, and to the Nation; and the final answer would have been no different. Our company has experienced and is experiencing instance after instance of this, at Schenectady, Syracuse, Jersey City, in California and Kentucky, and practically all over the Nation. I'll be glad to detail some of these if the committee should want to hear of them later in a question period.

But General Electric's experience is not unusual, as you know. The committee will recall testimony as to the CIO-AFL soft-drink strike on D-day in Detroit; the port-closing longshoremen and sailors' union strike in Oregon which lasted 6 months; the AFL-CIO cannery strike in California when 25,000 tons of fresh vegetables rotted; the bomb-throwing, window-smashing, man-beating CIO-AFL Pittsburgh "teamsters' war"; and other instances of terrorism.

3. Secondary boycotts.—Let me tell you of a shocking but typical case of secondary boycott.

General Electric has a service shop in San Diego which is staffed by 12 employees. We were put on the so-called unfair list of the IBEW because our employees were not represented by their union. In February 1947 this situation came to a head. Our customers were repeatedly advised by the IBEW that if any motors, and so forth, were sent to our shop for repair they would refuse to install them when they were returned. Many of our customers deserted us, and we have steadily lost business since then. In 1948 the IBEW won a representation election and immediately demanded a union shop. A security election was held as required by law, but the union failed to obtain a majority vote approving union security. Since that time the union has apparently dropped the entire matter of bargaining, and our employees are working without a contract. Although our employees are IBEW members, the shop is still on the unfair list. The union has such a strong domination over the San Diego business community that we have never been able to make any headway against the boycott, and accordingly we are accordingly forced to close the service shop as of April 1, 1949. We have many more cases of this kind.

I urgently recommend that any new revised law give protection to the innocent third party or other bystander who, with his employees, ought to be allowed to go about the providing of jobs and his other legitimate business unmolested by force. Any cases of collaboration between two employers to break a strike, such as were cited before the Senate committee, are now amply taken care of, I believe, under the present law through the rulings that they are primary boycotts or primary strikes, due to the community of interest, and therefore do not fall under the ban on secondary boycotts.

General Electric cannot sell certain types of electrical goods in New York unless these products are completely and uselessly rewired by the local union. A typical instance is that of an electrical supplier—not General Electric—who was refused the contract because his product "did not bear the (local) union label" despite its having been made in a union shop elsewhere. The order went to a local union manufacturer at a price of $110,000, just $54,000 higher. This situation continues to exist in New York today. For example, when General Electric manufactures control equipment for use in the New York area, it is assembled and tested by CIO union members in Schenectady or Philadelphia or Pittsfield, and it is then ready for use. However, in certain cases General Electric has been forced to disassemble this equipment, ship the components into New York all tagged for the guidance of the less experienced local union men here, and have it reassembled by this local union. More than double the original assembly work has again been paid for as pure waste.

The reason Federal legislation is needed is because of the power that unions have acquired in this area. Human beings just can't stand too much unchecked power. That has been found true of the businessman, the military officer, the Government official, and even the Government itself. It is true of the union and the union official. The same scrutiny, the same correctives, and the same further preventive powers are needed—and needed in the public interest. The time is now.

4. "Featherbedding".—Production is the secret of our ever-rising American standard of living. We have only what we produce. To be sure, we get practically all our advances in production from incentive-inspired and owner-provided technological improvements that lengthen man's arms. But to the exact degree that we let "make-believe" work limit the amount of production otherwise available from our national work force, just to that degree do the rest of us needlessly pay, feed, and encourage more nonproducers, thus lowering the standard of living otherwise available to all. This is obviously unfair to the people who do work. "Featherbedding" is morally bad and economically feeble-minded.

We have had considerable experience with the types of "featherbedding" practice which are not presently covered by the law, unless coupled with an illegal secondary boycott (and the difficulties of proof of threatened boycott are almost insurmountable). Here is just one example which occurred right here in Washington last year:

During 1948, the medical clinic of Drs. Croover, Christie, and Merritt, radiologists, purchased X-ray equipment for installation in their new additional quarters in the Columbia Medical Building Annex, Washington, D. C.

This equipment was purchased by them for a price which included installation. Other building renovations were being made at the time installation of the X-ray equipment was going on, and the union threatened to boycott and strike the entire job unless permitted to do the work of also installing the X-ray equipment. Because of pressure exerted on the company by the customer, to avoid a serious delay in installation and a boycott of the entire renovation job, and their willingness to assume the extra cost, the job was done by the union.

This procedure cost the purchasers approximately $4,000 more than they had contracted to pay. It was agreed in the purchase contract that in the event the manufacturer's personnel was not allowed to make the installation, the purchasers would defray the costs of hiring outside labor.

I urge you to permit me later to describe our Sherman Creek turbine case, for instance, and many others. Meanwhile I urge that the present law be strengthened to cover needless work as well as work not performed. Again, the reason for Federal legislation is to be found in the power of the unions present in such situations.

5. National emergency strikes.—We believe the right to strike must be preserved except where the consequences of a strike to the many are out of all proportion to the issues involved for the few. National paralysis just ought not to be available as an economic instrument to any selfish individual group. We simply must calmly devise a means, or earnestly learn how, to settle these things equitably in the interests of both parties to the dispute while at the same time safeguarding the interest of the whole public. The entire Nation—innocent bystander to the dispute—suffers almost at once from these national paralysis strikes.

Public opinion and requests by the President have proved ineffective in the past to protect the public against a powerful union organization or official in a recalcitrant mood. And I can't imagine a Presidential proclamation doing any good with the characters involved when the chips are down. I can't imagine the President thinks so, either, in view of his resort on at least six occasions to the injunctive remedy in the present law, and his earlier appeal to Congress for authority to draft the railway workers.

We are against compulsory settlement, but we do urge that the President continue to have available some positive statutory power to delay such a strike while he and the Congress and others involved, as well as the public, are making up their minds what must be done to be fair to the parties and the public.

In this connection, I cannot understand why various people in and out of unions and Government should any longer feel a peculiar reluctance about having the injunction processes of the law apply equally to any needed situation in union affairs, just as it applies to all other private and public institutions and individuals. To be sure, the very subject has come over the years to be a great emotional rallying point and a political hot potato. But we are all much more mature now in union-management affairs. The courts and public officials can certainly not be regarded as having anything but the most tolerant, and even indulgent, attitude toward the practices of union officials in organizing and striking.

The injunction is an honorable device for use in the public interest. Unions have become the most influential and powerful political and economic factors in community after community as well as in the Nation. Why must anyone feel that the public must be deprived of the availability of this demonstrably needed protection, when businessess and businessmen, governments and government officials—even Cabinet members—are subject to being enjoined by the people's courts?

If we try now to sidestep this issue on emotional grounds in both national and jurisdictional strikes, are we not confessing that already the power of union officials has grown to the point where we are too afraid of it even to act like we think there is any conceivable instance where this power may, or does, need to to be questioned in the public interest?

6. Mass picketing and violence.—General Electric is very proud of its comparatively peaceful union-relations history. However, even our employees have had some mass-picketing troubles:

At Schenectady in 1946 our research scientists, our salaried engineers and pay-roll people—innocent bystanders, not members of the union on strike and not even included in the bargaining unit—were forcibly prevented by mass picketing and violence from engaging in activities of immediate and long-range benefits to the employees. This was in defiance of a court order which the Schenectady police force said they could not enforce.

At Lexington, Ky., in 1948, there was abusive mass picketing of the plant and employees' homes, dousing with skunk oil, smashed cars, cut telephone wires, acid shot at girl employees, tear gas thrown in a crowded bus, roughing up by imported pickets—all in an attempt to gain union recognition by force instead of through an NLRB election. Here, as in the New York and New Jersey truck cases and countless others, we witness threats of violence from self-appointed private union "police" who, in full view of and in defiance of uniformed public police, assert their superpower over city, State, and Nation, as well as just over management and employees.

Since the Federal Government has aided the growth of these unions to powerful giant size, and since local police are proving less and less able to cope with the situations described, the Federal law should provide employees, management, and public with relief from violence and coercive mass picketing.

7. Communism.—Not only as a private employer, but as a contractor for the Atomic Energy Commission, we believe the labor law should require affidavits of both company and union officials and bargaining representatives that they do not belong to the Communist Party or to any party which plans, teaches, or advocates the use of force or violence to overthrow the Government of the United States. The affidavit is no cure in itself, but we believe we see at various places some examples of members in unions having been aided by the non-Communist affidavti requirement in making progress toward better local and top leadership in their unions.

Certainly the very wonder by union members at some officials' refusal to sign has led to a great deal of new local consideration of the national problem. In a great many cases they have elected new officers where the determining factor seemed to be the belief of the membership that it would be getting new leadership with less Communist taint or certainty with less public suspicion of that taint. There have been published reports, I believe, of such instances at Schenectady; Fort Wayne; Pittsfield; Dayton; Pittsburgh; Lima, Ohio; Fairmount, W. Va.; to mention only a very few.

I strongly urge that the non-Communist affidavit requirement be extended to all union officials from top officers to stewards and, in order to prevent circumvention, to all paid representatives of the unions, and likewise to all corporate officials and company representatives who meet them in bargaining. The employer should be expressly excused from dealing with the representatives of a union which has not met these non-Communist affidavit requirements, as well as those about filing of financial and other information.

8. Free speech.—We believe the provision of the present act is wise and should be retained. Prior to the present law an employer's right to free speech was severely curtailed by the way the Board interpreted the former law. Even though no threats of reprisal or promises of benefits were held out, an employer's expression of views with regard to the union was so often held to be a violation of the law that most employers were afraid to open their mouths at all.

Consequently, in many cases the unions felt free to abuse their own privilege of free speech without any fear of having their story contradicted by the employer. Of course, neither side should be permitted to make unfair promises of benefits or threats of reprisals. But the employee is entitled to hear both sides speak up in order that he may freely judge and exercise an informed choice.

You are familiar with the doubts cast on this subject by some NLRB interpretations under the Wagner Act. It took considerable courage for us, in some situations where our employees were being misinformed, to speak up. But we simply felt we would be a party to this deception if, knowing the truth, we did not tell it to our employees.

But, under the pressure of union threats and of the one-sided administration of the one-sided Wagner Act, most employers were very understandably persuaded as to the prudence of keeping still. In certain organizing campaigns we have had our employees report to us that union organizers had threatened them with the choice of either "paying a moderate initiation fee now or, if they didn't join now, a very large initiation fee later," promising the employees that all of them would be "forced to join the union" as soon as the organizing campaign was completed. We have also experienced the wildest form of misstatements being made in the course of a union organizing campaign and a most unwarranted type of promise as to benefits the union was going to obtain. We think an employer should feel perfectly free to speak without fear of having an unfair labor practice lodged against him so long as he doesn't step over the bounds of propriety.

Free speech doesn't have to be legislated out of existence. It can be "intimated" or "hinted" or "indicated" or "nudged" out of existence by a hostile Government administration. To a large extent this had already happened here in America so far as the employer speaking up in union matters was concerned.

Our citizens need positive declaration by Government in the form of a clear law that the right of free speech applies in the management-union relations field as elsewhere.

And incidentally, if employers could be encouraged to speak up as to what they believe to be the truth not only in organization matters but on all the issues and on the basic economics back of the issues, I sincerely believe the discussion thereby generated would fast lead not only to a more sober understanding of the facts but to a growing area of voluntary agreement. Also, I believe it would bring genuine comfort to many sincere union leaders and many leaders in public life. Too often now both find themselves doing what they really believe to be unsound just because they feel the folks down the line or back home would not understand if the sound things were done.

9. Mutual responsibility of employers and unions.—Since enactment of the present law, we feel we have experienced a noticeable change in the sense of genuine responsibility exhibited by many of the forty-odd unions with which General Electric has contracts. This change is evident both at the bargaining table and in subsequent conduct. We believe this new sense of responsibility derives from at least four features of the present law:

(1) Both sides are required to bargain in good faith.

(2) Either side can file unfair labor practice charges with the NLRB in the case of abuse.

(3) Both can sue or be sued in Federal court for breach of contract obligations.

(4) Both are now responsible under normal rules of agency for the acts of their agents.

We have had numerous instances of contract violations which have been quickly and fairly settled in good faith by union leaders under the influence of the present law. Neither side, of course, wants to resort to legal weapons in their relations to each other, but it is surprising how the availability of adequate remedies under a fair law helps people act sensibly in the labor field as in the commercial and other fields. We urge the retention of the present provisions in any new law.

10. Political contributions.—Any restrictions on political contributions, we believe, should apply equally to employers and unions. Employers and unions alike should be forbidden to use other than voluntary means to raise money for political purposes.

The present law, of course, permits unions to solicit voluntary contributions through subsidiary union organizations. We think this is perfectly proper since an individual making such a contribution is reasonably sure that this money will be used in accordance with his own personal political wishes. The present law prohibits direct contributions out of the union treasury which would, of course, constitute an assessment upon each and every member of the union regardless of his political beliefs and of his personal desire or lack of it to contribute to a political campaign.

11. Separation of functions of advocate and judge.—The Department of Labor—in theory and practice—is the advocate of the unions. The law creating the Department required that. In practice it was found not the proper home for the Conciliation Service. To be sure a given individual as Secretary of Labor or as head of the Conciliation Service could make a difference in degree either way. But it would be only in degree. Human nature dictates that an impartial tribunal cannot exist as the agent of an interested party. Although we have had no occasion to call on the Conciliation Service, we believe strongly it should retain independent status.

Likewise, we belive the counsel and the Board should be kept separate—and for the same reasons. Here again we believe it goes against all human experience to try to have an interested advocate be at the same time an impartial judge.

12. Exemption of supervisors.—As representatives of management responsible for production and shop discipline, supervisory employees who join a union are put in the untenable position of attempting to serve two masters.

Supervisors are management. If they are unionized their unions will—as shown in the congressional hearings conducted a couple of years ago and again at the recent Senate hearings—become associated with, collaborate with, and even be dominated by, the unions representing the working force that they are supposed to lead and manage. The spirit of management goes, and the foremen become unable to properly guide the employees in the latter's own interest. The foremen tend to become simply another group of workers, instead of a true part of management. The union may discipline, fine, suspend, expel—and under the old form of union shop—actually fire these men from their jobs for merely doing their work properly and carrying out the orders issued to them by the employer.

In the debates at the time that the present law was adopted, the situation was aptly summarized as follows:

"* * * When the foremen unionize, even in a union that claims to be independent of the union of the rank and file, they are subject to influence and control by the rank and file union, and, instead of their bossing the rank and file, the rank and file bosses them. The evidence shows that rank and file unions have done much of the actual organizing of foremen, even when the foremen's union professes to be 'independent.' Without any question, this is why the unions seek to organize the foremen.

* * * * * *

"The evidence further shows that rank-and-file unions tell the foremen's union when the foremen may strike and when they may not, what duties the foremen may do and what ones they may not, what plants the foremen's union may organize and what ones it may not. It shows that rank-and-file unions have helped foremen's unions, not for the benefit of the foremen, but for the benefit of the rank and file, at the expense of the foremen's fidelity in doing his duties."

Foremen and other supervisors—who are all a vital part of management—cannot fairly do their job if they are subject to the crossfire pressures of conflicting interests. I think the testimony before this committee 2 years ago amply bears this out. I urge that the present provisions as to bargaining with supervisory unions be retained in the law.

Mr. BAILEY. The Chair wishes to thank you for your patience.

Mr. WILSON. Thank you for your courtesy.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, I have already offered for the record Mr. Wilson's and Mr. Boulware's answer to my letter, and I should like also to state for the record that of the first 91 questionnaires that I received from Mr. Fulton Lewis' poll, there were 70 that voted "No" to question 14 and 21 that voted "Yes," the question being translated as follows, that 70 opposed the laws that condemned violence, just as a matter of clarity, Mr. Chairman, of the radio poll.

Mr. BAILEY. The members of the committee will please take their briefs with them this evening, for tomorrow's meeting, which will be called for 10 o'clock, and will be in the regular committee meeting room, 429.

The committee is now adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

(Whereupon, at 12:15 a. m., the subcommittee adjourned until 10 a. m. Wednesday, March 16, 1949.)

APPENDIX

The statements referred to by Mr. Bailey and Mr. Kelley are as follows:

STATEMENT OF WILLIAM T. GOSSETT, VICE PRESIDENT AND GENERAL COUNSEL OF FORD MOTOR CO.

My name is William T. Gossett. I am vice president and general counsel of Ford Motor Co., Dearborn, Mich.

The single question I would like to discuss today is whether the Federal Government should impose upon management mandatory collective bargaining with unions of supervisory employees.

It is our conviction that it should not.

Ford Motor Co. not only has explored thoroughly the pros and cons of the unionization of foremen, it has submitted the idea to exhaustive test. The Foreman's Association of America was founded at Ford in 1941. We were the first company to give this union formal recognition, and we bargained with it over a longer period of time than any other company.

Our conviction, therefore, is not based on speculation or theory; it is founded on years of experience—virtually all of it unhappy—with an organization of supervisory workers.

The problem of supervisory unions is often characterized as a "labor" problem. This is a fundamental error of great importance. The question involved is, rather, the ability of management to perform its functions.

I am here, therefore, not as a lawyer to comment on the legal aspects of the matter, but as a spokesman for the management of Ford Motor Co. to discuss, as a problem in management, our long experience with a foremen's union.

Throughout this statement I shall be discussing the foremen at Ford solely from the standpoint of our relations with them as union men. I want to make it clear that my remarks are in no way intended to reflect on their individual ability or loyalty. The foremen at Ford are capable, experienced, and loyal. They have been with the company an average of almost 21 years.

I was not with Ford during all of the period involved. This is perhaps an advantage, because I have been able to review the record with considerably more objectivity than might otherwise be the case.

This review discloses the following facts:

In November 1941, when Ford was first asked to consider this question, the company, in common with most of American industry, was rapidly expanding its labor force to meet national defense requirements. Many rank-and-file employees were suddenly promoted to foreman status. The company in mid-1941 had signed its first contract with UAW-CIO. At the same time, the demands of the national emergency for all-out efficient production threw into bold relief management problems, many of them at the foreman level.

Therefore, when, late in 1941, the Foreman's Association asked the company to negotiate, it found an audience at Ford which was at least willing to listen to argument. The need was for a management team which could most efficiently tackle the big jobs ahead. When the Foreman's Association represented that it would help to solve this problem, and thus to weld the team together by quickly bringing foremen closer to the rest of the management group, the company decided to give it a trial. Thus, the decision was made to consult with the association. At that time Ford, of course, was under no compulsion to do so.

I shall not attempt here to review in detail the first few years of this relationship. It is sufficient to note that it was unsatisfactory and disappointing to both sides.

87579—49——58

By November 1943, when our original agreement expired, the company had been completely disillusioned. None of the results predicted by officials of the association had come to pass. The settlement of one difficulty seemed to breed others in rapid succession. Nevertheless, the company once again yielded to the association's argument that the failures that had occurred were because the agreement did not go far enough; that establishment of a contract setting up detailed employment rules and a full-scale grievance procedure would be insurance not only against walk outs and similar unpleasant incidents, but also would produce a more satisfactory relationship with the management of the company.

Hopefully, Ford Motor Co. gave way to these arguments, and took a very long stride in May of 1944. It granted to the Foreman's Association a contract, containing virtually every demand made by the association. (A year later the company went even further; it agreed to the appointment of an umpire for final decision on grievances. This was in deference to the association's plea that the grievance procedure needed this one final step.)

Here was the situation when Ford took this revolutionary action:

(a) The company was under no obligation to bargain with the foremen's union. The Maryland Drydock decision was in effect, and foremen's unions had not yet been recognized under the Wagner Act.

(b) The association had failed to gain bargaining recognition in any company in the automobile business, and its strikes had been abortive.

(c) Nevertheless, since the association's efforts had at intervals disrupted war production in some of our plants and at 14 other major Detroit war plants, Ford would have taken almost any constructive action which promised sustained output. The association assured us that a full contractual relationship would be accompanied by an end to the harassing interruptions to our war work.

(d) Another important consideration was the reiterated argument of association representatives that the organization could, with such a contract, serve as a valuable "assistant to management" and effect a better relationship among all groups in management.

Thus, Ford was led to take the final step. It granted to the association—without even the formality of a poll of foremen—recognition as bargaining agent.

Company officials had no mental reservations about their determination to make this agreement succeed. Accordingly, Ford's agreement with the association was complete and all-inclusive. A full-fledged grievance procedure, including the joint retention of an impartial umpire, was expected to cut off threats of strikes or strikes.

But there were still strikes and threats of strikes. There was a continuing series of harassing incidents in the plants. More importantly, the association relentlessly continued its efforts to drive a wedge between our foremen and the other members of our management team.

Quite simply, the company learned the hardest possible way that this relationship in which it had placed so much hope turned out to be incapable of doing the job. It was a failure, and proved the validity of the two historic objections to such relationships often voiced by those who have studied the supervisory union question. The first of these is:

SUPERVISORY UNIONS TEND TO DESTROY EFFECTIVE MANAGEMENT

The advocates of enforced recognition of supervisory unions concede that management is entitled to loyal representation, unsullied by conflicting interest. They concede that the vice presidents and plant managers alone cannot run the plants; that they must have reliable representatives to supervise the rank and file. They contend, however, that membership in a union does not jeopardize such loyalty. We know from rude experience that this is not true; we know that the pressures inherent in collective bargaining with a supervisory union inevitably lead to divided allegiance, irresponsibility, lowered morale, and a decrease in managerial efficiency.

We have learned that there is no such thing, for example, as a management union which is truly independent of organized rank-and-file workers in the same plant. From the early days of Ford's relationship with the Foreman's Association it was clear that the organization was beholden to the UAW-CIO, and that it regarded this as a natural and inevitable linking of arms.

In May, 1943, Mr. Robert Keys, then president of the foremen's group, conferred with R. J. Thomas, then president of UAW-CIO. Thomas assured Keys that in the event a strike was called by the Foreman's Association, the association could expect the following instructions from the UAW-CIO to its membership: UAW-CIO members would continue working, would not recognize foremen's picket lines, but would not take the jobs of any foremen while these foremen were out on strike.

The UAW respected this pledge during every walk-out of foremen from that time on, and in some cases UAW-CIO members went further and refused to cross Foreman's Association picket lines. Indeed, in 1947, we find the president of the association pleading with the UAW-CIO to join the association's strike against Ford.

The association was more than aware that its chance for success and survival rested to a very large extent on cooperation from the rank-and-file union. A natural result was a quick identification of interests, followed by a relaxation of discipline. The danger inherent in such reciprocal understandings was noted by a War Labor Board panel of public representatives in 1944:

"The Foreman's Association of America has asserted its determination to remain independent of rank-and-file organizations. The panel regards this intention of the Foreman's Association as important because the panel does not believe that it is appropriate for supervisors, who are responsible for discipline, assignment of work, rate adjustments and promotions, who represent the employers in handling the grievances of rank-and-file workers, and who generally represent higher management in dealing with the rank-and-file workers, to be subject to discipline by a union which is controlled directly or indirectly by the men whom they supervise. The effectiveness of management requires that it have its own uncontrolled agents to represent it in dealing with the rank and file, just as the rank and file are entitled to have their own uncontrolled representatives for dealing with higher management."

There are all too many examples in Ford files of this inevitable conflict of loyalties. The association proclaimed many times that the organization was "part of the labor movement as a whole," and so it was inescapable that these conflicts should in almost every case find the association pulling the foremen toward the point of view of the rank-and-file union. Here is one such example:

In September 1946 a union foreman, who was shorthanded, called on workers under him to vary their usual assignments for a short time. They refused, and the union foreman dropped the matter. Production began to lag, and a second foreman of higher rank stepped in and took disciplinary action. One of the disciplined workers, in the mistaken belief that the union foreman had taken this action, complained that it was not worthy of a "good union man." This foreman considered the workman's charge so serious that he went to the labor relations office to ask that his "name be cleared" of this charge. Instead, the company demoted him for placing union considerations before his job of leading the men under him. The Foreman's Association not only protested, but carried its protest through the entire grievance procedure to the impartial umpire.

This is a significant example because it epitomizes the habitual attitude of the association. The company, as a matter of policy, was trying then—as it is now—to place more and more responsibility upon its foremen; and the answer from the Foreman's Association was to reject and actively to oppose this policy.

The association even went so far on several occasions as to encourage and support foremen in countermanding company orders. On one occasion, in 1946, the association official working in our tool and die plant was told by a superior to determine whether groups of employes were making a practice of loafing away from their jobs in violation of rules. This association official instructed his fellow foremen not to comply with such an order, and refused to do so himself. The association threatened a strike when the company took disciplinary action.

In April 1947, the UAW-CIO ordered its members to leave their jobs to attend a mass labor rally in downtown Detroit. The company felt this to be a direct violation of the UAW-Ford contract and instructed foremen to notify the men accordingly. The president of the Ford chapter of the association countermanded these instructions. The association not only encouraged this unauthorized walk-out, but, in violation of its own contract, joined it. Over one thousand of our foremen left their posts on this occasion. In doing so they not only exposed company property to damage, but, more importantly, placed a large number of unsupervised workers in unwarranted danger of physical injury.

In a bulletin to members on this occasion, the association declared again that they were "definitely part of the labor movement as a whole," and candidly told association members to "line up behind (UAW-CIO) local 600" at the rally.

In June of 1945, UAW-CIO members at our Highland Park plant were engaged in an unauthorized work stoppage in violation of contract. During the walk-out, certain UAW committeemen complained to the Foreman's Association representative that some of the foremen who remained on the job were working. Our agreement with the association recognized their obligation to work, but the association representative nevertheless went into the department and advised the foremen to stop working. As a result the department had to be shut down.

In Ford plants, UAW-CIO committeemen are paid by the company for time spent in handling the shop problems of their constituents. The UAW contract provides that committeemen shall engage in no other activity, and the National Labor Relations Act forbids our paying union representatives for time spent on strictly union business. The company had a similar arrangement with the Foreman's Association. There is a strong tendency among union committeemen to engage in prohibited union activities on company time, and among unions to condone these activities. The company necessarily must rely upon its foremen to prevent such abuses.

In August of 1946, representatives of the Foreman's Association were themselves spending such a large proportion of company time in collecting union dues and soliciting membership that the company complained to the president of the Ford chapter of the association. He not only refused to correct the situation, but said that association committeemen would continue this activity. Obviously when Foreman's Association committeemen themselves engage in such abuses, and in doing so are supported by the association itself, they are not inclined, nor are they in a position, to protect the company against similar abuses by rank-and-file union representatives.

Although it has its ethical aspects, the problem with which we are concerned is a most practical one. Good relationships between management and rank-and-file workers require fair but firm supervision and genuine respect by workers for their obligations to management.

The illustrations I have given show the basic contradiction between the foreman as a supervisor and the foreman as a good member of his union.

In passing, I would like to point out that during the first years of our experience with the association we also lost a record number of man-days through unauthorized walk-outs and strikes on the part of the rank-and-file. This could be coincidental; but we are convinced that there is more to it than that. There is considerable evidence that the lack of leadership and divided loyalties resulting from association activities were reflected in the irresponsible attitudes of the men whom they were expected to dissuade from such actions as illegal strikes.

I would like to turn now to the second major objection to supervisory unions which was so completely borne out in our experience with the Foreman's Association. The objection can be stated this way.

SUPERVISORY UNIONS FORECLOSE MERIT AND INITIATIVE BY THEIR RIGID INSISTENCE ON SENIORITY IN DETERMINING PROMOTIONS AND DEMOTIONS

This question also was emphasized in the War Labor Board panel report mentioned above:

"The panel, however, believes that management should be left free to assess the relative weights to be accorded seniority, merit, and present or potential ability when lay-offs, demotions, and transfers of foremen are made."

In respect to promotions, the panel noted that its reasons for the foregoing conclusion "apply even more forcibly."

"The attachment of excessive weight to seniority in promotions would go far to reduce the drive to excel among the foremen and would limit the opportunity of men to forge ahead. Its effect upon the quality of management and upon the enterprise and efficiency of American industry would be unfortunate, if not disastrous. The effect on the rank-and-file would also be undesirable."

At Ford, seniority is always accorded great weight by management, but to make it conclusive would be disastrous. The association, at our insistence, agreed to a provision in the 1944 contract to the effect that seniority would prevail only in cases of equal ability. The association made frequent public reference to this provision as proof of its position that merit should prevail in the promotion or demotion of supervisors. But quite a different attitude was displayed when questions of promotion or demotion actually arose. The contract language meant very little in actual practice.

The association habitually challenged promotions or demotions made on the basis of merit. Forty percent of all grievances filed by the association were on this issue alone, and many of them were carried through all stages of the grievance procedure to the umpire. The association thus clogged the grievance procedure to assert this one point.

Simply stated, ability and seniority were almost always held to be synonymous by the association.

Here are a few excerpts from typical grievances filed by the association during this period:

"* * * Since the company has accepted Mr. Maitland's services as being satisfactory, making no effort at any time to show him as lacking ability, seniority should be the governing factor in the demotion."

"Consideration of reinstatement of foremen from the availability list who were demoted by reason of a reduction in force must be based on seniority alone."

"It is the association's contention that ability in the instant case is not a factor since the question of Mr. Moore's lack of it had never been discussed."

"* * * Since Mr. Pendracke has the greater length of service as a foreman in the department and since his removal as a foreman was not because of lack of ability or inefficiency the company must reinstate him as per contractual obligation before Mr. Matievich."

In another case the association argued as usual that the aggrieved employee had been on the job for many years, and consequently must be presumed to have the required ability, so that his seniority entitled him to the position. It went on to say: "The association's position in the instant case is amply supported by precedent since an umpire ruling in a parallel case between the Ford Motor Co. and the CIO resulted in complete vindication of the union's argument. So much so, in fact, that the new contract between the company and the CIO incorporates a clause stipulating that in case of a reduction in force, demotions or lay-offs will be made on a strict seniority basis. The association sees no reason why this should not also apply where foremen are concerned."

Indeed, the continuous opposition of the association to promotions and demotions, except upon a strict seniority basis, led most higher supervisors to follow seniority save in the most extreme cases, in order to avoid friction and to "get along" with the association.

This insistence on the mechanical application of seniority was and is repugnant to all concepts of good management. It is a concrete denial of ability and of the natural urge of men to better themselves. Two members of the Ford policy committee, both vice presidents, are primarily responsible for production. Both men came fro mthe ranks of foremen. Almost all of their subordinates followed the same route to their present positions. The future, not only of Ford, but of other companies depends upon the ability of management to recognize and preserve ability and reward merit quickly.

If a rigid rule of seniority is to prevail, this country might easily be deprived of the leadership and ability of men like William Knudsen, Walter P. Chrysler, Walter Gifford and many others who have risen through the ranks.

The test constantly imposed upon American management is one of accountability: Accountability for good products, reasonable prices, and fair and equitable treatment of its employees and of all other groups with whom it deals.

When a foremen's organization must be recognized, management is compelled to share its judgment in selecting the persons who actually run its plants and deal with its employees. This does not, however, relieve management from its complete accountability, which in the nature of things cannot be shared. The panel report referred to above deals cogently with this issue:

"The panel believes that great weight should be attached to the dependence of higher management on the competency of foremen. When the managers of an enterprise select foremen to whom they delegate authority and responsibility, they are not relieved of accountability for results. They are expected to pick competent men on whose good judgment and reliability the superior can depend. The panel calls attention to the fact that foremanships are to a considerable extent the seedbed for higher management. Furthermore the men who hold high positions in management are chosen in part for their skill in selecting and developing subordinates into an effective organization. They should be free within broad and reasonable limits to exercise these functions and to select and develop men for greater responsibilities."

The record is clear that the association strongly opposed any action by the company to improve the status or enhance the dignity of foremen, or to improve their ability to perform their jobs, except in collaboration with, and with the prior approval of, the association. Association officials opposed any system of merit increases, characterizing those who would receive them as "red apple boys" and "company men." The theme of the association was that foremen were not, and would never be, a part of management; that they would always be "just foremen."

Meanwhile, Ford Motor Co. was making a genuine effort to work out successfully its agreement with the association. This assertion is supported by the testimony of Mr. Keys, president of the association, before the House and Senate Labor Committees in February 1947. He referred frequently to the "excellent relations" of his organization with Ford, and to the "efficient and cooperative manner in which the grievances of our members were handled by the Ford Motor Co.

But long prior to the expiration of the agreement, Ford realized the necessity of reviewing the whole situation in view of the highly unsatisfactory history of the past few years. This, and the militant stand taken by the association, led Ford, on April 8, 1947, to send a notice of its intention to terminate the agreement.

The association answered this notice by repeating its demand for the enlargement of its power to include bargaining representation for all foremen, including nonmembers of the organization; inclusion, without vote, of general foremen and even some classes of superintendents; check-off of association dues and assessments; increased emphasis on seniority; and a number of fringe issues.

It will be noted that each of these demands was designed primarily to strengthen the hand of the association, not primarily to assist or help the individual foreman.

Accompanying these demands was a notification by the association of its intention to strike unless they were met.

The situation facing us in the spring of 1947 thus had many aspects:

(a) We did not want a strike.

(b) Experience had convinced us that a management union such as the association was unworkable unless a wholly new concept of its role could be agreed upon.

(c) In the Packard case the National Labor Relations Board had held, contrary to its Maryland Drydock decision, that management was obligated under the Wagner Act to bargain with supervisory unions.

(d) Ford Motor Co., through Mr. Henry Ford II, its president, was committed to an active program for the constant betterment of personnel relations throughout the organization.

On balance, and despite our discouraging 3 years, we finally concluded that the objectives of all parties concerned might best be served by extension of the existing agreement for another 12 months, if the association would agree not to interfere with the company's plans to draw foremen closer to other groups of management.

A letter to that end was sent, on May 15, 1947, to the Foreman's Association. It suggested no changes in the terms of the contract, but proposed, in the following language, a definite statement of objectives for any future relationship between the association and the company:

"We want foremen drawn closer to other groups of management, not divorced from them. Once a man sets his foot on the management ladder at Ford Motor Co., we want him to know our policies and programs; we want him to share our responsibilities and privileges; we want no artificial barrier put in his way if his ambition is to climb up that ladder in accordance with the value of his abilities, energy, and experience.

"We expect your wholehearted endorsement of these basic objectives.

"We have already started and will continue to develop vigorously a carefully planned program to achieve those objectives. Since our organization is large, the job is not easy. We may make mistakes, but we propose to keep on trying because we intend to succeed.

"We will expect from you assurance that the association will not interfere with this program. In this we ask good faith. Obviously, tacit agreement accompanied by constant sniping at our efforts would make a difficult job next to impossible."

Our proposal was rejected. On May 21, 1947, our foremen went out on strike.

Although the difficulties ahead were only too apparent, we decided to continue with production. During the strike, production was maintained nearly at schedule. This was due partially to the refusal of many foremen and other supervisors to join the strike and to the fact that others quickly returned to work. This was a strong demonstration of the loyalty of many of our foremen to the management team of which they were a part.

Several significant events occurred during the strike. Officials of the FAA publicly ordered its picketing members to "get tough," and violence, threats, and intimidation ensued. On June 23 the Taft-Hartley Act was enacted. Although it was not to become effective for 60 days, there can be no doubt that the act's removal of the legal obligation to bargain with supervisory unions had a direct and immediate effect on the strike. The FAA continued to appeal to UAW-CIO to support the strike, and the rank-and-file union cooperated by following the UAW-CIO policy referred to above. On July 2 Mr. Richard Leonard, then international UAW-CIO representative for the Ford department, offered his services as mediator.

A back-to-work movement by striking foremen was well under way, however, by July 1; and on July 3 the company announced it was formally withdrawing its recognition of the Foreman's Association.

By July 6 the strike, to all intents and purposes, was over. There was a tendency, particularly in the press, to herald the return to work as a "company victory." Technically I suppose it can be described in that way. True, the association had failed to attain a single objective. But as we went through the laborious job of straightening out our plants and patching together our production team, it seemed anything but a victory.

Rather, it crystallized our views on our long and patient experimentation with the Foreman's Association:

First, the notion is false that supervisors can be dependent upon a union and still retain a primary loyalty to the job of supervising men and operations.

Second, union intervention at the supervisory level tends in practice to transmute individual responsibility—the essence of efficient management—into mass irresponsibility.

Third, the insistence of the Foreman's Association—or any other supervisory union—on promotion and demotion according to seniority alone is repugnant to our concept of good management, and always will be.

Fourth, the independence of a supervisory union in a highly organized mass production industry like the automobile business is a myth. There is an inevitable tendency in supervisory unions to ally their interests with the interests of unions of rank-and-file workers, a situation which is the antithesis of management responsibility.

Finally, the philosophy that guarantees the right of the rank-and-file to organize and choose their own representatives—with which we agree—cannot practically be applied to the supervisory group.

As a result of hard experience we reject the thesis that foremen can be "employees" for the purpose of mass bargaining with a company over wages and working conditions and yet be a part of management when supervising rank-and-file employees. A divided loyalty is as bad or worse than no loyalty at all.

I am aware that the records of this and other congressional committees contain a number of statements from officers of the Foreman's Association asserting the virtues and accomplishments of the organization, together with claims concerning the necessity for the right of foremen to organize. I am acquainted with most of these arguments.

Mr. Keys has declared, among other things, that FAA increased production, brought to a halt work stoppages by foremen, is "truly independent," and does not coordinate with rank-and-file unions. As I have indicated, our experience was decidedly otherwise.

Mr. Keys also asserted that supervisors are not actually part of management; and that foremen have no more voice or authority in today's large industries than the individual hourly rated employee. These statements are not true.

Since the conclusion of our relationship with the Foreman's Association, we have felt free to go forward with our program of placing more responsibility on and authority in our foremen. This program is, we believe, essential to the continued success of the enterprise. Accordingly, we have made each foreman the manager of his own department. He is now engaged exclusively in the performance of management functions. Attached is appendix A containing the sheets from our supervisor's manual on which are set forth in detail the responsibilities of each classification of Ford plant supervisors. The number of ranks of supervision have been reduced substantially. The power to discipline their employees, as contrasted with mere recommendations as to discipline, is being returned to them.

The status and benefits accruing to the formen's position have been increased commensurately. This has been a natural result of his increased authority and responsibility. For example, his salary status has been improved and he is eligible for merit increases; he takes part in periodic management meetings; he participates in a management development program; he assists in the development of and is kept informed concerning company policies and programs; and he is given assurance of proper recognition for increased efficiency, production and good personnel management.

This program could not have been adopted while our foremen were unionized. Its adoption not only would have been impracticable, it would have been fruitless as well.

In summary: At Ford Motor Co. we are proud of the reputation we have for fair, honest and progressive dealings with our employees. We want to continue to deserve that reputation. We know that we cannot work with a supervisory union toward that objective, and toward the much larger objective of sustained high production and low costs.

We at Ford have, since 1941, considered with earnestness and sincerity of purpose the question of supervisory unions; and we have tried to be fair in our appraisal. We have given the experiment a generous trial, and I think the record is one of patience and cooperation on our part. We feel that we are beyond theory or conjecture. The fact is that no amount of patience or effort can make an essentially unworkable arrangement work; and we know from actual experience that unionization of supervisors is unworkable.

We have, therefore, come to the conclusion that it would be most unwise to force supervisory unions upon American industry. The consequences, we firmly believe, would be serious and far-reaching. In the first place, hundreds of thousands of capable Americans might thus be deprived of their hope and right to move upward on the basis of merit to increasing responsibilities. But, more importantly, because it involves the American people as a whole, we think that production efficiency would be decreased. This would of course mean higher costs and prices and lower production. Thus, the result achieved would be directly contrary to that sought by Congress.

STATEMENT BY JOSEPH GRITTER, SECRETARY, CHRISTIAN LABOR ASSOCIATION OF THE UNITED STATES, GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

The Christian Labor Association of the U. S. A. is interested in the enactment of labor legislation that will give proper protection to the rights and welfare of all who will be affected by it: the workers, the employers, and the public. Whether that is effected through amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, or through repeal of that act and the enactment of a new law, makes very little difference to us, if only in the new legislation the rights of all are given adequate protection.

It is our contention that the constitutitonal rights of American workers have not up to this time been properly upheld. When we speak of "workers" we have in mind not only those who are organized in the larger labor movements but as well the millions who are organized in smaller independent organizations and those who have chosen not to join any organization. Although we believe that every worker ought to be organized in a union of his free choice, we also contend that neither the State, nor any employer, nor any organization, has the right to compel workers to be members of an organization, not of their free choice, under threat of loss of employment. Although it is true that up to this time neither the Federal Government nor the States have enacted legislation that would force workers to be members of an organization, it is undeniable that Government bears responsibility in such a matter if it enacts legislation under which such coercive practices are given legal sanction. Congress will do well to give serious thought to that fact when it considers a new labor law.

Both the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley Act theoretically provided protection to workers to be members of a union of their free choice. The latter act also pretends to protect the right of a worker not to join an organization if he so chooses. The expression of such rights is quite meaningless, however, if as a result of their exercise by a worker he suffers the loss of employment. When in a law certain "rights" are established, the exercise of them without suffering the loss of liberties and privileges accorded to others who exercise parallel rights should be fully protected.

Neither the Wagner Act nor the Taft-Hartley Act gave protection to workers who because of certain convictions chose to be members of an independent, minority organization. It is true that such workers can maintain such an organization if they succeed in gaining a majority in a bargaining unit. But, when they are not able to do so, when they are defeated in an election, the organization of their free choice is subject to annihilation, to a sudden death that means the end of all their efforts. And that is not all. The law allows the winning organization to secure a contract that will compel them to join the organization to which they were opposed in order to retain their employment. That is the crowning injustice. It is particularly grievous to those who cannot, with a clear conscience before God, join organizations which engage in practices that they cannot harmonize with their religious convictions. By becoming members of such organizations they become coresponsible for their activities. Because such organizations do not place themselves under divine law it is impossible for such Christian workers to exert sufficient influence upon them to remove the offending practices. Such workers are then placed in the position where they must choose between the loss of employment and denial of their Christian convictions. It is not a free choice. It must be made under severe pressure. If they choose to remain loyal to their Christian convictions they must suffer loss of employment, a most serious matter, especially when they are confronted with closed-shop and union-shop conditions on all sides. That such suffering because of loyalty to religious convictions should be allowed in our Nation is well-nigh unbelievable. But it is an undeniable fact.

A solution of this flagrant injustice has been sought by Christian workers through the establishment of their own organizations on a Christian basis. But, as stated before, such organizations are powerless unless they attain a majority in a bargaining unit. As a minority they are given no protection whatsoever against annihilation by the majority. Our present laws are most unfair to minorities. They promote a policy of eventual complete domination of all labor by a few large organizations of which workers will have to be members if they are going to live. That policy gives no consideration whatsoever to minority rights, nor to the principle of free choice without penalty, nor to protection of the right of citizens of this country to give expression to their religious convictions without loss of certain divinely given and constitutionally protected rights.

Both the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley Act, in their respective seventh sections, sanction either the closed shop or the union shop. In both it is evident also that those who wrote the legislation were aware of the inconsistency of such policies with the basic freedoms which the laws sought to protect. In both such policies are allowed as exceptions to the generally established rule of freedom of choice and nondiscrimination. They were inserted because of the extreme pressure exerted by certain groups that had gained great power through the exercise of such undemocratic and un-American policies. Through the exercise of the policy thus sanctioned as an exception such organizations have forced millions of workers to accept membership in them against their will, have crushed minority groups and completely ignored the objections of those who could not because of their convictions, religious or otherwise, join them. The exception to the rule of freedom of choice and of nondiscrimination, has become the rule. Even as an exception it should never have been allowed, but now it has become a rule of practice that is fast destroying our democratic way of life.

Under compulsory union membership a worker, who must remain in good standing in the union, loses his freedom of speech. It cannot be otherwise. Workers who know that their jobs depend upon being in the good graces of union officers cannot speak freely. So long as there is not freedom from fear there cannot be freedom of speech. There is fear in the minds of millions of workers in America which keeps them from giving expression to their convictions.

There can be no freedom of religious expression under compulsory membership in a union not of one's free choice. Religious liberty means more than the right to attend divine worship on the Sabbath. It means also that citizens of this land shall be allowed to live in harmony with their religious convictions without suffering the loss of other constitutional rights as a result. Granted that such exercise is limited to the extent that it must not interfere with the rights of others, that would not apply in the case of workers who do not interfere with the right of others to join a union of their free choice, and who ask only that they be accorded the same privilege or the right not to join any union if their religious convictions do not allow them to do so. Under our present laws such workers are thrown out of employment and consigned to starvation.

We believe that our views on compulsory union membership are supported by the decision of the United States Supreme Court, given on January 3, 1949, (Case Nos. 47 and 34) in answer to the appellants' contention, "The right of unions and union members to demand that no nonunion members work along with union members is indispensable to the right of self-organization and the association of workers into unions" the Court unanimously stated: "We deem it unnecessary to elaborate the numerous reasons for our rejection of this contention of the appellants. Nor need we appraise or analyze with particularity the rather startling ideas suggested to support some of the premises on which appellants' conclusions rest. There cannot be wrung from a constitutional right of workers to assemble to discuss improvement of their own working standards, a further constitutional right to drive from remunerative employment all other persons who will not or cannot, participate in union assemblies. [Italics added.] The constitutional right of workers to assemble, to discuss and formulate plans for furthering their own self-interests in jobs cannot be construed as a constitutional guaranty that none shall get and hold jobs except those who will join in the assembly or will agree to abide by the assembly's plans. For where conduct affects the interests of other individuals and the general public, the legality of that conduct must be measured by whether the conduct conforms to valid law, even though the conduct is engaged in pursuant to plans of an assembly."

Congress will do well to take note of those words. Compulsory union membership may be sanctioned again, but the test will be whether such a sanction will be held to be a valid law that does not conflict with the Constitution. The decision of the Court indicates that the right to enter upon closed- or union-shop contracts cannot be wrung from the Constitution.

The question of union security looms very large in any discussion of compulsory union membership. Leaders of the larger organizations have taken the position that in order to have union security labor organizations must have legal sanction to compel workers to join them. The theory of compulsory loyalty to an organization under threat of loss of personal security is the same theory which was brought into application in fascism and nazism, and is presently being enforced in communism. The fallacy of the theory has been exposed repeatedly, nevertheless men continue to cling to it. It is very surprising, however, that leaders of organizations is a democracy, and even members of the Government, accept that theory, in spite of the lessons of history.

The democratic theory of security, of an organization and a nation, is, that security can be attained and maintained only through adherence to basic conceptions of freedom and human rights. Security is only then strong when it is promoted and maintained by voluntary efforts of free men and women. Hence labor organization security that will be lasting can only be soundly established and maintained through voluntary membership of workers in unions of their free choice. That must mean that when workers join an organization in which they believe they will be protected in their right to remain members of such an organization if they so choose. And they will choose to do so if they through their own organization are given an opportunity to have a voice in the determination of their working conditions, even when they constitute a minority of the employees in a unit. We are confident that if minority groups are given representation on bargaining committees, so that not one union but in some cases several unions will jointly negotiate a contract with an employer, there will be organization security, without compulsion, not for one but for all the unions that are each representative of a substantial number of the employees.

Such a policy will eliminate the evils now connected with the closed and union shop. Men will be free again to speak, without fear. There will be a healthy rivalry among the unions. Violent disputes between organizations for exclusive representation power will be eliminated when it is known that the minority organization(s) need not be in fear of "sudden death" in case of failure to gain the majority of the votes in an election.

That kind of policy will mean a revision of the "exclusive representation" power established under both the Wagner and the Taft-Hartley Acts. So long as only one union can have bargaining power in a unit there will be violent battles for it, suppression of minorities, and various schemes for so-called union security, to be enjoyed by one union only, all of which in one way or another compels the individual to surrender divinely given rights in order to be able to gain his daily bread. Among all the evils of compulsory membership that of the subjugation of the individual to the organization, with the inevitable loss of his right to live in accordance with his conscientious convictions, is the most unjust.

We do not know of any other democrate nation in which labor unions are given such exclusive representation power, including the annihilation of all opposition. Nor do we know of any other democratic nation in which in an election organized groups can be placed over against one another with the winner having life-and-death power over the loser. It would be democratic either to have the employees vote for persons to represent them, contesting unions having the right to put up candidates, or to have proportionate representation on the basis of the number of votes cast for each.

In that direction lies the solution of the present unsatisfactory and unjust policies. Until such a solution is worked out, in harmony with the democratic principles to which this Nation is committed, there can be no solution in which the guaranteed personal liberties of the workers of this Nation are fully protected.

Such American policies will require revision of the main parts of the present law. Under such policies as we propose real union security can be attained. Instead of the closed shop or union shop the organized shop can be allowed, under which employees will be free to be members of the union of their free choice, and those who cannot because of conscientious convictions join any union will be allowed to continue in employment upon offering proof of acting in good faith in the matter.

We suggest the following amended reading of section 8 (a) (3) of the Taft-Hartley Act: "by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization: Provided, That nothing in this Act, or in any other statute of the United States, shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with one labor organization, or two or more labor organizations acting jointly, (not established, maintained or assisted by any action defined in section 8 (a) of this Act as an unfair labor practice) to require as a condition of employment membership in the bargaining organization, or in one of the organizations bargaining jointly, on or after the thirtieth day following the beginning of employment, or the effective date of such agreement; whichever is the later, if such organization is, or such organizations are, the representative of the employees as provided in section 9 (a) in the appropriate collective bargaining unit covered by such agreement when made, and Further provided, That the right of employees to become or remain members of a union of their free choice, without dual membership, shall be fully protected, and that no employee who has conscientious objections to membership in any union shall be discharged as a result of refusal to join if such employee offers proof of his good faith in the matter by agreeing to contribute an amount equal to the average monthly union dues to a civic welfare or charitable institution of his own free choice, or offers other proof of good faith."

Such a change will require that section 9 (a) of the Taft-Hartley Act be amended to read as follows: "An organization chosen for the purpose of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes of collective bargaining in respect to the rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment, if that organization is the only bona-fide labor organization that is representative of a substantial number of the employees in the unit. Provided: that if there are two or more labor organizations that are each representative of a substantial number of the employees in the unit, which together represent a majority of the employees, nothing in this Act shall prohibit such organizations from entering upon joint representation of the employees through proportionate representation on a bargaining committee, to be determined by the Board; nor shall anything in this Act prevent the Board from ordering such joint representation if in the opinion of the Board that will best protect the rights and interests of all the employees."

Our comment on other parts of the present law will be brief. If the basic policies we propose are put into effect, other parts of the law will have to be amended accordingly. We believe that most of the present restrictions on certain union practices ought to remain, especially those prohibiting the use of boycotts to compel employers to enter upon an agreement with a union that is not the freely chosen representative of his employes, and the various forms of the secondary boycott. Such practices should never be allowed in a democratic nation.

In regard to the free spech clause we suggest that these conditions be added: (1) that the employer may not offer definite advice concerning organization or related matter, and (2) that an employer may not require of his employes that they give a hearing to the expression of his views on company time. Such practices definitely have an effect that is unfair to the organization(s) seeking representation power.

In regard to the loss of employment status by an employee who strikes during a contract-negotiation period, we wish to state that we have no objection to such a penalty if the strike has not been provoked by the employer. However, if upon an investigation the Board finds that the strike was thus provoked, the employee should be entitled to reinstatement with reimbursement of lost pay.

In section 9 (3) there is a provision that "employees on strike who are not entitled to reinstatement shall not be eligible to vote." There again the question whether such employees are striking because of an unfair labor practice enters in. But regardless of that, so long as those out on strike are considered to be employees of the company they should be entitled to vote in any election affecting their employment. The provision would be more to the point if it read: "Former employees who have lost their employment status through a strike conducted contrary to the provisions of this act, and therefore not entitled to reinstatement, shall not be eligible to vote." The question of eligibility to vote hinges on the question whether or not the strike in process has been called in violation of the law. Employees should not lose the right to reinstatement merely because they are on strike for economic reasons. We take the position that employees who have given satisfactory service in a job have a moral claim to that job because of what they have contributed through their services as responsible human beings, even if they go out on strike to secure justice in the form of better returns for their labor. That is a sound Christian principle.

We believe that the Board should have the power to secure temporary restraining orders, or injunctions, through the courts, when there is an apparent violation of the law, such an order to be in force during the time that the Board completes its investigation. If the Board does not have such power an employer or a union, whoever may be engaging in such an apparent unfair practice, can during the time of the investigation, which usually takes several months, do inestimable and irreparable damage. There must be a means whereby immediate relief from an unlawful practice can be obtained.

We are opposed to a return of the United States Conciliation Service to the United States Department of Labor. Although we might stand to benefit by it, we cannot see that it would be advisable at the present time. The United States Department of Labor is very definitely committed to the promotion of the interests of labor unions. Placing the Conciliation Service under that Department would rightly or wrongly, create a prejudice against it on the part of the employers. Since the Conciliation Service must serve both employers and unions impartially it ought to be kept entirely free from any appearance that it might be under the influence of biased Labor Department officials.

Concerning the power now vested in the President to take effective action to stop the calling of a strike for a limited period of time, if such a strike should threaten the national welfare, we wish to go on record in favor of the retention of such power by the Chief Executive. In our complex economic system such power must be in hands of someone who is fully conscious of his responsibility for the welfare of all the people. There is proof at hand that the leaders of powerful organizations which control services that are essential to the national welfare, are not willing to accept responsibility commensurate with their power. It then becomes a question of whether an organized minority shall have the right to endanger the national welfare in the pursuit of its particular interests, or whether the chief representative of all the people shall have the power to stop such a minority from using that power during a limited period of time while the dispute is being impartially investigated. To ask the question is to answer it. In a choice between the exercise of such Executive power and the right of a minority to rule by terror, we choose the first.

The only step which we would have eliminated in the present Taft-Hartley law procedure, is the one which calls for the taking of a secret ballot by the NLRB after a board of inquiry has reported failure of a settlement to the President. The board must then go over the heads of the union leaders to take a ballot among the workers. That is interference with the democratic function of a labor organization which we cannot justify. We would suggest, instead, that the President within the 15 days after the end of the 60-day period of investigation, report to the Congress with definite recommendations for appropriate action. From the Christian viewpoint we cannot find anything wrong in the right of either an employer or an employee, or a union, having suffered injury through the unlawful acts of another party, to seek redress through the courts. Nor do we object to having unions held responsible for the acts of their agents. Our organizations accept the responsibility willingly, as a Christian moral obligation. Other organizations should be held equally responsible. It has a wholesome influence also upon organizations since it causes them to exercise greater care in the selection of officers and agents.

We favor restrictions upon the use of union funds for political purposes. As a matter of principle we submit that it is morally wrong for an organization to use funds, contributed by people of diverse political opinions and affiliations, for the purpose of supporting candidates of some definite political organization. It is much worse if organizations are allowed to assess members to raise funds for such purposes, especially under closed-shop conditions. Workers are then compelled to contribute to the election of men who may not be their personal choice, under threat of loss of their jobs. That, too, is an injustice that cannot be tolerated in a democratic nation.

From a practical viewpoint we believe that the exercise of strong political power by the labor movement constitutes a great danger to the movement itself. A strong labor-political pressure movement that will constantly try to control Congress, or dictate to it through intimidating pressure, will in the end destroy itself, either through reactionary legislation at some opportune moment or through the sheer weight of its political power. When such power is attained laws will have to be enacted that will assure to such a movement the retention of its power in the future. That will mean the destruction of civil liberty, and the end as well of a free labor movement.

These are, in brief, our views concerning labor legislation that will be just to all concerned, in harmony with the democratic principles upon which our Nation is based. Our suggestions may appear to be revolutionary in some respects. However, we are convinced that they point to the only direction in which a permanent solution of labor relationship problems is to be found. May God grant that you may see that as we do.

Statement of the General Federation of Women's Clubs Relative to Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947

The General Federation of Women's Clubs is an organization of approximately 5,000,000 women in the continental United States, with a voting membership of over 1,300,000. It is deeply interested in enactment of legislation which will be equally fair to labor and management and at the same time protect the public interest.

We wish, therefore, to call the attention of the House Committee on Education and Labor to the two following resolutions adopted by the general federation which set forth certain principles in regard to labor legislation. We earnestly hope these principles will not be overlooked in current proposals for repeal or revision of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947.

CLOSED SHOP

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, June 1947, declares its conviction that the right to work freely and at will is inherent in a democratic society and should be limited only by the constitutional rights of other equally free citizens; that the enforcement of the closed-shop system interferes with and nullifies this right; and that the closed shop, or any variation of the principle involved in the closed shop, should be banned by legal enactment.

LABOR, MANAGEMENT, AND THE PUBLIC

Whereas the failure to reach full agreement on the part of the President's Labor-Management Conference held in October and November 1945 has deeply alarmed the people of this country and has made both management and labor subject to condemnation for permitting selfishness of purpose to interfere with effective cooperation in the continuing national and world emergency, and

Whereas this Nation has been shocked and dismayed by the increase of strikes and riots occurring in key industries and in public services, and

Whereas serious delays in production have retarded successful conversion to peacetime living and the welfare of the Nation, the comfort, happiness, and security of its people are vitally affected, and

Whereas irresponsible leadership in either management or labor is a menace to a successful democratic society, therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, June 1946, declares its firm conviction:

(1) That the public as consumer of the products and services of industry is as greatly affected when management and labor disagree as is either of the parties to the disagreement and that protection of the public interest must be recognized as of paramount importance;

(2) That it is the inescapable duty and responsibility of both labor and management to exert every possible effort to the end that agreements which are binding upon both parties may be reached whereby an equable profit for industry is assured; a fair wage for labor is attained; and the vital interest of the consuming public is protected;

(3) That the Government of the United States through an extension of its Conciliation Service and a sound labor policy enacted into law should safeguard and preserve the rights and interests of management, labor, and the public, and prevent discriminatory practices;

(4) Although the right of labor to engage in collective bargaining in an effort to improve working conditions is uncontested, the right to strike while seeking such benefits does not include the right to injure persons, damage property, interefere with the general welfare or to jeopardize the public safety; therefore, Federal legislation should include provisions whereby civil and criminal responsibility and accountability be placed upon union officers and participiating union members during strikes, slow-downs or other union activity which shall be comparable to the responsibility and accountability of fellow citizens for their acts;

(5) That in a democracy equity demands comparable financial accountability to the public on the part of both business and labor unions and, therefore, legislation should include provisions whereby disclosure of receipts and expenditures of labor union funds be made mandatory to the same degree as those required of business.

STATEMENT BY EDMUND R. PURVES, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, ON BEHALF OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF ARCHITECTS, RELATIVE TO H. R. 2032

The American Institute of Architects is a national professional organization comprising 88 chapters and 7 State organizations in the United States and its possessions, and is the only organization representing the profession of architecture. As the spokesman for its approximately 8,000 members, it is considered competent to express the opinion of the profession as a whole.

Professional service is the only product of the architectural profession, taking the tangible form of drawings, plans, and specifications, and the average architect more often acts in the role of employer than employee. There are architects employed on a salary basis by corporations. There are architects directly in the employ of Federal, State, and municipal governments. It is possible that some of them may act through collective bargaining to establish salaries and working conditions. For that portion of the membership which is practicing the profession under principal architects or employers, the institute considers it fitting and proper that certain definitive terms affecting such professional employese be retained in whatever labor legislation is enacted by this session of Congress.

The phase of labor legislation which deals with and affects professional employees was embodied in section 2 (12) and section 9 (b) (1) of Public Law 101, Eightieth Congress, as follows:

"Section 2 (12), which is a definition of the term 'professional employee,' states that—

"'(12) The term "professional employee" means—

"'(a) any employe engaged in work (i) predominantly intellectual and varied in character as opposed to routine mental, manual, mechanical, or physical work; (ii) involving the consistent exercise of discretion and judgment in its performance; (iii) of such a character that the output produced or the result accomplished cannot be standardized in relation to a given period of time; (iv) requiring knowledge of an advanced type in a field of science or learning customarily acquired by a prolonged course of specialized intellectual instruction and study in an institution of higher learning or a hospital, as distinguished from a general academic education or from an apprenticeship or from training in the performance of routine mental, manual, or physical processes; or

"'(b) any employee, who (i) has completed the courses of specialized intellectual instruction and study described in clause (iv) of paragraph (a), and (ii) is performing related work under the supervision of a professional person to qualify himself to become a professional employee as defined in paragraph (a).

"Section 9 deals with 'representatives and elections.' In subparagraph (b) of that section it is stated that—

"'(b) The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to assure to employees the fullest freedom in exercising the rights guaranteed by this Act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or subdivision thereof: Provided, That the Board shall not (1) decide that any unit is appropriate for such purposes if such unit includes both professional employees and employees who are not professional employees unless a majority of such professional employees vote for inclusion in such unit.'"

These provisions virtually cover three points which the institute is concerned with; namely that—

(1) No employee in a professional office should be obliged, against his will, to join a labor organization as a condition of employment.

"(2) In the event that a collective bargaining group be formed in a professional office, it must not be forced to affiliate with a nonprofessional labor organization.

(3) The right of employees in any such unit to designate their own representatives must be respected and observed.

In recapitulation, let us observe that the architects recognize the right of any group to form units for the purpose of collective bargaining, but believe that as a supplement to this established right, membership in such unit should not be made a condition of employment. The architects believe that if a group of professional employees does organize for collective-bargaining purposes, their actions should not be directed or governed by nonprofessional people. The matter of affiliation should be left entirely with the professional architects involved.

The architects believe, further, that in the event a collective-bargaining unit is formed, it should have the sole right of designating its own representatives to take up matters with employers. This premise is based on the argument that persons outside of the architectural field are hardly qualified to act as representatives, since they would lack the knowledge and experience required to intelligently present the professional viewpoint in any collective-bargaining case.

We feel that because the practice of architecture is a career which requires a progressive and intellectual turn of mind, together with initiative, talent, and a natural inclination, developed by intensive traning, only those engaged in the pursuit of such a career should be vested with powers to determine policies affecting the welfare of the practitioners. It is inconceivable that anyone unfamiliar with the specialized training and experence necessary to the profession could satisfactorily represent any such group.

On perusal of Senate bill 249, we find no provision made for the protection of the collective-bargaining rights of professional employees as such, nor any definition of professional employees.

To our knowledge there has been no exception taken to the provision of sections 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) of the existing labor-management law and these sections have been successful in application.

We, therefore, respectfully request that your committee include in its recommendations to the Congress the retention and continuation of sections 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) contained in Public Law 101, Eightieth Congress.

Statement by E. W. Tinker, Executive Secretary, American Paper and Pulp Association

This statement is submitted in lieu of personal appearance by the American Paper and Pulp Association, 122 East Forty-second Street, New York City, on behalf of its members.

The American Paper and Pulp Association is the over-all national association of pulp and paper manufacturers. It represents the sixth largest industry in the United States, employing upward of 223,000 workers. The industry has a national production in excess of $5,250,000,000, and an invested capital of more than $4,500,000,000. Annual wages to the workers in the industry exceed $650,000,000, and the total tax bill approximates $400,000,000. In terms of providing tools for the workers, the investement per worker is conservatively calculated to amount to $20,700.

As the national association of the pulp and paper industry, we are naturally greatly concerned with the proposed changes in the National Labor Relations Act which are now being suggested in bills such as H. R. 2032 and S. 249.

The National Labor Relations Act, more commonly known as the Wagner Act, as originally enacted, was not, as claimed by its proponents, the Magna Carta of labor. It was not, because it was an unbalanced act. It was an act that gave to labor some long overdue privileges, but it did not give to employers corresponding procedural rights and protection against the unfairness of labor. The first amendment to the Constitution of the United States guarantees freedom of speech and of the press, but the interpretations of this fundamental right in cases involving the Wagner Act were such that the right of an employer to express his views on labor policy or problems was virtually emasculated. The enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, represented a conscientious effort on the part of the Congress to bring into balance the distorted relationship between employer, represented by management on the one hand, and employees by unions on the other hand. The Labor-Management Relations Act evolved after long and careful hearings before both Labor Committees and has been in effect only a relatively short period of time. The report of the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations, dated December 31, 1948, reveals that during the 14-month period following the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, as compared with the 14 months immediately preceding its effective date, there was a 42 percent reduction in the average number of stoppages in effect per month, a 44 percent reduction in average number of workers involved in stoppages in effect per month, a 37 percent reduction in the average number of man-days idle per month, a 37 percent reduction in total number of man-days idle, and a 41 percent reduction in percent of estimated working time idle per month. Moreover, during the period from August 1947 to September 1948, the average hourly earnings of industrial workers increased in monthly progression from $1.236 in August 1947 to $1.363 in September 1948. As pointed out by Prof. Edwin E. Witte, chairman of the department of economics at the University of Wisconsin, total union membership has increased since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act. The Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations states that the only unions that have failed to increase in membership since the passage of the act have been those of the left wing group, whose officers have not made the non-Communist affidavit.

During the past several decades, labor relations in the primary pulp and paper industry have not only been relatively stable, they have also been relatively harmonious. The industry has not been one marked by severe upheavals resulting from strikes or other instances of deep-rooted conflict between employer and employee. There has existed a unanimous desire on the part of management to meet honestly and deal honestly with the workers, whether collectively with those workers as represented by unions, or individually. This harmonious relationship which prevailed during the pre-Wagner Act days continued after the enactment of that law, and it continues to exist under the Labor-Management Relations Act. In view of these facts, we feel that our industry has been fortunately situated. It is a fair statement that the pulp and paper industry is not one whose experiences compelled the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act. Nevertheless, the enactment of that law serves to buttress the fair balance which has long existed between management and unions in the paper industry. It is the feeling of management representatives in the pulp and paper industry that where Government undertakes to regulate the relationship between employer and employee, or, for that matter, wherever the Government intervenes in a supervisory capacity, the approach must always be one of fairness to both parties or to whoever is involved. In order to command the respect of employer and employee, legislation must provide for rules of conduct applicable to both parties, to the end that responsibilities, as well as the rights of each party, will be amply provided for. Moreover, labor legislation enacted in the best interest of the general public, must not be patently one-sided in the sense of imposing obligations on only one party to the bargain, while conferring all of the benefits and rights on the other. This was the most severe criticism applied to the Wagner Act, and that is what the Taft-Hartley Act was enacted to correct. At the time of the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947, and at the present time, it could and may be fairly stated that many, if not most, labor unions have so grown in power as to present a far stronger economic force than that held by any employer.

The policy of the Wagner Act was supposedly to correct the inequality of bargaining power between employees who did not possess full freedom of association or actual liberty of contract, and employers organized in the corporate or other forms of ownership. But the unbalance of the premise was rectified in the statement of policy of the Taft-Hartley Act, which recognized that best industrial relations flourish only where "employers, employees, and labor organizations each recognize under the law one another's legitimate rights in their relations with each other, and above all, recognize under law that neither party has any right in its relations with any other to engage in acts or practices which jeopardize the public health, safety or interest." The American Paper and Pulp Association, representing, as it does, such a sizable segment of our national economy, and a segment which stands for harmonious and sound industrial relations, believes that it would be a cardinal error for the Congress even to consider the restoration of the unbalance which existed prior to August 23, 1947.

For the first time, under the Taft-Hartley Act, representatives of both employers and employees were and are required to bargain collectively. This mutual obligation to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, or in connection with the negotiation of a collective-bargaining agreement, is a bilateral requirement. Employers in the pulp and paper industry have always recognized the moral, as well as the legal, obligation to bargain collectively. This obligation should continue, and should not be changed to a unilateral requirement. Another proviso which should be continued is that the obligation of employer and the representatives of employees to bargain collectively does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession. As large consumers of bituminous and anthracite coal, and quite apart from the direct employer-employee rationship, this industry has a vital interest in the retention of this requirement of fair play. It is a well-known fact that the head of the United Mine Workers refused to state his demands to the coal operators in 1946 and refused to bargain collectively with representatives of 31 percent of the coal tonnage of the United States. An example of a direct benefit to a pulp and paper employer under this section is quoted from a letter received from one of our large producers:

"The International Typographical Union has always insisted on a standard form contract which was written primarily covering working conditions in working rooms of large newspapers and job shops. Much of the phraseology contained in the standard form contract did not apply to our operations, but if we had had any trouble, that same language could have had serious ramifications. Under Taft-Hartley we have been able to legally refuse to sign their standard form contract, with the result that we have not had to assume all of this potential liability."

Section 8 (b) (1) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, relating to restraint and coercion, has served to discourage mass picketing. While it is true, as stated previously, that there have been few strikes in our industry during the past several decades, nevertheless there was a strike during the past year, and the following information is a direct quote from the affected company: "Our plant was closed from August 20 to November 20 because of the strike. The strike was a breach of contract on the part of the union, and if it had not been possible for us to go into the court with a bill of equity, and after due hearings in the court obtain an order from the court restraining pickets from prohibiting free and easy ingress and egress at the plant, which permitted the majority of our people to return to work, our plant might still be on strike."

The right to work unmolested at a job of his own choice is a fundamental right of an American, except during times of national emergency or war. The presence of massed pickets in front of an entrance to his place of employment, thereby deterring by words or actions, or by both, his exercise of his inherent fundamental right to pursue the employment of his own choice, was not protected by the Wagner Act. On the contrary, any worker seeking to exercise his right to work was subject to beatings and other forms of physical compulsion. This condition was corrected by the Taft-Hartley Act. There was not, and is not now, any suggestion that workers on strike should not be permitted, in the exercise of the freedom of speech inherent to us all, to advertise reasonably the existence of a labor disagreement in an orderly and proper fashion. But mass picketing, physical violence, and other forms of illegal coercion and intimidation were not, are not, and should never be the proper medium of advertisement of such disagreements between employers and employees.

There seems to be scarcely any difference of opinion with respect to jurisdictional strikes. President Truman himself has proposed that this provision of the law be preserved. The record under the Labor-Management Relations Act clearly demonstrates that the present prohibition and method of handling has practically eliminated this type of work stoppage. Secondary boycotts are prohibited under some circumstances by the Labor-Management Relations Act. This prohibition should be continued, and in addition, strengthened. Secondary boycotts visit hardships on those not directly concerned with an industrial dispute, whether employer, employee, or the general public. They constitute a form of coercion which is contrary to the public interest and should not be tolerated.

Section 9 (h) of the L. M. R. A. requires the disavowal of Communist affiliation by union officials. This provision has been extremely valuable in encouraging patriotic American workers and labor leaders—and most workers and labor leaders are patriotic—to purge their unions of Communist infiltration and domination. This requirement of the law served the ultimate purpose of eliminating an avowed Communist from the employ of one of the leading paper manufacturers, and it has served to discredit other Communists who were seeking to infiltrate and corrupt the employees of this same employer. We respectfully recommend that section 9 (h) be amended to apply to all policy-making, governing, and negotiating officials of labor unions, both at local and international levels. In the interest of making the law bilateral, as previously recommended, we see no reason why non-Communist affidavits should not also be required from all corporate officers and management officials having responsibility for labor relations in companies seeking to use the processes of the National Labor Relations Board, and we accordingly further respectfully recommend the amendment of section 9 (h) to reflect such a requirement.

Section 301 of title III of the L. M. R. A. provides for suits by or against labor organizations, where a collective bargaining agreement has been violated. Recovery is limited to money judgments against the union organization as an entity, and its assets. Judgments may not be recovered and assessed against any individual member or his assets. One paper manufacturer writes:

"During the days of the Wagner Act, the unions were very agreeable to the incorporation of a no-strike clause in the contract, since there was no liability accruing to them if the contract was violated. After the contract was written, and any serious grievance developed, the union would oftentimes use the threat of quitting work, regardless of the fact that the contract contained a no-strike clause. With the passage of the Taft-Hartley law and the liability that goes along with any failure to fulfill contract provisions, the union attitude has changed, and we are no longer exposed to definite threats of not working. In addition, the unions themselves are more willing to submit their members to discipline in order to carry out the contract. This was definitely not true under the Wagner Act."

Another employer writes: "A union's obligation to bargain has fostered better union attitude and has facilitated collective bargaining."

This section of the law answers affirmatively the question, "should labor laws make it clear that a collective bargaining contract must be honored by both parties? Should each party have an equal right to sue the other for breaking the contract?" The affirmative answer by the L. M. R. A. to these fundamental questions is again another evidence of the bilateral equal responsibility approach of that law.

Traditionally, in the pulp and paper industry, foremen and other supervisory employees have regarded themselves, and have been regarded by their employers, as a part of management. Their duties and their privileges have traditionally reflected this relationship. Their services and salaries have been scaled to reflect properly the recognition of the responsibilities carried by each and every one of them. Under the Wagner Act there was a complete sense of demoralization of this essential adjunct of management. With the exclusion of supervisors from the ambit of the L. M. R. A., as the president of one paper company states, "This provision has protected our management family and improved relations with supervisors."

Another employer writes, "The recognition of the right to promote a man into the company's supervisory ranks has been most helpful indeed. Previously, because of contract seniority provisions, unions took the arbitrary stand that the man with the longest seniority, unless under unusual circumstances, would be entitled to the status of a foreman when such a vacancy existed. Further, after a union member had been promoted to the rank of foreman, the union in many instances would still claim jurisdiction after the former member had become a foreman."

In conclusion, we respectfully suggest that the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, be amended only in respect to section 9 (h), and that in the near future adequate hearings be conducted to afford an opportunity for those representatives of management, labor, and the public desiring to testify, to be heard concerning the operations of this fundamental law of our land.

STATEMENT BY RICHARD J. GRAY, PRESIDENT, BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION TRADES DEPARTMENT, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR, RELATIVE TO EFFECTS OF TAFT-HARTLEY ACT UPON ORGANIZED LABOR IN THE BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY

The building and construction industry was one of the first major industries in the United States to work out mutually satisfactory labor-management relations. Many of our agreements date back half a century. I can say without fear of contradiction that no industry has had more stable, cooperative labor-management relations than ours. We are accustomed to work with our employers in mutual respect and harmony, and to settling our differences around the conference table.

Into this situation was injected the Taft-Hartley Act, which threatens to undo everything we have built up with so much patience and care over the years. Before the full effect of this act upon building and construction trades unions can be understood, the nature of the industry itself must be considered. It is an industry made up of thousands of contractors, large and small, divided roughly into general and specialty contractors. Every contractor, whether general or specialty, hires his own labor. Few ever built up a permanent labor force, with the exception of clerical and supervisory employees, since this would mean carrying labor through the periods between jobs, which every contractor experiences. Labor is, therefore, recruited anew for each particular job. As a result, building and construction tradesmen move from job to job, sometimes working for 10 or 12 contractors in the course of a single year. Most construction projects last only a short time, and few of the trades work throughout the entire construction period on any project. Even the largest projects, such as dams or bridges, run for a few years only. In other words the continuity of employment, the stability of the relationship between an individual employer and his employees which are characteristic of most industries, are conspicuously lacking in the building and construction industry. Time, therefore, becomes relatively more important in any problem which arises.

Although building tradesmen are organized in separate craft unions, which correspond to the divisions within the industry itself, and although they work on a single job for a number of different employers, there is strong unity between them. They are, in essence, members of the same labor organization. They support each other, their interests are the same, they bargain together with their employers on wages and hours and conditions of work. On the national level they are joined together in the building and construction trades department, and on the local level by local building and construction trades councils. The Taft-Hartley Act, by its boycott provisions, attempts to tear apart this strong organization, to pit one union against another, to force one union to work for the destruction of another, and even to work for its own destruction. The two labor organizations which have been most seriously hit by the boycott provisions of the act are the typographical and the building trades unions. It is not by chance that they are among the strongest and the most successful and responsible labor organizations in the country.

With the nature of the industry in mind, I would like your committee to consider the effects of the Taft-Hartley Act upon building and construction trades unions. And in this consideration it should be remembered, too, that employers generally have held back from use of the act since it was adopted because we have been in a period of relatively full employment. This has been especially true of the construction industry. It is easy to foresee what would happen under the Taft-Hartley Act if millions of unemployed were walking the streets. Union organization could, in that case, with the present law be effectively wiped out in a short time.

REPRESENTATION ELECTIONS

Only one such election has been held thus far. It illustrates well, however, what this portion of the act means to our unions.

A contract for the construction of the Bull Shoals Dam, in Arkansas, was let on May 8, 1947, by the Army engineers to the Ozark Dam Constructors (a joint venture formed by nine contractors from various parts of the country, only for the purpose of constructing the dam). Work began in June, 1947. The completion time is approximately 40 months, and December 1950 is tentatively set as the completion date.

The Fort Smith, Little Rock and Springfield joint council, of Little Rock, Ark., early last year asked the Ozark Dam Constructors to bargain with it as the representative of the men at work on the dam. Its request was refused by Brown & Root, who are the operating contractors on the dam. The joint council then, on March 4, 1948, petitioned the National Labor Relations Board to hold a representation election, and after a hearing the NLRB on June 17th ordered that such an election be held. Although the joint council won the election—which was finally held on July 28, 1948—by a large majority, and although the results were known by everyone the day following the election, the NLRB withheld certification of the joint council until August 19, 1948, and then issued such certification only after repeated protests on our part at the delay.

The first meetings between representatives of the joint council and of Brown & Root occurred about the middle of September 1948. Other meetings took place later that month, and at one of the later meetings the attorney representing Brown & Root presented a proposed agreement to the joint council, on a completely arbitrary, take-it-or-leave-it basis. The agreement was one which no labor union could accept. Since Brown & Root refused to entertain any suggestions of the joint council for changes, negotiations broke down. As an illustration of the contract which was proposed, Brown & Root retained the right to classify men without consulting the union, to fix wages and conditions of work, and in general to operate exactly as though no agreement with a labor organization had been made. In addition, the contract demanded that the joint council provide a bond for liquidated damages in the amount of $100,000, payable in the amount of $25,000 per day in the event of strike, slow-down, or other interference with work. Even if the joint council had been willing to furnish such a bond it would have found it impossible to do so.

When negotiations broke down in late September 1948, the joint council preferred unfair labor practice charges against Brown & Root with the National Labor Relations Board on the grounds that (1) they had refused to bargain in good faith and (2) they were discharging men for union activity. Some 300 men were discharged, for example, when it was learned that they had signed the original petition for the election. At the same time complaints were made to the contracting agency and the Department of Labor that Brown & Root were paying men less than the rates established by the United States Department of Labor under the Davis-Bacon Act, by the simple method of classifying them as laborers or helpers and putting them to work as skilled mechanics. After waiting for many weeks for the NLRB to act, the joint council went on strike on December 6, 1948. The strike is still in effect.

A hearing on the charges against Brown & Root was held by the NLRB in January 1949, after renewed attempts on the part of the joint council to settle the issues by direct negotiations. The evidence is now before the trial examiner for his findings. If the average of the NLRB holds in this case, the trial examiner's intermediate report can be expected some time in early summer. A recent study of Board delays shows that on the average about 6 months' time has elapsed from the date of the filing of charges against employers to the intermediate report of the trial examiner.

Brown & Root, as soon as the strike occurred, began to import strikebreakers in large numbers, in direct violation of the Byrnes Act. Men have been coming in by the hundreds from Texas, Florida, Oklahoma, Nebraska, New Mexico, Wyoming, and other States. In addition to violating the Byrnes Act, this has direct and immediate significance under the Taft-Hartley Act. That act provides that employees on strike who are not entitled to reinstatement are not entitled to vote in a representation election. The NLRB has ruled that this denies the right to vote to strikers in an economic strike who are permanently replaced, although the strikebreakers may vote. Unless the NLRB finds the Ozark Dam Constructors guilty of unfair labor practices it will be perfectly possible for Brown & Root in time to request another election and defeat the joint council.

Meantime, Brown & Root continue to pay less than the established wage rates. Both the Army engineers and the United States Department of Labor have made on-the-job investigations as to the validity of the charge that Brown & Root consistently follow the policy of employing men as laborers, at the rate set for that classification, and then assigning them to work for which higher rates have been established—without changing the men's classifications or wages. The investigation of the Department of Labor revealed without doubt that this charge is true. That Department, however, is not the enforcing agency under the Davis-Bacon Act. Enforcement lies in the hands of the contracting agency, in this case the Army engineers. They are reported to have found a large number of these violations, and to have ordered them "corrected" but on this I have been unable to secure any definite information.

Recently Brown & Root refused to recognize that the election which took place on the Bull Shoals Dam is applicable also to the Flippen Materials Co., a separate joint venture established by the same nine contractors, and set up only for the purpose of furnishing crushed stone for the dam. Men work interchangeably for the Ozark Dam constructors and the Flippen Materials Co. In some cases men who work for the Flippen Materials Co. are paid by the Ozark Dam constructors. The Flippen Materials Co. contract is cost plus, with a savings clause, and with the further provision that some 30 percent of certain costs of the Ozark Dam Constructors may be charged against the former company.

Through the entire history of this case runs the willingness of the joint council to conform to all of the provisions of the law. But the contract time for the construction of the dam is passing. More than half of the 40 months is already gone. When the project is completed the Ozark Dam constructors will dissolve, and the various contractors engaged in the joint venture will disperse, leaving no possible recourse to the union. A major part of the construction jobs upon which building tradesmen depend for their living would have been finished long ago, in much less time than that which has already elapsed since the application for an election more than a year ago. Actually, this portion of the Taft-Hartley law is not only unworkable in a major portion of the industry, but thoroughly destructive as far as building and construction trades unions are concerned.

UNION-SECURITY ELECTIONS

This section of the Taft-Hartley Act, as it relates to the building and construction industry, must be considered against the background of the labor-management relations in that industry. Our tradition for half a century has been the closed-shop agreement. The bill now under consideration by your committee places great emphasis upon the use of arbitration in the adjustment of grievances and the settlement of disputes which arise under collective-bargaining agreements. With this we are in complete accord. Many building-and-construction-trades unions have for years included provisions for arbitration in their constitutions. Recently, however, due to the great extent of disagreement even among the people who sponsored the Taft-Hartley Act as to how far and in what ways it applies to the building and construction industry, employers and unions in the industry have found themselves completely at a loss as to what they can safely include in their agreements. Among other things, provision for arbitration is being eliminated in many of our contracts. As a matter of fact, under the Taft-Hartley Act, most of the provisions which have in the past gone far to assure the stability of the relationship between contractor and union are being eliminated, and unions and employers are now negotiating only for wages and hours of work—leaving out most or all of the other provisions which were formerly part of their contracts.

Only one union-security election has been held so far in the building and construction industry under the Taft-Hartley Act. It was in the heavy construction industry in 33 counties of western Pennsylvania, with only five trades participating, and was held solely for the purpose of working out the techniques of such elections. Even this simple election took months of preparation on the part of the NLRB, the employers, and the unions. There is little need of going into the difficulties of holding these elections in the industry, since Mr. Denham has himself admitted that they are insurmountable and gave up, months ago, any attempt to work out procedures for such elections. The serious thing about this portion of the act, however, is that meantime both employers and unions in the industry are unable to follow the pattern which had become so characteristic in the past in the writing of collective-bargaining agreements. Thus the labor-management relationship is greatly disturbed.

BOYCOTT PROVISIONS

It has become customary to say that the Taft-Hartley Act outlaws the secondary boycott. Actually it goes much further than that, and makes illegal any action based on the unity of interest between various building and construction trade-unions which has for years been considered not only legal, but essential to the continued existence of the trade-union movement.

The National Labor Relations Board has made two decisions on the boycott in the building and construction industry. In the first decision, handed down in November 1948, the Board found local 74 of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, in Chattanooga, Tenn., guilty of a secondary boycott because it refused to permit its members to work on a job when nonunion men, whom the union was at the time attempting to organize, began work on the job. The case arose when Watson's Specialty Store was awarded a subcontract for floor and wall coverings in the remodeling of a private residence, upon which only union carpenters were at work. The union for some time had been trying to organize the employees of the store, and was at that time picketing the store—and this the Board found to be a legal activity on the part of the union. When the store's nonunion men came on the job the union carpenters walked off. They did not, however, make any threats either against the contractor or Watson's Specialty Store, and the strike was entirely peaceful. Nonetheless the NLRB found the union guilty of a secondary boycott. Clearly it was trying only to protect its own wage rates and conditions of work.

The second decision of the Board, made in February 1949, prohibits peaceful picketing and the use of the unfair list in a secondary boycott. In this case, the carpenters' district council of Kansas City, Mo., was involved in a wage dispute with the Wadsworth Building Co., which had refused to renew its contract when the union demanded a wage increase. The carpenters thereupon struck, and picketed the Wadsworth Building Co. plant. The Wadsworth Building Co. manufactures prefabricated houses, and had sold two of its houses to Klassen & Hodgsen, who were engaged in erecting the houses. Klassen & Hodgsen employed a union carpenter, who was called off the job by the union, and the project was picketed, and Klassen & Hodgsen placed on the unfair list of the local building trades council. When some of the truck drivers employed by material dealers refused to cross the picket line, the Wadsworth Building Co. and Klassen & Hodgsen joined in preferring unfair labor practice charges against the union and its agent. By a 3–2 decision the NLRB found both the peaceful picketing and the use of the unfair list illegal. This in fact prohibits a union from making known the existence of a dispute, and has the effect of forcing union members to work on struck work, as well as preventing one union from supporting another union in the same industry. The minority decision of the NLRB found that the free speech provisions of the act permitted picketing and the use of the unfair list, even in the case of a secondary boycott. Both opinions, the majority and the minority, stressed the obvious conflict between the free speech and the boycott portions of the act, which are in fact absolutely contradictory.

More recently, and based upon the above decision, a trial examiner of the NLRB found local No. 5 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, in Pittsburgh, Pa., guilty of secondary boycott, because the union's agent "talked with several employees on the job, not members of his union, and called to their attention the fact that a nonunion electrical condition existed there." No strike occurred on the job in question, no one quit work, there was no picketing, no threats were made or implied—but the union was found guilty. It had already been under injunction for almost 6 months.

As of today, the injunction story under the Taft-Hartley Act is as follows: 41 injunctions requested by the general counsel, of which 39 were against unions, 2 against employers. Of the 39 injunctions asked for against unions, 16 (or 44 percent) were in the building and construction industry. Of these, 10 were granted, 3 denied, 1 withdrawn, 2 pending.

All of the injunctions asked for in the building and construction industry were under the mandatory provisions of the act, and all dealt in one way or another with the boycott provisions of the act.

There are about 16,000,000 members of organized labor in the country. Some 2,000,000 of them are in the building and construction trade-unions. Yet 22 percent of the injunctions affect unions which account for not more than an eighth of the total trade-union membership. Of the injunctions granted against building and construction trade-unions, one was in effect for well over a year before the Board made its decision; another has now been in effect a year, and two others for about 6 months. Actually, under the present boycott provisions of the act, in view of the way in which the industry itself is organized, almost any strike can be construed as illegal.

JURISDICTIONAL DISPUTES

Discussion of jurisdictional disputes is almost certain to be tinged with emotion. This has created a general belief that the problem is far more serious than it in fact is. No one wants, or believes it possible to do away with jurisdictional disputes. They are in essence as the attempt of any other segment of our society to outline the field in which it will operate. A jurisdiction means, in the long run, outlining the area in which a union will operate, and which men and women will be eligible for membership in the union. Jurisdictions change with changes in industry, with changes in machines and equipment, with changes in skills, with break-down of the job processes, and with many other factors. It is only when these disputes result in stoppages or delays in work that they become a bogeyman of a size out of all proportion to the facts.

It has been customary for a long time to think of building and construction trade-unions whenever jurisdictional disputes are mentioned. As a matter of fact, such disputes are common to all industry. Jurisdictional disputes in the building and construction industry have never been significant either in number or in amount of time lost. In 1947, for example, when the Taft-Hartley Act was being considered and adopted, the total number of man-days lost because of strikes in the entire construction industry, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, from all causes, was only $^{6}/_{100}$ths of 1 percent of the time worked in the industry. And the time lost because of jurisdictional disputes amounted to only about a tenth of the total time lost, or something less than $^{7}/_{100}$ths of 1 percent of the time worked. Yet the great hue and cry which was made about those strikes led the public to believe that they were frequent, of great duration, and threatened to destroy the industry.

We have always tried to prevent stoppages of work because of jurisdictional disputes. The history of the Building and Construction Trades Department shows a number of efforts to establish machinery for handling jurisdictional questions in a peaceful, orderly manner, and I must say that I believe the figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics prove that we have been largely successful in our attempts. We now have in operation a national plan for settlement of jurisdictional disputes which went into effect in May 1948, and under which joint boards made up of equal numbers of representatives of employers and unions are established to hear and decide jurisdictional claims. An impartial chairman heads each such joint board.

All of this proves conclusively that labor in the building and construction industry can, and should be permitted to, resolve its own questions of jurisdiction.

SEPARATION OF CRAFT BARGAINING UNITS

When the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, we were confident that it would permit the NLRB to carve out craft bargaining units from the over-all units in industrial plants. The National Labor Relations Board, however, soon made it abundantly clear that the change in the law had meant nothing. In April 1948, for example, the NLRB issued two decisions which are typical. It refused, in those decisions, to permit elections for the establishment of separate bargaining units of maintenance bricklayers, although the two unions in question had been in existence long before the organization of the production employees of the plants. The two cases were those of Middletown, Ohio, plant of the American Rolling Mills Co., where the Armco Employes Independent Federation, Inc., is the bargaining agent, and the Lorain, Ohio, plant of the National Tube Co., where the Steelworkers Union, CIO, is the bargaining agent. These are but two of dozens of instances in which the NLRB has in the past 2 years refused to recognize craft bargaining units. The result is that unions made up of skilled mechanics, which have been in existence in many cases for years, are prevented from enjoying the ultimate fruit of their organization—the right to bargain collectively for their members on wages, hours, and conditions of work. They are in fact swallowed up and lost in the over-all bargaining unit, composed largely of production employees. And in hundreds of cases, like the two I have just cited, these union members are forced to accept as their bargaining agents either a rival labor organization, the CIO, or independent unions having no relationship to the great labor organization of which the craft unions form such a vital part.

We urge, therefore, that the proposed bill be amended to make it possible for well-organized, responsible craft unions to bargain for their members in industrial plants, when those members want to be represented by their own unions.

ASSIGNMENT OF WORK

The provision in the Taft-Hartley Act which permits employers to assign work arbitrarily, without consulting with unions of their employees, has given the unscrupulous employer an unrivaled chance to chisel on wage rates. It has taken from the hands of the unions one of their most effective means of protecting their established wages and working conditions. In the past year and a half, dozens of complaints have come to the Building and Construction Trades Department from all over the country, to the effect that construction work is being done by large corporations with maintenance or operations employees, whose wage rates are below those established by building tradesmen through collective bargaining. This practice harms not only building tradesmen but contractors as well, and will mean a serious curtailment of the industry if it continues. It means also the creation of disputes over jurisdiction where no such disputes existed before.

A union is powerless to protect its jurisdiction under the Taft-Hartley Act, even when it has an agreement with another union as to the jurisdiction over certain work. For example, the Washington Gas Light Co. of the District of Columbia some months ago entered into a contract with a contractor employing union ironworkers, to dismantle certain iron construction. The company also engaged a union crane contractor, who employed a union operating engineer and brought him on the same job. At the same time the company assigned its own maintenance and repair men to work on the dismantling job, doing exactly the same work as the union ironworkers.

Neither the ironworkers nor the crane operator could be removed from the job without violating the act. Their union representatives consulted with the representatives of the union to which the maintenance and repair employees belonged, and the two unions reached an agreement as to the jurisdiction of the work in question. The company employees then informed the company that they were being required to do work which belonged to the ironworkers, and that they did not want to continue at such work. The company refused to accept and be guided by the agreement between the two unions, and ordered its employees to continue at the work assigned to them. This experience is multiplied many times over throughout the country.

CONCILIATION SERVICE

There has been a great deal of talk about the Conciliation Service remaining impartial only so long as it is kept out of the Department of Labor. Mr. Ching gave lengthy testimony before the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee on his experience as head of the Service during the last year. I want to point out that the impartiality of Mr. Ching himself can be questioned. Let me recall to the committee that when he served on the War Labor Board it was, not as a public member, but as industry member. We are firmly of the opinion that the Conciliation Service should be returned to the Department of Labor, and headed by a labor man of broad interest.

STATEMENT BY SAL B. HOFFMANN, PRESIDENT, UPHOLSTERERS' INTERNATIONAL UNION OF NORTH AMERICA, A. F. OF L., RELATIVE TO REPLACEMENT OF NATIONAL LABOR MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT OF 1947 BY APPROPRIATE LEGISLATION

Our union, the Upholsterers' International Union of North America, founded in 1892 and in continuous existence since that date, and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor since 1892, was at the earliest practical date in 1947 in compliance with the new Federal Labor Relations Act adopted by Congress in that year and has continued in compliance with and operated entirely within that act up to the date of this submission. As an organization in full compliance with the act as the law of the land, while retaining all rights of citizens to dissent from the legislation in question in whole or in part, to seek revision or repeal and to petition for redress of grievance suffered under the administration of such legislation, we respectfully submit our experience as faithful observers of the law which indicates that only outright repeal of the act of 1947 can effectively serve the interests of the whole people of these United States and, indeed, the purposes set forth in the preamble of the act itself.

The Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 was primarily in the nature of a sweeping revision of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, and of other fundamental related legislation by Congress of even longer establishment. We submit that such sweeping revision of an entire framework of law in operation without successful challenge for more than a decade in widely varying conditions of peace and war, must satisfy certain fundamental questions before the validity of such sweeping changes can achieve the general acceptance necessary for the functioning of general law intervening in such an important area of economic and personal relationships, under our democratic process and system of law. These tests are simple and common-sense tests of:

(1) What is the source and inspiration of the proposed revisions? Are these sources and inspirations of the specific proposals to be found in those groups who faithfully complied with the law of the land in spirit and letter, while it stood as the governing statute or otherwise? Are they identified with general public interest or do they represent special and biased, or even class-conscious interests identified by past purposeful activity on this and other questions as but little concerned with the general welfare?

(2) Is the purpose of such proposals for revision of the very framework of law, the remedying of public abuses or merely the creation of an opportunity to restore the abuses, to curb which was the purpose of the perviously enacted legislation?

(3) Finally, what are the facts as to the reality of the abuses complained of? What are the facts as to any necessary relation between the changes in law and the remedying of verifiable abuses, and what are the facts as to the practical effect of the changes in the law in 1947 on the abuses aimed at and the promotion of the general welfare?

In the first test as to the source and inspiration of the basic revisions of the Federal labor law embodied in the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, better known as the Taft-Hartley Act, it is submitted that every informed man or woman today possesses the common knowledge that the present act was originally drafted in detail by the professional representatives of the National Association of Manufacturers and that, even after the operation of the full legislative process in both Houses of Congress, the final act represented survival of the major portion of the original draft and its senatorial sponsor, the Honorable Senator Robert Taft of Ohio, so stated. It is, of course, common knowledge that the National Association of Manufacturers has, throughout its life and that of its ancestral predecessors, been identified with the special group of American employers and managers who resisted collective bargaining in principle and in practice, tenaciously and without pause from their beginning to the present day. This association not only challenged and tried every rivet of the constitutional and legal framework of the original Wagner Act of 1935, but, when they lost their challenge to the principle of the act before the Supreme Court of the United States, remained the inner fortress and protection of every employing interest seeking to obstruct and evade the purpose and the administration of the National Labor Relations Act throughout its history. No one familiar with the social and political history of our Nation in the last generation needs to be told that this sponsor and defender of the Taft-Hartley Act has concerned itself with the narrowest and most limited class interests of its constituents on every public measure of the last generation, whether it be in respect to labor, education, health and public welfare, national defense, or any other matter of general concern and proper subject for legislative action in the public interest.

The second test of the purpose of the act of 1947 stands answered in the light of the facts as to the source and inspiration of that legislation which has never been effectively denied. The abolition of the 100-percent union or so-called closed shop and the evident aim to hamper the limited union shop, which had been part of collective bargaining in some industries for over a hundred years before enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act was in line with the Nation-wide campaign of the same associated employing interests after the First World War whose "open shop" drive did seek and, in many cases, succeeded in destroying both established unions and the collective bargaining for which they were the sole instrument. The clothing of this destructive purpose, in the form of Federal law, did not conceal the same underlying purpose which characterized the same industrial interests 29 years ago and which, oddly enough, had their organizational headquarters in a large city of Ohio then.

By the third and final test of the facts, there was never proven to exist in the hurried and prejudged testimony of 1947, any such emergent national crisis as a consequence of abuses in the collective bargaining field as would justify turning the existing Federal labor legislative structure upside down, as was the essential purpose and effect of the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947. In the haste to enact punitive legislation against organized labor, a new and dangerous principle was born in 1947. While the Wagner Act had declared public policy to be the furthering of collective bargaining and devised certain procedures and administrative machinery to effectuate that purpose, it stopped short after protecting the effective right of self-organization of workers which was the condition of existence of collective bargaining and bringing the parties by peaceful, legal, and democratic process to the bargaining table. The Taft-Hartley Act, on the other hand, went entirely beyond even the most drastic of regulation of the process of self-organization and of powerful labor organization and any and all alleged abuse of power by labor in attaining collective bargaining, to swing recklessly into the area of prescribing what could be the result of collective bargaining and prescribing, by affirmative Government administrative intervention, the actual steps in the collective bargaining process by which the restricted results could be attained.

This drastic departure and extension of Federal intervention into the hitherto largely free and voluntary private collective bargaining process, as seen in the proscribing of the 100-percent union shop and prescribing of the methods of achieving the limited union shop, was hasty and ill-considered and may yet cause its inventors and victims alike to rue the day the act was done and the precedent established. The facts as set forth in the report of the National Labor Relations Board attest to the truth of the charge that the act of 1947 did aim to discourage and diminish the success of self-organization as the first step to reach the collective bargaining table and to obstruct the enforcement of the very rights still proclaimed as preserved in that statute. The cold figures prove that unions found it more difficult and costly to reach and, more unlikely, to win representation elections under the new act and its administration. Inasmuch as the Wagner Act prescribed no direct civil or criminal penalties for the violation of self-organization rights of workers by employers, but relied upon back-wage awards as the main deterrent, it is significant to note the fall-off of such substantial back-wage collections under the Wagner Act to an infinitesimal figure under the Taft-Hartley Act. The main deterrent to employers' interference became a pallid paper shadow of its former self. The obvious effect of the discriminatory one-sided weighting of the Taft-Hartley Act against organized labor inevitably incident to its class and special interest-biased source inspiration and purpose is seen in the effect of the requirement for non-Communist affidavits from labor's side of the bargaining table alone which, aiming at isolation of the Communist fifth columnist operative in the ranks of labor, actually permitted this element to hide behind some of the oldest and most respected and Communist-free unions in the Nation and to fight their special cause in the false guise of a champion of all labor. Others have detailed in great length the contradictory and self-defeating nature of industrial relations under this ill-starred and inspired 1947 Labor-Management Relations Act and our recorded experience as a fully complying union is available to the committee if its addition will serve further purpose.

On the basis of the foregoing summary, however, our international union can follow no other conscientious course but to urgently recommend the course of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and the Secretary of Labor in this vital matter which calls for clearing the ground for new growth by:

(1) Repealing in toto the Taft-Hartley sponsored National Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947.

(2) Immediately reenacting the tested Wagner National Labor Relations Act of 1935 with such amendments as the parties of labor and industry can agree upon and the good judgment of the administration and Congress elected after full discussion of the issue in 1948 can unqualifiedly recommend in the public interest on the basis of facts indisputably established.

The Upholsterers' International Union, through its general executive board, submits the following broadly detailed recommendations for amendments to the reenacted National Labor Relations Act of 1935:

(1) Closed shop specifically permitted—State anti-closed-shop laws declared inoperative in the interstate commerce area.

(2) A requirement for union officers to execute non-Communist affidavits should be made and expanded to include employers, as well as all officers and employees, field representatives, administrators, and other employees or agents of trade unions, whether appointed or elected, who make policy or who have authority to supervise and direct the affairs of a labor union or its subordinate branches, including the collective bargaining representatives of a labor union and the officers of any national or international labor organization with which it is an affiliate or constituent unit; and the employers' professional labor relations representative and the officers, authorized representatives, administrators and other employees or agents of employers' associations and their subordinate branches.

Furthermore, that declarations against nazism, fascism, and domestic equivalents, such as the Ku Klux Klan, should also be included in these affidavits, because of their specific relevance in the case of employers as revealed in the investigation of international cartel and other disloyal agreements during the last World War.

(3) That there should be a provision requiring labor unions to file financial statements and other reports as now required by Federal law, and this should be expanded to include employers, employers' labor relations representatives and employers' associations.

(4) That there should be a provision in the law regulating union and private employer administered welfare funds, with the exception of any provision requiring joint administration, which is rigid and unworkable. Because of vast sums involved and the newness of the field, some regulation and possible supervision by filing of reports with the Department of Labor or the Federal Security Administration seems indicated. Our union's experience proves conclusively that, in small-scale industry, joint management, which is theoretically appealing, is administratively out of the question. A complete brief on this question was submitted to the same committee of the Eightieth Congress and is available for the committee's information.

(5) There should be a requirement for 60-day notice of any proposed termination and modification of a contract by employers and unions.

(6) It is also proposed that there should be created a national labor-management panel composed of an equal number of representatives of management, labor, and the Government under the nonvoting chairmanship of the Secretary of Labor for the following purposes:

(a) With the duty, at the request of the Secretary of Labor, to advise in the avoidance of industrial controversies and the manner in which mediation and voluntary adjustment shall be administered, particularly with reference to controversies affecting the general welfare of the country.

(b) The panel acting as a whole or by subcommittee, shall conduct a thorough study and investigation of the entire field of labor-management relations, including, but not limited to (1) The means by which permanent friendly cooperation between employers and employees, and stability of labor relations may be secured throughout the United States; (2) the means by which the individual employee may achieve an improved standard of living, including plans for guaranteed annual wages.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1949

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., Hon. Augustine B. Kelley (chairman) presiding.

Mr. KELLEY. The committee will be in order, please.

Mr. Green, the president of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. Green, will you proceed when you are ready? You and Mr. Randolph are going to testify together?

Mr. MASON. No. One at a time.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well.

Mr. Green.

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM GREEN, PRESIDENT, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. I appreciate the opportunity you have accorded to me to present to you the point of view of the American Federation of Labor upon the pending legislation which you are now considering. Thank you so much for this opportunity. I will be glad to present this statement, and after I have done so, answer any questions that you might wish to submit.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well. Go right ahead.

Mr. GREEN. The working men and women of this Nation value highly the blessings of individual and collective freedom conferred upon them by the organic law of this land. No other group or section of people in the United States places a greater value upon individual and collective freedom than do working people. Freedom to organize into trade-unions and freedom to bargain collectively through trade-unions, is regarded as a sacred right by the workers of our country.

Under the free-enterprise system employers freely bargain for the sale of their products on terms and conditions regarded as reasonable and satisfactory; workers engaged in collective bargaining to negotiate wage rates and conditions of employment. Such agreements provide for the compensation which they shall receive for work and service performed, and the conditions under which they work. Through the exercise of this right, the workers have succeeded in lifting their standards of life and work. The exercise of these rights by labor and by management has been universally regarded as being both elemental and basic justice ever since the Declaration of Independence was signed.

Now the infamous Taft-Hartley law makes it a crime for labor and management to negotiate certain provisions of a wage agreement customary and satisfactory to both; but, no restrictions were placed upon the right of employers to negotiate for the sale of the products of labor on terms which may be acceptable and satisfactory.

Why was such an antilabor law passed by the Congress of the United States? What was the real purpose of this act? Here is the answer. The Taft-Hartley Act was passed for the purpose of making strong unions weak and weak unions still weaker. Its obvious purpose was to deprive labor of the right to negotiate contracts such as employers and employees have exercised during all the years which have intervened since collective bargaining became a fixed practice in the economic life of our Nation.

Through free collective bargaining, wage agreements were negotiate through two World War periods during which the individual and collective productivity of the workers of the United States reached the highest point in all our history. Even now our Government is inviting employers and workers of European countries to visit our industries to observe methods of management and producing workers. Would this happen if American wage earners did not have an outstanding record for resourcefulness and productivity?

If, as the record shows, free collective bargaining made an immeasurable contribution to the growth and development of our Nation up to the present time, why should it now be made a crime for employers and employees to negotiate a free collective bargaining agreement, acceptable and satisfactory to both?

Free collective bargaining and sound management-labor relationships are a large part of the basis on which a sound national economy rests. When the exercise of this right is denied to either management or labor by legislation or otherwise, the national economic structure is seriously affected.

Labor, in fighting for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law, is seeking to bring about the restoration of the exercise of elemental individual and collective freedom as granted by the Constitution of the United States. It is fighting for the preservation of the American way of life—for an American principle.

The Taft-Hartley law is filled with legal restrictions upon the exercise of the common elemental rights of labor. For instance, if workers exercise their right to strike against injustice and for the redress of grievances, the employer may employ new workers classified as strikebreakers, and after doing so call for an election for the selection of a new collective-bargaining agent. The strikebreakers alone can participate in such an election; the employees who are on strike are denied the right to vote.

It is difficult to understand why the Congress of the United States would vote to pass a law in which there was embodied such an amazing restriction upon the exercise of the right of the workers to strike against injustice and wrong, and which conferred upon employers the power to destroy unions and protect strikebreaker. That is an amazing thing.

The law further protects the employment of Communists who may be expelled from membership in free, democratic trade-unions because they are Communists. While workers may expel a member from their union who may be proved to be a Communist, they are denied the right under the Taft-Hartley law to refuse to work with a Communist.

The Taft-Hartley law is un-American, vicious, and reprehensible. The membership of the American Federation of Labor will never become reconciled to such legislation. The sponsors of the Taft-Hartley law and a large number of the supporters of this vicious legislation have stated in newspaper advertisements, in radio addresses and otherwise, and even on the floor of Congress, that working people generally favor the law and that only the officers of labor unions, classified as labor "bosses," are opposed to it. A specific and definite answer was made to these false and untrue statements at the election which was held last November in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Minnesota, Tennessee, Pennsylvania, and in other congressional and State elections. In my opinion, further answers similar to the kind made at the election which was held last November will be made in other congressional districts during the 1950 elections. The opposition among working men and women to the Taft-Hartley law is universal. I want to emphasize that. It is universal among the workers, and Nation-wide in character.

The retention of the Taft-Hartley law upon the statute books of the Nation and its operation would serve to promote unrest and communism and to threaten the maintenance and functional processes of our free-enterprise system. America is the last stronghold of the free-enterprise system. Practically all the nations of the world, outside of the United States, have turned to socialism, communism, or some other form of totalitarianism. Communist representatives proclaimed, when revolution was being promoted in Czechoslovakia and other nations, "See what the workers are subjected to in capitalistic countries." They especially emphasized the fact that in capitalistic America, trade-unions were being wiped out through the enactment of the Taft-Hartley law which had been sponsored by the National Association of Manufacturers and capitalists of the United States. That was used in the revolution that took place in Czechoslovakia.

The record in Europe shows that many nations now under cover of the Iron Curtain were influenced to accept communism because of prejudice, persecution, hunger, and suffering. Communism thrives on hunger, suffering, poverty, and oppression. The American Federation of Labor has stood for the preservation of our form of Government, in defense of the exercise of individual and collective freedom. It has been a staunch defender of our free-enterprise system. It can speak, as it has spoken through its representatives, to the oppressed working men and women of Europe, telling them of the benefits and blessings of democracy, freedom, and liberty. This cannot be done effectively by the representatives of Wall Street, the manufacturers association, and the wealth of our Nation.

Now, have we arived at a period in our national history when a stanch patriotic movement such as the American Federation of Labor is to be weakened—and I might say destroyed—through the enactment and maintenance of vicious antilabor legislation such as the Taft-Hartley law?

On the contrary, we must show the workers of the world that our form of Government and our free-enterprise system is better for working men and women than communism or any other form of totalitarianism. We can make a great contribution to the achievement of this aim and purpose through the prompt repeal of the Taft-Hartley law.

In my opinion, the best interests of employers and of our free-enterprise system will be served through the development of strong unions, united into an organization such as the American Federation of Labor, which will stand immovable and uncompromising in defense of our American form of government and in opposition to communism and totalitarianism. Both employers and employees are beneficiaries of such service.

The American Federation of Labor aided in the formulation and adoption of the Wagner Act of 1935 and unreservedly opposed on principle the adoption of the Taft-Hartley Act. The Wagner Act provided for acceptance as public policy of the right of wage-earners to collective bargaining as their method of determining terms and conditions of work in industry. Collective bargaining enables workers to participate in free enterprise by means of contracts—the normal instrument of business. Collective action which makes for equality of bargaining power with management assures that essential element of a contract—mutuality. The Wagner Act provided the machinery to implement this basic justice. It accepted the principle of voluntarism which assures rights and relies upon the workers to assume responsibility for knowing and seeking their advancement and welfare. The act prohibited employers from interference and restraint of employees in their efforts to organize and bargain collectively. The Wagner Act assured the benefit of a broad principle of human justice. It wrote this right into public policy. That is why we call it labor's Magna Carta.

The Taft-Hartley Act seeks to define rights of employers and minorities and to limit collective bargaining. The act weakens unions and thus prevents equality of bargaining power with management. By outlawing the requirement for union membership as a condition of employment, and by making excessively burdensome the requirement that all hired must join the union within a limited time, the act strikes at the heart of the union's ability to serve the management and to maintain discipline—an essential to responsibility. The union shop is a practice inherited from the guilds which preceded trade-unions. Even the trade-unions of the early nineteenth century operated on a union-shop basis. Any union that assumes responsibility for the technical fitness of members on the job must control training and have experienced workers available for employment. This is a service to industy and assures employment to persons prepared to do quality work.

By proscribing what our opponents term the "closed union shop," the Taft-Hartley law goes contrary to accepted practice in the professions as well as in trade unions. Furthermore it strikes at the right of voluntary organizations to govern themselves for the advancement of their welfare.

The Taft-Hartley Act weakens unions by encouraging litigation as an alternative to economic action. Courts can punish wrongdoing but cannot solve labor and industrial problems.

Since, under the Taft-Hartley Act, the union can require the discharge of workers only because of nonpayment of dues, the union is denied its most effective disciplinary action. Union officials find it necessary to work side by side with a person who is trying to disrupt or mislead the union and are denied any effective weapon to remedy such a situation. Without discipline no organization can be effective.

Experienced trade-union executives regard the Taft-Hartley Act as punitive, restrictive, and demoralizing in its effects on trade-unions. They foresaw the weakening of trade-unions in the passage of this legislation which would prohibit free workers from participating in free American enterprise. Their fears were increased by the recrudescence of the injunction as a method of dealing with labor disputes. The injunction in the past has denied wage earners constitutional and legal rights and has subjected them to a judicial depotism in which the judge made law, determined whether law had been violated, and the penalities. After years of effort trade-unions freed themselves from judicial government by securing the enactment of the Norris-LaGuardia Act which forbade Federal courts to issue injunction in labor disputes. Labor held that labor disputes could best be settled when workers and management can go over a situation, discuss their own problems, and reach agreement on how to remedy the injustice. An outside agent cannot understand the implications involved in union-management differences as well as those involved in a dispute, and is therefore not in the best position to effect remedies. So, when our Chief Executive was authorized to determine when a strike or lock-out was a menace to national health, with authority to request that an injunction be issued if he finds such action expedient, it put upon the President a responsibility which unfairly hampers him and injects the dispute into partisan politics. Injunctions of themselves do not settle economic disputes but they do arouse resentment and distrust.

Let me review for you gentlemen of the committee the experiences of the Atomic Trades and Labor Council whose members are employed at Oak Ridge:

A dispute over a new contract between Carbide and Carbon Chemicals Corp. and the Atomic Trades and Labor Council of the American Federation of Labor arose. The plant involved was the Oak Ridge National Laboratory, a Government-owned atomic-energy plant operated by the company under a contract with the Atomic Energy Commission. The issue concerned was wages and working conditions. Employees voted to strike on March 16, 1948. The President appointed a board of inquiry on March 5, the parties agreeing to maintain status quo until March 19. The board of inquiry submitted its first report on March 15, and 4 days later the Attorney General obtained an injunction. Now, what happened? In a last-offer ballot, conducted by the National Labor Relations Board, the employees voted by a large majority not to accept the employer's last offer. The injunction was dismissed at the end of 80 days. That means the injunction settled nothing. Upon intervention by the president of the American Federation of Labor and the officers of the Metal Trades Department of the A. F. of L., the parties sat down and with the assistance of the Mediation and Conciliation Service, and after 52 hours of constant negotiation, they agreed to a settlement; a collective-bargaining settlement.

It should be noted that in this case the union had all along offered to submit the dispute to impartial arbitration, but the company refused. Responsibility for continuation of the dispute can therefore be laid at the door of the company—but the injunction was issued against the union, with no comparable penalty whatsoever against the company.

The charge made by the workers of the Nation that the Taft-Hartley law is a slave-labor law, is based upon that section of the Taft-Hartley law which provides for resort to the use of the writ of injunction. Even honest, sincere, unbiased Members of Congress can be deceived by this provision. It violates the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States which provides that involuntary servitude shall not be imposed except as a punishment for crime. When workers are compelled to work against their will by order of the Government, or be subject to punishment, for refusal to do so, they are being subjected to involuntary servitude. It matters not how long you compel a man to work; for 1 minute, 2 minutes, 5 minutes, or an hour. If he is compelled to do so against his will, that is involuntary servitude. The workers regard that as slave labor. Many employers have long fought for the use of the writ of injunction in labor disputes. Because they abused this privilege, Congress passed the Norris-LaGuardia Act which abolished government by injunction. Now they seek to restore this undemocratic and vicious practice in order that they may be helped by the Government when they stubbornly resist fair and reasonable proposals of labor unions. The injunction helps them to accomplish this purpose. Here is the Government lining up with an employer against labor. There is nothing in the Taft-Hartley law which provides that employers shall be required or compelled by the Government to do certain things in labor disputes during a so-called emergency which threatens the public health and safety. It is all one-sided. There is nothing against the employer. He can do as he pleases. He can provoke the strike and then get the Government on his side with an injunction.

The Taft-Hartley law provides for resort to the use of the writ of injunction against labor; employers who reject the reasonable proposals of labor unions are not required or compelled to do anything. There have been nine cases in which national emergency procedure has been invoked. In six of these an injunction was issued, and in effect 80 days, against the workers, not the employer. The injunction accomplished nothing except the prolongation of the dispute. In no case did the procedure effect an adjustment or even contribute to the final settlement. The board of inquiry procedure has served only as a formality to justify a request for injunctive relief.

There is no justification for arbitrary legal prohibitions or compulsions in labor-management disputes. The parties concerned will get together and settle them if there is no intervention to provide a scapegoat to take responsibility for an unpleasant decision. It is very easy to confuse public health and safety with convenience and danger with discomfort. The public is not separate and distinct from those who work for wages nor is a Government official impartial or above partisanship simply because his functions run counter to those of wage-earners. Under normal conditions it is safe to say that no strike has endangered public health and safety. When there has been public danger, wage earners have been as ready as other citizens to practice restraint in the interests of the Nation.

Neither police power nor a police state can prevent strikes so long as workers are freemen. Neither has compulsory arbitration reduced the number of strikes in countries where such laws prevail. Where we have had absence of strikes and industrial disputes collective bargaining is fully developed.

The American Federation of Labor is in favor of that section embodied in the Thomas bill which provides for cooling-off periods, and for a mediation and conciliation in the application of the same principles in dealing with emergency situations where the public health and safety may be menaced. Similar to what has been embodied in the Railway Mediation Act, and that has worked admirably because there have been no strikes except maybe one in all the years on all the railroads in the country, where the public health and safety was menaced even to a remote degree. I want to make that observation clear that we favor the enactment of that section of the Thomas bill into law so as to deal with it effectively.

Strikes resulting from unremedied grievances. They are evidences of underlying injustices that stir workers to protest their wrongs. Unless channels of justice are freely available, the fires of rebellion smolder and finally break down restraint. Those who advocate limitation of the basic right to strike place community comfort and convenience above human justice for workers. There can be no real national health and security based on denial of basic rights. Unless the individual can withhold his labor effectively to promote his own welfare, he has little freedom. No nation is more sound and invincible than one in which all realize their responsibility for maintaining rights, benefiting by justice, and for helping forlorn workers to do likewise. The community has a responsibility to demand and support justice with redress of grievances. This is a far higher purpose than seeking relief from discomforts and upsets.

We protest efforts to outlaw boycotts organized to help fellow workers establish better standards of work. The boycott has an honorable history. We all honor its historic use by our forefathers to prevent taxation without representation. In the labor movement it has traditionally been used against products made under conditions unfair to workers. One of the most valuable attributes of the labor movement is the deep spirit of fraternity that permeates and strengthens it. As a practical matter workers know that the welfare of each is interdependent on the welfare of all. There is every reason why one union should help other unions to establish and maintain labor standards.

On behalf of the American Federation of Labor I urge upon this committee the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and reenactment of the Wagner Act as provided in H. R. 2032, which is your bill. In addition I wish to submit a memorandum containing amendments to this bill endorsed by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor.

These amendments, Mr. Chairman, are inconsequential. For instance, where the bill provides that it shall be the duty of certain people to do certain things, we suggest that that be changed to read that "It shall be the policy of the Government" to do those things. We think that will be better, and these amendments, I will not read, but I will leave them with you for your consideration.

That concludes my statement.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, they will be inserted as part of the record.

(The amendments referred to are as follows:)

AMENDMENTS TO H. R. 2032 PROPOSED BY AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

Section 105 of the present bill, pages 4 and 5, purports to eliminate the further exercise of Board and Federal court jurisdiction in all matters in which the jurisdiction of the Board or of the Federal courts has been or could have been invoked under the Taft-Hartley Act, unless jurisdiction in such matters is retained in the Board or Federal courts by the provisions of the present bill.

The language of this section, however, could be made more expressive of this intent to remove liabilities imposed by the Taft-Hartley Act. As written this section bars actions or proceedings under the "National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947" (the Taft-Hartley Act). The Taft-Hartley Act, however, contains five titles. Only title I amended the earlier National Labor Relations Act. Thus, as presently written, the bill would bar only those actions or proceedings authorized under title I of the Taft-Hartley Act. It would not, for example, bar actions or proceedings instituted under titles II and III of the Taft-Hartley Act, such as civil-damage suits against labor organizations, injunctions in national emergency cases, or criminal prosecutions against labor organizations and their officers for violation of the ban on union contributions and expenditures made in connection with Federal elections. Such damage suits and criminal prosecutions are presently authorized by Title III of the Taft-Hartley Act. Injunctions in national emergency cases are presently authorized by title II of that act. The provisions of section 105 of the present bill should be clarified so as to leave no doubt that not only title I, but titles II and III of the Taft-Hartley Act are embraced within the language of section 105.

Another clarifying change should be made in section 105 of the present bill. The exact language of this section cancels the jurisdiction only of the Board and Federal courts to entertain certain proceedings authorized by the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. Section 303 (a) of the Taft-Hartley Act, however, makes it unlawful for any labor organization to engage in certain types of secondary boycotts and jurisdictional disputes and section 303 (b) authorizes any person injured in his business or property by reason of any violation of section 303 (a) to sue, not only in the Federal courts, but "in any other court having jurisdiction of the parties" (which would seem to include State courts) and to recover damages and the cost of the suit.

Since it appears most likely that section 105 of the present bill intended to foreclose all liability imposed by the Taft-Hartley Act and enforceable in any court, Federal or State, the provisions of this section should be made more definite by express language embracing within its coverage damage suits instituted in State courts or "in any court having jurisdiction of the parties."

Section 405 of title IV of the present bill, pages 21 and 22, states that the provisions of titles II and III of the bill shall not be applicable with respect to any matter which is subject to the provisions of the Railway Labor Act, as amended.

It is quite evident that the sponsors of the present bill, in proposing section 405, were or the opinion that the National Labor Relations Act, as it existed prior to its amendment by title I of the Taft-Hartley Act, eliminated from its coverage individuals employed by an employer subject to the Railway Labor Act. Because of this, and since title I of the present bill is a reenactment of the original National Labor Relations Act, with certain amendments, it was, no doubt, felt unnecessary to extend the proviso of section 405 to title I of the present bill.

The National Labor Relations Act, prior to its amendment by the Taft-Hartley Act, however, did not by any express language exempt from its provisions individuals employed by an employer subject to the Railway Labor Act. Such exemption was, of course, not necessary since the National Labor Relations Act did not contain any unfair labor practices on the part of labor organizations or employees.

It is suggested, therefore, that it be made definite in the present bill that individuals employed by an employer subject to the Railway Labor Act are completely exempted from the coverage of the present bill.

Section 108 of the present bill, pages 10 and 11, makes it an unfair labor practice for "an employer or a labor organization" to terminate or modify a collective bargaining agreement unless a 30-day notice of termination or modification is given to the United States Conciliation Service. The notice required of a labor organization is not notice to an employer, but to a governmental body. Clearly this section is designed to aid and assist the United States Conciliation Service in carrying out the purposes of its being, as set forth in title II of the present bill. That being the case, the severe penalties that may attach to an unfair labor practice should not be made applicable to a failure to give the 30-day notice (which failure, by the way, may be unintentional, but nevertheless punishable). Under the present wording of the section, it might be possible for the board to order cessation of the strike engaged in without such notice, or to penalize the strikers as by condoning their discharge.

The purposes of title II, Mediation and Arbitration, the United States Conciliation Service, of the present bill can best be carried out if section 108 of title I is eliminated entirely as an unfair labor practice and it is made a matter of "public policy" under section 204 of title II of the present bill that a 30-day notice be given of an intention to terminate or modify a collective-bargaining contract. Labor organizations affiliated with the American Federation of Labor will be happy to cooperate with the United States Conciliation Service by giving this notice and that it is entirely unnecessary to force the giving of this notice by making a failure to do so, an unfair labor practice.

While there is no objection to the requirements that notice be given, it would appear that the possible penalties are entirely too drastic for what might be mere inadvertance. Accordingly, if section 108 is not removed as an unfair labor practice, as suggested, this section should be amended to provide that failure to give such notice shall subject the offender to a cease-and-desist order requiring only the giving of notices then and in the future.

The language of section 108, as now written, needs clarification. It makes it an unfair labor practice "for an employer or a labor organization" to fail to give the required notice. It thus appears that the penalties of an unfair labor practice will attach to both parties even in a situation where both parties got together and by mutual agreement and without industrial disturbance modified a collective-bargaining contract or terminated one by entering into a new agreement, but failed to notify the United States Conciliation Service 30 days beforehand.

Section 204 of the present bill, pages 14 and 15, places a "duty" on employers and employees to exert every "reasonable effort" to make and maintain collective-bargaining agreements for definite periods of time concerning (1) rates of pay, hours and terms and conditions of work; (2) adequate notice of desire to terminate or change such agreements; (3) abstention from strikes, lock-outs, or other acts of economic coercion in violation of such agreements; and (4) procedures for the peaceful settlement of disputes involving the interpretation or application of such agreements. It also imposes the "duty" of participating "fully and promptly" in meetings undertaken by the United States Conciliation Service to aid in settling disputes.

There is danger that the term "it shall be the duty," appearing in section 204, lines 15 and 16 of page 14 of the bill, might be deemed to make the specified duties mandatory in nature and to authorize injunctions or damage suits in State or even Federal courts in case of failure to perform such duties. This construction would involve the possibility of injunction suits in early stages of negotiations and even a possibility of compulsory arbitration. The phrase, "it shall be the duty of employers and employees and their representatives" should be eliminated from section 204 of the present bill and that the first four lines of section 204 (lines 13 to 17, inclusive, on page 14) be redrafted to read that it is the "public policy" of the United States, in order to prevent or minimize labor disputes affecting the free flow of commerce or threatening consequences injurious to the general welfare that employers and employees, and their representatives "should do the things enumerated in section 204 (a) and (b).

Section 205 of the present bill, pages 15 and 16, states that it is the public policy of the United States that a collective-bargaining agreement "shall" provide procedures for the referral of disputes, growing out of the interpretation or application of the agreement, to final and binding arbitration. This section is expressive of public policy only and apparently is not designed to place a mandatory duty upon parties to an agreement to provide therein the procedures mentioned. To make this more certain the word "shall" contained in the third line of this section (line 10, page 15) should be changed to "should."

Insert in the bill the following provision or designation of craft unions as collective-bargaining units:

"The Board shall decide in each case whether in order to insure to employees the full benefit of their right to self-organization, to collective bargaining and otherwise to effectuate the policies of this article, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or any other unit; provided, however, that in any case where the majority of employees of a particular craft shall so decide the Board shall designate such craft as a unit appropriate for the purpose of collective bargaining."

This provision has worked well in New York and should work equally well for the United States.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Green, the statement was made last night by the National Association of Manufacturers, Mr. Mosher, that this year's propaganda was used to arouse the individual workers, union workers, against the Taft-Hartley law by the union leaders. I believe that you appeared before the joint committee—maybe it was the Labor Committee last year, I do not recall the year—but I asked you the question had you ever polled the individual members of any of your organizations of the American Federation of Labor to determine how they felt about the Taft-Hartley Act, and I believe you told me you had not.

Have you done it since then? Have you any new figures on that, as to how they feel about it?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, we polled our membership—a large percentage of them, in different localities, so as to find out from them, and the returns showed 99 percent of them, in every instance, favored the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. KELLEY. Ninety-nine percent?

Mr. GREEN. We took that poll some time ago and, of course, we have not done anything since then. We have not sounded them out since we took the poll, but I know the sentiment is the same.

Mr. KELLEY. Was that poll taken as a cross section of the membership?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, a cross section of the membership of the A. F. of L.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you recall the number that were polled?

Mr. GREEN. I forget the number that were polled.

Mr. KELLEY. I recall you said about 15——

Mr. GREEN. About 50,000, I think.

Mr. KELLEY. And 99 percent of them were opposed to the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. GREEN. Ninety-nine percent of them.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, President Green's presentation of the case of labor in opposition to the Taft-Hartley law and in favor of H. R. 2032 has been so completely and so ably presented that I am sure no question I would ask would add to the clarity of the presentation.

I would, however, like to ask President Green, in connection with his proposed amendments to H. R. 2032, a question in reference to section 302 of the act. Section 302, if I remember correctly, has to do with the setting up of Presidential emergency boards, after the expiration of the waiting period.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. The point I want to make is this: The committee has heard testimony in one instance, at least, in which they contended that this section 302 was not strong enough in itself to bring around this conference table at this conference of last resort all of the interested parties.

For instance, the illustration was made that in case of a strike in, we will say, a Bell telephone company, it finally was referred to the Presidential board or commission——

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. That the Bell telephone is just a part of the over-all set-up. In other words, most of the Bell telephone companies are owned outright by the A. T. & T. and, in turn, the A. T. & T. is controlled by a large number of banking concerns, a large number of businesses, and he suggested there should be an additional section so all parties of interest could be forced to sit around the table, on the assumption the one party involved in the strike did not make the policies of that particular company.

What do you think of the proposition? Do you think it should be strengthened there?

Mr. GREEN. I think that during a cooling-off period, when the matter is gone into, and all parties are cool and calm, the best interests of the public would be served if there could be brought into the picture the representatives of employers, or the company, or the corporation—whatever that may be.

I am not prepared at the moment to say whether, in order to deal with a situation such as you have presented, the section should be amended. That is what you have in mind, is it?

Mr. BAILEY. That is correct.

Mr. GREEN. To cover that? I think perhaps the purpose is to have that very thing take place, but I am not sure whether it ought to be amended to make it specific and clear and definite and plain.

Mr. BAILEY. One more question, Mr. Chairman.

I listened to a radio forum one day during the past week in which you participated.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. And in that forum you stated that strong labor unions are America's best defense in the fight against communism.

Would you care, for the benefit of the committee, to restate some of the things you stated in that broadcast?

Mr. GREEN. I will be very glad to.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you.

Mr. GREEN. I referred to that in this statement, but experience is a great teacher, and we learn our most valuable lessons in the school of experience, and in that field we have been experimenting abroad. We have representatives abroad who are working for the American Federation of Labor and the Government in an effort to make the Economic Administration plan a success.

As you know, in practically all the nations of Europe the turn has been to the left and, as I said here, free enterprise is wiped out in practically all of those countries abroad.

The revolutions that have taken place in those countries which are now covered by the iron curtain orginated with labor, the masses of the people. It was a labor movement in Czechoslovakia that captured the Government and established communism.

All right. Who is it who can talk to labor as effectively as the representatives of labor? Our people in Europe are talking to the working people in Europe, and telling them about the operation of our free-enterprise system in the United States, about free collective bargaining, about the right of workers to organize in free trade-unions, and to bargain collectively for the sale of their labor, if I may put it that way, to the employers, just as I can bargain collectively for the sale of the products of labor. One sells labor and the other sells the product of labor.

As a result of it all they are bringing commissions here now, labor representatives to the United States from these countries, to visit our plants and our families, and to visit among the laboring people of our Nation, and discuss with them our economic and political problems. In that way labor can serve to protect our free-enterprise system, and to oppose communism.

Now, would it not be better for our Government to encourage the growth and strength and influence of a great agency like the American Federation of Labor in order to oppose communism effectively, than to weaken it and destroy it like the authors of the Taft-Hartley law are seeking to do? They cannot prevent communism: it will grow in spite of them. And if you drive the workers here in America into communism, then the free-enterprise system is threatened here.

Strengthen the agency, build it up, establish it upon a sound basis so it can effectively cope with an ideology and a philosophy that has established itself in practically every Nation throughout the world except America.

There is the answer, I think, that should be convincing to any thinking person.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you very much for your comments.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. I feel confident that Mr. Green is capable of presenting the subject for the labor unions very ably.

I notice on page 3 you state:

> By proscribing what our opponents term the "closed union shop," the Taft-Hartley law goes contrary to accepted practice in the professions as well as in trade-unions.

What profession do you refer to, or how do you connect that with trade-unions, Mr. Green?

Mr. GREEN. I will be very glad to tell you about that.

A man, in order to practice medicine, must qualify, must he not?

Mr. IRVING. I understand he must.

Mr. GREEN. A lawyer, in order to practice law, must qualify, must he not? And nobody else who does not qualify can practice medicine or practice law. The lawyers have even gone further than that, Congressman, and out in California they passed a law, as a result of the agitation of the lawyers, which provides that no man can practice law in California unless he first joins the Bar Association of California, which is their union. There is a closed shop of the bar association in California, and that is spreading to other States.

Mr. IRVING. Would that apply to any other professions?

Mr. GREEN. I beg your pardon?

Mr. IRVING. I mean, would the same idea apply to other professions that you know of?

Mr. GREEN. Only in the legal requirements which are that a man must, in order to practice law, qualify. He must get his degree and show that he is certified. A doctor, in order to practice medicine, must get his certificate, or, if you and I feel we would like to practice medicine or practice law, we are not admitted to the bar nor to the medical profession and we cannot do it.

Mr. IRVING. The same thing is true of dentists or accountants, is it not, and many other professions?

Mr. GREEN. I think it operates in a very large degree among other groups, yes.

Mr. IRVING. Of course, the answer I got to an inquiry such as this was that the State controls these examinations and these requirements, but I am of the opinion that the people who are on those boards and make the rules are pretty much from the profession that is involved.

Mr. GREEN. Oh, yes, they come from that profession, because they are qualified to do that.

Mr. IRVING. There are, even among employers, more or less, closed shops, are there not?

Mr. GREEN. The thing with the closed shop is for the purpose of conferring upon workers equal bargaining power with corporations. If some of the workers in this country are in the union, and some of them are not, then those who are not in the union are not subject to the set-up that might be paraded by the union and, as a result of it, the employers are the beneficiaries of the division that is created within the ranks of labor.

Mr. IRVING. I think what I actually meant was that the employers have a closed shop sometimes between themselves.

Mr. GREEN. Oh, yes; they practice it. Yes.

Mr. IRVING. I was told in my office not over 10 days ago that a certain young fellow wanted to start in the contracting business, and the other contractors warned him that there was no room for him in this territory in that business, and that by many methods that are condemned, they tried to show or prove to him that there was no room. He was followed home at night, and there were shots from weapons that disturbed his feeling of well-being. Then I recall a case about a year ago where a contractor came in from a city about 250 miles from where he is, and bid on a job after he had been told not to bid on the job; after he got there, and his equipment and machinery were on the job, some of it was bombed with dynamite, and so forth, and there was no trouble between labor and this out-of-town contractor at all. He could not lay this dynamiting to labor unions because he was an employer of union labor, and his relations were very fine with all the unions.

Mr. GREEN. I see.

Mr. IRVING. So I think these things bear some consideration and investigation.

Just below that, in the next paragraph, the second paragraph below that, on page 3, you say.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act the union can require the discharge of workers only because of nonpayment of dues.

If you had labor spies in a union, or union records in a union, you could expel them from the union, I presume, but you could not take them off the job where they are associated every day with the loyal members of the union?

Mr. GREEN. That is right. That is the objection to it. The union, under the Taft-Hartley law, is robbed of any disciplinary power over its members. For instance, it is our policy to eliminate Communists from our unions, and to deny them the right to serve as delegates to a convention or to a conference, and under the Taft-Hartley law, if you have a union shop, and some worker or 2 workers, or 5 workers, or 10, or whatever number there may be, who are admitted or proven Communists, all the disciplinary action the union can take against them is to put them out of the union, but the distasteful thing is that they have to stand by and work with them.

Our unions want to remove the Communist's influence from the unions and from the workers, and deny him the right to preach his Communist philosophy in the unions, and yet this Tart-Hartley law says we cannot do that. Just think of that, in America, where we are fighting communism.

Mr. IRVING. I think I brought——

Mr. KELLEY. You have 1 minute remaining.

Mr. IRVING. I think I brought out the question the other day that you could not take a Communist off the job even though you expelled him from the union, and it is a bit dangerous to expel people from the unions now, because they can sue you, I understand, and, in case of a court that might be prejudiced or biased, they might have a very good opportunity to sue, so it is not too well to expel people from unions.

Mr. GREEN. That is all right; surely. They have to have a good reason; otherwise they are subject to damage suits, but when our constitution provides against working with Communists and the union is informed for that purpose, we will take our chances in court, if you will remove the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. IRVING. Thank you.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Green, I think I understand everything you said in regard to the Taft-Hartley law. I have studied it very closely myself, and apparently I have gained the reputation with the fulminating radio reporter of being a sort of "hatchet man."

I want to ask you about some other things that have not been mentioned in your testimony.

Having represented some unions, I am aware of the fact that a union, like any other organization, must have disciplinary powers, and if it does not have them it cannot exist; but, as you just stated—and I was glad to hear you state the officers or trial boards of a union should have good reasons for expelling a man before he is expelled. We will certainly agree upon that. Otherwise, it is a power that amounts almost to economic execution, is it not?

Mr. GREEN. That is right. It must be used judiciously and carefully, just as the courts exercise care and caution.

Mr. JACOBS. I wonder if we could not also agree upon this, that unions, of course, are composed of men who are mortal, and are subject to the weaknesses flesh is heir to, the same as any other organization?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. And once in a while we have men at the head of organizations—unions included—who do abuse those powers. I think we can agree on that. You have seen it in your experience in the labor movement, have you not?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, but appeals can be taken to the officers of the organization, or to the organization itself, in cases where the individual feels that an injustice has been done.

Mr. JACOBS. Eventually, it can be taken to the convention, but sometimes that is a long way off.

Mr. GREEN. Then we would have redress in the courts like any other citizen.

Mr. JACOBS. Which is a very slow and cumbersome procedure, and rather costly?

Mr. GREEN. Sometimes, yes.

Mr. JACOBS. My experience has been that it generally always is. Every time you get mixed up in court I feel like the English gentleman who said if a bandit should meet him with a pistol and demand his purse he would fight him to his death, but if he met a lawyer and he said he was going to sue him, he would surrender about all he had without putting up a fight.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. What about the case where the member of a union has a controversy with a man who is in the highest authority in the union? In particular, we will take the international president. He has a controversy with someone down the line, and eventually becomes the man's judge under some constitution. Do you not feel there should be some other remedy for that man, without going through a prolonged and expensive common-law action?

Mr. GREEN. Of course, there is the matter of justice, aside from the union controversies, that ought to apply in all controversies, and the man ought to be given a fair trial, but this is not a perfect world; it is made up of imperfect people, and our unions are imperfect, and it is fair to assume that employers are imperfect; but you do not have a word in the Taft-Hartley law that says that an employer shall be persecuted or prosecuted if he does not do that.

Mr. JACOBS. I agree with you on that.

Mr. GREEN. It is all against labor.

Mr. JACOBS. I agree with you on that, but I am thinking in particular about the type of case, to give you an example, where a man who was a member of the carpenters' union in Wichita, Kans., and he made a motion before the A. F. of L. convention, as I understand it, at the 1947 convention, under mandate from the Central Labor Union of Kansas, calling upon the carpenters to abide by the historical decision of the American Federation of Labor in their dispute with the machinists' union, which sounded like good sense to me. He was a business agent for the carpenters' local out there in Wichita, Kans., and the general president of the carpenters' union wrote a letter to the local and told them to dismiss him as business agent.

In other words, he was thrown out of an office that he had been elected to by the members of his own local, for simply following out a mandate that both parties abide by the decision that you folks had made in the convention.

Do you not think that was a pretty harsh thing to do, asssuming the facts to be as I stated them?

Mr. GREEN. I stand for simple justice for every one individual, no matter where they are.

Mr. JACOBS. I believe you do, too.

Mr. GREEN. I do not know about the case of yours, but the individual, I care not who he is——

Mr. JACOBS. I was not the man's attorney. I happened to know about the case and looked over the record, and I assisted the attorney in writing some briefs.

Mr. GREEN. It is my judgment, even in that case, the individual would have the right to appeal to the executive board, or the board of directors, as we call them.

Mr. JACOBS. He also has an appeal to the courts?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, he has an appeal to the courts.

Mr. JACOBS. But ordinarily, unless it is a prejudged case, the courts, of course, would not touch it until after he exhausted all remedies within the union. In this particular case an appeal to the executive board meant nothing because they always go along with the general president. We both know that is true. You do not need to say it, but we both know it is true. He would have to wait for the next convention, which is a rather delayed remedy. That would be a very delayed remedy for a man in those circumstances.

Mr. GREEN. Certainly I would agree to that.

Mr. JACOBS. And, in another type of a case, Mr. Green, where an international takes a local union and puts it under trusteeship, and keeps it under for a long number of years—I have in mind one that was under trusteeship for 16 years—and the men who belonged to that union never had an opportunity to vote for an officer, and they never had an opportunity to vote on a contract, and when they finally got an election of officers and investigated, they found their wage scale 34 cents an hour less than the free locals in the adjoining district.

You would not approve of that?

Mr. GREEN. I do not know, of course, what was involved in these cases, but I am reluctant—

Mr. JACOBS. I understand; but assuming the facts to be as I stated.

Mr. GREEN. You know we cannot deal with individual cases. You are picking out these individual cases, but what does our great movement do, as a whole?

Mr. KELLEY. You have 1 minute remaining.

Mr. JACOBS. When you say the labor movement is the bulwark of free enterprise, I agree with you, and I will say to you that in my opinion those cases are not the rule; they are exceptions.

Mr. GREEN. Exceptions, yes.

Mr. JACOBS. But at the same time— and I cannot help it—my heart goes out to those men who are thus abused, and over and above that I believe the labor movement would be much stronger if we had some simple legislation that would require the few isolated instances where those abuses are permitted to more or less toe the line.

What do you think about that?

Mr. GREEN. What is involved in that is a question of conferring upon every individual the right to have his day in court.

Mr. JACOBS. His day in court, his voice in the government of his union.

Mr. GREEN. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, democracy within the unions, and if we have leaders who abuse democratic processes, do you not think the Government should have fair, simple legislation that requires them to observe them?

Mr. GREEN. I agree with that. I think everyone should have his day in court.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I agree with what Mr. Green has said concerning the injunction in labor disputes. However, I do want to ask him a few questions.

How long have you been connected with the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. GREEN. I have been president since 1924. I succeeded Mr. Gompers, and that was about 25 years ago.

Mr. PERKINS. You were connected with the labor movement several years before that date, I believe?

Mr. GREEN. Oh, yes; I have been with it all my life, ever since I have been of age.

Mr. PERKINS. From all of your experience, have you ever seen the occasion when the Government has benefited by the injunction in an effort to settle labor disputes?

Mr. GREEN. The Government?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. It has under the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not think you understood my question.

Mr. GREEN. You mean benefited by it?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. Oh, no, no, no, no, never. In this case that I tell you about, they issued the injunction, and it was in effect for 80 days, and of course the workers complied with it against their will; but they complied with it, and carried it out. And then the injunction ended and they were free to act, and what did they do? They got around the table and settled it through collective bargaining, and not because there was any injunction.

Mr. PERKINS. Since the adoption of the Taft-Hartley law, how many times did you say the Government had gone into court and asked for an injunction?

Mr. GREEN. Nine times, I believe it was.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes. And I believe that your evidence disclosed that in none of those instances did the injunction help settle the controversy?

Mr. GREEN. No. Instead, it hurt, in my judgment, and created ill feeling.

Mr. PERKINS. I believe it is pretty well agreed that our National Government has an inherent right to go into court and apply for an injunction in a strike that involves national health and welfare. That is your conception of the law, I believe. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. GREEN. You mean the Government possesses that as an inherent right?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. I do not know. There are some differences of opinion even among legal-minded people as to whether, in an emergency which the officers of the Government might decide was a real emergency, they had the right to issue an injunction without authority being conferred upon them to do so.

Mr. PERKINS. You know there is nothing in the Constitution of the United States that would prohibit such procedure, do you not?

Mr. GREEN. I do not think there is anything that definitely prohibits it.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you not think that it would appear to be the most unreasonable construction of the Constitution which denies to the Government created by the Constitution the right to employ and invoke the injunction if such emergency confronted the welfare of this Nation? In other words, I refer to that inherent right again.

Mr. GREEN. Of course, you are dealing with a profoundly controversial subject there, and I am not sure that the Government has that right.

Another thing that has been stated by some very able people is that the Government would have the right, under certain circumstances, such as you refer to, to take over the plant and operate it. I know that during the war such powers were conferred upon the Government, but I am not sure whether the Government possesses that power if it does so without specific provisions authorizing it to do so.

Mr. PERKINS. I personally think that the Government does possess such powers, but, now, my point is when the injunction was written into the Taft-Hartley law, do you not think that it was abused to a great extent against the employees over this Nation, and against unions?

Mr. GREEN. Of course, that is part of our objection to it, and then the other part is that the exercise of governmental power through the judiciary and labor disputes should not be conferred upon the courts.

Mr. JACOBS. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; but I want to say I am wholly in accord with that last statement of Mr. Green.

Mr. JACOBS. I want to say for the record that it is my judgment that the Government has no inherent power to procure an injunction except that which would be the same inherent power of a government to set up a provisional government if chaos became so great that action was just demanded in order to prevent the abolition of law and order. I do not believe that that inherent power exists. The fact that it is in the Constitution, does not spell it out, because our Government is one of delegated powers and, therefore, if it is not delegated, I cannot believe the Government has it. Of course, any person has the right to maintain order if chaos becomes great enough. At least, those are my views. I wanted them on the record.

Mr. PERKINS. In response to that, I disagree with the gentleman from Indiana, because under article II, section 1, clause 1, of the Constitution that sets out that the executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States, and by virue of article II, section 3, "he shall take care that the laws are faithfully executed."

Mr. JACOBS. That is right.

Mr. PERKINS. And article II, section 1, clause 7, requires that he preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution. If such an emergency that confronts the country was to arise which affected the health and welfare of this Nation, and it was necessary to invoke the injunction—I have never seen a time when that was necessary—we know what a successful part labor played in winning the war—but if that time were to arrive, there is nothing in the Constitution that would prohibit the President from resorting to courts for the injunction to effectively execute the laws of this country. That constitutionally inherent power is not prohibited by the Constitution, and it would certainly be a weakness on the part of our Government that was created by the Constitution——

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman has 1 minute.

Mr. PERKINS. If we could not effectively protect our people in time of great peril without any express law to that effect. That is my belief about the matter.

Mr. GREEN. As I say, there is a difference of opinion on it, of course.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GREEN. And let me point this out: After all, the workers of the American Typographical Union are American citizens.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. And interested in the preservation of our form of Government.

Mr. PERKINS. That is right.

Mr. GREEN. And are interested in serving the people and the public. We must keep in mind, now, their patriotism, as well as the patriotism of others.

Mr. PERKINS. Sure.

Mr. GREEN. Let me tell you that during the war period the workers of America surrendered their rights to strike. They made a solemn pledge to the President of the United States that they would not resort to strike for the duration of the war—until victory was won. They kept that pledge 99 percent during the war. Is that not an exhibition of patriotism?

Mr. PERKINS. It certainly is.

Mr. GREEN. Another thing I want to tell you is that during the war the officers of the United States Government called upon the unions—not the individuals—to render special service here, there, and in different places throughout the Nation.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Wier?

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield 1 minute to me?

Mr. WIER. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. I wanted to make myself clear that I agree with your remarks.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. The only reason that this question of injunctions is controversial, as you say, is that the Government has that authority and others do not?

Mr. GREEN. Others do not; yes. There is a difference of opinion.

Mr. PERKINS. But I wholeheartedly agree with your remarks with reference to the use of the injunction.

I do not believe in it.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier, you have 9 minutes.

Mr. WIER. Mr. Green, sitting here on this committee for 10 days now, and listening to many employers and trade associations elaborate upon their attitude toward the present labor relations law, I have gathered some very interesting points of information. One is the fact that a lot of stress is being placed upon a number of particular instances of labor disputes as to the effect upon the economy.

Have you any knowledge as to the total number of labor contracts in the United States that are in existence and functioning?

Mr. GREEN. I could not give you the number because I have not assembled that information, but there is a very large number. We have practically 8,000,000 members in the American Federation of Labor who are working under contracts, and that are negotiating through collective bargaining with the employers.

Mr. WIER. I will give you the figure I have—between the A. F. of L. and CIO there are 100,000 labor contracts functioning as of this time.

Mr. GREEN. I think you are pretty well correct on it, although I have not the correct figures here.

Mr. WIER. Do you happen to know how many contracts the A. F. of L. has?

Mr. GREEN. No, I do not.

Mr. WIER. What would be your guess in all of this collective bargaining that goes on in every hamlet and in every county and in every city in the United States, as to the percentage of these contracts which become involved in a dispute that needs law?

Mr. GREEN. A very small percentage.

Mr. WIER. You would say a very small percentage?

Mr. GREEN. Practically all of them were negotiated without resort to a single moment's stoppage of work.

Mr. WIER. Let me give you this review that I have gotten in these hearings, dependent upon the type of employer or management that was presenting their point of view.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. WIER. This is the way they feel about sections of the Taft-Hartley law.

In the big mass-production industries, particularly, they say: No. 1, the section is essentially needed for the prohibition of the foremen's right to organize.

No. 2, opposition to the closed shop.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. WIER. No. 3, it is very necessary to have the injunction. And then they follow the injunction with the necessity for suit, suability.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. WIER. For violation of the contract. And then we have heard very specifically the objections of management to the so-called jurisdictional dispute, and that is followed with the secondary boycott and then the national emergency.

Now, we come down to some points that quite a number of employing management are in accord with, that there were some provisions in the Taft-Hartley Act which have since proved to be mistakes.

Do you want to comment on that?

Mr. GREEN. I will tell you, first of all, so far as foremen are concerned, I think that that is a right that they should determine for themselves. I do not think any restriction should be placed upon them because they are workers and they are servants. There may be officers in the corporation close to the company who occupy a little different status. In a closed shop, their objection to the closed shop, as you have said, is fundamental with the employers and that is because they want the unions, as I have said, to be weaker. A union operating under a closed shop is stronger than a union operating under an open shop agreement, and there is no equality in bargaining power. That is the purpose of the Taft-Hartley law, to weaken the organizations and make them weaker so they can deal with them better.

Mr. WIER. I want to get this in, and I have only 9 minutes, now.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. WIER. This is the forecast that I make, and I want you to elaborate upon it. After all of these years of experience I have had in the trade-union movement it is my conviction that if unemployment increases to the degree that it has in the past, it may be very difficult. We have been under the Taft-Hartley Act at a time when everybody has had a job.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. WIER. Conditions have been fairly decent, and have been made so by contract.

We are pondering here in the Congress as to what the immediate future is going to bring about. I hear it every day on the floor, the threat of unemployment.

Under unemployment, Mr. Green, with your 8,000,000 members, and with the continuance of the Taft-Hartley in operation, and every union hall and every union with a substantial of unemployed members, what is going to happen? What is going to be the threat?

Mr. GREEN. We will have a very chaotic condition, in my judgment: the worst economic situation that we have ever seen in the history of America, particularly if this Taft-Hartley law stays in effect.

Mr. WIER. What part do you think, let us say, left wingers in our trade-union movement will play with unemployment prevailing?

Mr. GREEN. It is difficult to anticipate what part they will play, but it is my judgment they will take advantage of the situation to create chaos and confusion and economic disturbances as between industry and labor.

Mr. WIER. Do you think the Taft-Hartley Act will be good ammunition for them?

Mr. GREEN. Absolutely, the best kind.

Mr. WIER. I just wanted you to elaborate on that, because I have some fear of that question.

Mr. GREEN. That is the way I feel. I am apprehensive about it, because, as you well pointed out, this law has operated for about 1 year during a period when our country was passing through a time when practically everybody was employed, and that makes a difference. But with unemployment a decided change will come, and then we will be faced more and more with the difficulties in the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. WIER. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. First of all, Mr. Green, I want to say that I am sorry I was unavoidably detained and could not be here for your oral presentation, but I have sketched through your written presentation, and I believe you have very ably given labor's objection to the Taft-Hartley Act.

There are a few questions I would like to develop along the lines of the other questions that have been developed.

I was particularly interested in one answer you made to a question by either Mr. Jacobs or Mr. Perkins about the injunction. You said your feeling was that the injunction was primarily bad because of the bad feeling that it created among the people who were involved in the injunction.

Is that not because they feel that the original premise of the injunction is that they must of necessity be wrong on their side of the labor dispute, or that is the court's feeling, that they must necessarily be wrong, or an injunction would not issue; is that not just about the way they feel about it?

Mr. GREEN. You are right. They are moved by a deep sense of injustice because they feel that the cause of the dispute is a matter of justice and equity to be settled in a just way, and then when the injunction is issued they immediately feel that the Government has stepped in and taken sides with the employer against them.

Mr. BURKE. That is right, and they feel they have as much right——

Mr. GREEN. And they resent it.

Mr. BURKE. Sure.

Mr. GREEN. Because they feel they are entitled to the same consideration as the employer.

Mr. BURKE. And they feel they have as much right to free enterprise as does their employer?

Mr. GREEN. Certainly.

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. They sell their labor to the employer and the employer sells the product of labor. "There is no injunction restraining him, but there is an injunction restraining me." It is a sense of injustice.

Mr. BURKE. There was another question Mr. Wier talked about that I would like to refer to.

A great deal of testimony has been given by various employers and corporations, presidents, and so on, on this subject of organization of foremen.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE. Would it not be very difficult to write a law which would determine at what level collective bargaining should start and end, and also might it not be very difficult to write into the law the conditions that apply, maybe, by tradition, in various industries?

Mr. GREEN. It would be very difficult, because in writing such a law it is reasonable to conclude that an injustice would be done. You could not draw the line where equal justice would be done, even though you are moved by an honest and unselfish purpose. Besides, the foreman works for wages, salaries—whatever it is—as an American citizen, and he should not be denied the right to try and bargain a little better for higher wages and salaries. And many of the foremen have no power to hire or discharge workers. They are just foremen directing workers here and there in their line of work. It is difficult to draw a line of distinction between the group or that type of individual, and the worker on the assembly line, if I may put it that way. It is very difficult.

Mr. BURKE. And it is also very difficult to say that a foreman over in this industry—we will use for an example the building trades—who is the same sort of individual with the same sort of powers as the man called a foreman in an automobile plant.

Mr. GREEN. Sure. It is not on a Nation-wide standardized basis, the difference in trades, and yet in a law you prohibit everybody, no matter what the circumstances are. Foremen in a plant where, maybe, two to five thousand or ten thousand people are employed, and a foreman in a plant where only two or three are employed—it applies to all.

And, now, how can you do justice?

Mr. BURKE. You cannot.

You have stated that you have spent some 25 years as president of the American Federation of Labor, and I know a good many years before that in the labor movement, and I know that you were also a predecessor of mine in the Ohio State Legislature.

Mr. GREEN. Yes; I am in your fraternity.

Mr. BURKE. We can, I guess, truthfully and frankly say that our existence has been pretty much what is termed in the vernacular, living in a goldfish bowl.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE. That is, the general public knows pretty much about us. Our backgrounds are pretty well known all the way through.

Mr. GREEN. That is right.

Mr. BURKE. In order to carry on our daily business, and the affairs of the line of pursuit that we have followed throughout our lives, we have been required by the Taft-Hartley Act to prove our Americanism.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE. Where no other profession, trade, or line of work has been required to do that, is that not correct?

Mr. GREEN. That is correct, under the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. BURKE. That is right. And is that not pretty much our reason for objecting to the Communist affidavit?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE. Not because we felt that we could not sign it—we would be willing to sign such an affidavit every day of the week—but the idea was that we had to sign it in order to carry on our line of work.

Mr. GREEN. That is right. The chief objection on the part of labor is that they feel they are reduced to a secondard status. They must, in order to exercise collective-bargaining power, file non-Communist affidavits. The employer and the manager, the representative of the company with whom they deal, do not have to do that. It is assumed that you may be in the Communist class, and the other fellows never are.

Mr. BURKE. That is it.

Mr. GREEN. They resent that secondary status position.

Mr. BURKE. By virtue of the line we follow we are presumed to be guilty until we prove ourselves innocent?

Mr. GREEN. That is it.

Mr. BURKE. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Lesinski?

Mr. LESINSKI. I will reserve my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Green, would you say that the influence of the Communist in union affairs has increased or decreased during the past year?

Mr. GREEN. I think their activities have increased, although we have the American Federation of Labor pretty free from Communist influence, but in some organizations that I know of they have been pretty active, and are increasingly active.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Would you say that the influence of the Communists has increased or decreased in labor unions during the past year?

Mr. GREEN. I think perhaps it has increased a little since the Taft-Hartley law was passed.

Mr. MCCONNELL. You mean they have more influence now than before the Taft-Hartley was passed?

Mr. GREEN. Our influence is great——

Mr. MCCONNELL. You say that the Communists have more influence now in labor unions than they had prior, we will say, to the passage of the Taft-Hartley?

Mr. GREEN. I do not know that I would put it that way, but I think they are more inclined to be Communists than before the law was passed.

Mr. MCCONNELL. What proof have you, Mr. Green?

Mr. GREEN. Because of speeches.

Mr. MCCONNELL. It is not obvious by elections; Communists have been taking a beating, as a whole.

Mr. GREEN. I do not know how you would interpret the last election.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I am speaking of the elections of Communists in unions.

Mr. GREEN. We do not have much trouble with them, because we would not allow Communists to be in our union if we knew it, or to serve as delegates to conventions, or as officers, and so forth.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Do you still say that the influence of Communists has increased in unions since the passage of the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. GREEN. I think in some lines, yes.

Mr. MCCONNELL. What lines?

Mr. GREEN. Some unions.

Mr. MCCONNELL. What unions?

Mr. GREEN. I do not know that I could enumerate them at the present time.

Mr. MCCONNELL. If the Taft-Hartley Act is repealed, and if unemployment should increase due to declining economic activity, do you believe that the reenactment of the Wagner Act would reduce the influence of Communists in unions, in the light of the experience prior to the enactment of the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. GREEN. It is my opinion that the reenactment of the Wagner Act, with the amendments provided in your bill dealing with jurisdictional disputes, boycotts, and emergency strikes, will tend to eliminate the influence of communism in a very wonderful way among the workers of the Nation. I tried to make that plain in the statement that I submitted this morning. Communism thrives on discontent and dissatisfaction and poverty and hunger, and surely one who has been a student of world affairs must arrive at that conclusion, because as I stated, the workers of every other nation in the world except America have turned to the left, towards communism or socialism; and we are the last stronghold of the thoroughly free enterprise system.

Mr. MCCONNELL. How do you explain the rise of communism and communistic influence in unions prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, when unemployment was higher and when wages were at the greatest rate in the history of our country?

Mr. GREEN. Partly because of discontent and dissatisfaction.

Mr MCCONNELL. Not over the Taft-Hartley law, because the Taft-Hartley law was not in existence. It was the Wagner Act, then.

Mr. GREEN. What I tried to emphasize was that the Taft-Hartley law was increasing what we already had.

Mr. McConnell. I do not see that where communistic influence is concerned. There may be some parts that bring unrest, but I do not think you are quite accurate in your statement that the communistic influence has increased in the recent past in unions.

Mr. Green. My dear sir, who knows best? The man who lives close to them every day, or the man who follows a professional life, and does not come in contact with them?

Mr. McConnell. I would say the man who reads the papers and observes the results would be qualified to judge that just as well as anyone else.

Mr. Green. But isn't the man who lives close to and talks to people, talks to the workers, hears their expressions of opinion, their feelings, in a position to learn more than a man who never comes in contact with them?

Mr. McConnell. I do not know what you mean by "never comes in contact with them." I think he has ordinary intelligence and can read papers as to the results of elections in unions and union activities.

Mr. Green. I will tell you, my dear boy——

Mr. McConnell. That is a compliment.

Mr. Green. Well, I want to address you nicely.

Mr. McConnell. Surely.

Mr. Green. We have learned that the newspapers and the commentators on the radio and the columnists, and so forth, have lost the confidence of the people in America. When we read an article now by them or hear them over the radio, we wonder whether they were right or not, because surely during the last campaign they convinced the people of America that they did not know what they were talking about.

Mr. McConnell. Your case is with the newspapers, then, and not with me, sir.

Mr. Green. But you were basing your opinion on that, on what they read.

Mr. McConnell. You will have to take it up with the newspapers as to whether they tell the facts or not.

Mr. Green. I want to advise you, when you read, before you arrive at an opinion, reserve it.

Mr. McConnell. And listen to only one segment of our society? Would that be your theory?

Now, in connection with national emergency strikes, it says here in H. R. 2032:

> Whenever the President finds that a national emergency is threatened or exists because a stoppage of work has resulted or threatens to result from a labor dispute (including the expiration of a collective-bargaining agreement) in a vital industry which affects the public interest, he shall issue a proclamation to that effect and call upon the parties to the dispute to refrain from a stoppage of work, or if such stoppage has occurred, to resume work and operations in the public interest.

Speaking as president of the American Federation of Labor, if such a proclamation were issued, would your organization observe it, sir?

Mr. Green. Yes, sir.

Mr. McConnell. You would?

Mr. Green. Yes, sir.

Mr. McConnell. In other words, there would be no question about inherent powers or anything like that?

Mr. Green. There is no question. We shall respond to the request of the President of the United States in an emergency. As I told the committee here a while ago, during the war we pledged the President that we would not stop work a single minute for any cause, and we carried it out, and we will do it in this case.

Mr. McConnell. Do you favor H. R. 2032? That is the Lesinski bill?

Mr. Green. The emergency section?

Mr. McConnell. No. The bill. Do you favor the bill?

Mr. Green. Yes, sir.

Mr. McConnell. Do you oppose any parts of it at all?

Mr. Green. No. The sections dealing with boycotts, jurisdictional disputes, and emergencies are acceptable to the American Federation of Labor. We endorse it, and we will support it.

Mr. McConnell. Will H. R. 2032 bring industrial peace in your judgment?

Mr. Green. I think it will serve to promote industrial peace and cooperation between management and labor.

Mr. McConnell. Will it assure the settlement of national emergency strikes?

Mr. Green. You say, the settlement of emergency strikes?

Mr. McConnell. Yes. Will it assure their settlement so that the public is not threatened as to their health, safety, and welfare?

Mr. Green. Experience is a good teacher in life. We learn more valuable lessons that way than we do in the academic way. And experience in the railroad situation has shown that the plan which is included in this bill has served to promote settlement of wage disputes without resorting to strike. Now, if it works well among the owners of railroads and their employees, is it not reasonable to conclude that it will work well among others?

Mr. McConnell. Except that we did have a railway strike, and at that time, if you remember, President Truman wanted to draft the workers into the Army to handle it.

Mr. Green. There are exceptions in everything, Mr. Congressman. You cannot have a perfect situation.

Mr. McConnell. But that did assure a settlement.

Mr. Green. Yes. In legislation, we should not deal with exceptions. We ought to deal with the general situation.

Mr. McConnell. My time has expired. Thank you, Mr. Green.

Mr. Kelley. Mr. Smith?

Mr. Smith. Mr. Green, I heard your testimony 2 years ago, and at that time you stated, I believe, that the house of labor demands that the Wagner Act be kept intact with no changes. I believe that is what you said here before the committee.

Mr. Green. I do not recall, but that is what I hoped we would do.

Mr. Smith. Now, you stated to Mr. McConnell that you favored this bill.

Mr. Green. Yes. You expect us to be reasonable; do you not?

Mr. Smith. Yes, sir.

Mr. Green. And we do not want to be arbitrary, because there are a lot of Members in Congress who have denounced me and denounced our representatives because they said that we occupied a negative position, unyielding. When asked if we favored measures to deal with certain things, they said that we said, "No; nothing." Now, we have come to meet that objection, and we say we will go that far. We are willing to do that.

Mr. SMITH. And, of course, last year I think you testified that you did not favor any legislation as far as jurisdictional strikes or secondary boycotts were concerned.

Mr. GREEN. No, because we hoped and believed, and we still believe—but we want to yield to public opinion and public sentiment—that we can set up agencies in our own movement which will provide for the settlement of jurisdictional disputes. I do not know whether you followed us or not, but in the building and construction trades department, we have made progress in doing that. Agencies have been set up for the settlement of jurisdictional disputes, and as a result, jurisdictional disputes have been greatly reduced.

Mr. SMITH. And when you speak of public opinion and say that you recognize public opinion, you mean the public at large, and not the members of the union?

Mr. GREEN. I mean public opinion. We are susceptible to public opinion because we are a part of it.

Mr. SMITH. Now, you stated, and made great point, that the house of labor took the pledge that there would be no strikes during the war.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. But you do not want to infer that there were no strikes; do you?

Mr. GREEN. I said, we kept it 99 percent.

Mr. HINES. Ninety-nine and nine-tenths.

Mr. GREEN. Well, Mr. Hines tells me that it was 99.9. But I put it at 99 percent. I thought that was a pretty good record.

Mr. SMITH. Well, that might vary. But I do not want to get the idea that when you said you took the no-strike pledge, there were no strikes there in the war. A lot of men did strike.

Mr. GREEN. Oh, men become mad and act in anger, and you have to get at them right away and have them cool down. Don't you find that in families? You know we are not living in a perfect world.

Mr. SMITH. I have found it not only in families, but in a lot of other places. We find it here in Congress.

No further questions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Nixon?

Mr. SMITH. I yield the balance of my time to Mr. Nixon.

Mr. KELLEY. Go ahead, Mr. Nixon.

Mr. NIXON. Mr. Green, how many members has the A. F. of L. lost since the Taft-Hartley Act was passed?

Mr. GREEN. I do not think we have lost any.

Mr. NIXON. Have you gained?

Mr. GREEN. Probably so. But we did it in spite of the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. NIXON. You said the Taft-Hartley law was passed to weaken the A. F. of L. and the CIO?

Mr. GREEN. It did.

Mr. NIXON. But you gained members?

Mr. GREEN. Yes. It weakened our bargaining power: it weakened our moral and economic influence, tending to prevent us from getting decent wages for the workers. Then as a result of it, if the tide turns, which we expect it to do, we will lose members.

Mr. NIXON. Referring now to the experience to date, and then referring to the experience of the future, because I realize that there can be a difference, the experience to date is that, as a matter of fact, the A. F. of L. has gained a considerable number of members in the past two years.

Mr. GREEN. Our membership has been maintained in spite of the Taft-Hartley law and because they are fighting to have it repealed.

Mr. NIXON. As far as bargaining and contracts are concerned, you have not been able to negotiate any advantageous contracts during the past year and a half?

Mr. GREEN. Our difficulties have increased in negotiating agreements under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. NIXON. As a matter of fact, you have the best contracts now that you have ever had, have you not?

Mr. GREEN. In some respects. Wages are better because of the economic situation.

Mr. NIXON. Again, as far as being specific as to how the law has either caused a loss in membership or less advantageous contracts, it is rather difficult to point out, is it not?

Mr. GREEN. I am telling you that our membership has been maintained in spite of the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. NIXON. I see. In other words, as I get your view, you have gained in membership, and you have the best contracts in history, but that is due to the fact that the Taft-Hartley law was a law which was passed for the purpose of weakening your unions and making it impossible for you to have good contracts?

Mr. GREEN. It is for the purpose of weakening our unions in collective bargaining.

Mr. NIXON. I see.

Mr. GREEN. We cannot deal as effectively where an open shop prevails as we can where a closed shop prevails. We know that from experience.

Mr. NIXON. Mr. Reporter, I hope that you are getting all this down in the record, because it may sound a bit contradictory in spots, but I want to be sure that the record is straight.

Now, Mr. Green, in addition to the provisions that are in the present Lesinski bill, would you have any objection to adding the provision which is in the Taft-Hartley Act requiring both management and unions to bargain in good faith?

Mr. GREEN. I do not think it is necessary. But speaking for myself personally, I would have no serious objections, provided you require management and the owners of industry to do the same thing.

Mr. NIXON. Yes. I agree with you that it should be a two-way street, in other words, at the bargaining table.

Mr. GREEN. You agree with me?

Mr. NIXON. When you said, "to bargain in good faith."

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. I believe the law should require, as the present Taft-Hartley Act does, that both management and unions bargain in good faith. I do, yes.

Referring to the clause on liability for contracts, do you have any specific objection to that; that is, union liability for contracts?

Mr. GREEN. I see no need for including in the act any clause which provides for damage suits because of some failure to comply fully with the contract, because you are opening an opportunity for a designing—not all employers are that way—but for designing employers to utilize stooges in their employment to provoke violations of contracts in order to establish a basis for damage suits. And that is not good judgment. That is not good business.

Mr. NIXON. In other words, because of the possibility that some contract violations might be instigated by employers, you do not think that a provision should be in the act which makes unions specifically liable for contracts?

Mr. GREEN. I should not be in favor of having such a provision in the act.

Mr. NIXON. If the act were to provide a specific exception so far as the matter you mentioned is concerned, would you have any objection to it?

Mr. GREEN. How are you going to establish exceptions?

Mr. NIXON. You just established one yourself.

Mr. GREEN. I see. How are you going to establish there were stooges? The owner brings them in; they are his men. They work there, and plan and plot, and do it under cover and it is difficult to establish. We have difficulty with fellows in our movement now who want to promote strikes for any cause and for no cause, and we have to fight them.

Mr. NIXON. Then as far as you are concerned, you oppose that provision?

Mr. GREEN. Yes; I should oppose that.

Mr. NIXON. Now, you mentioned this situation. I think you used the example of the State bar of California on the closed shop.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. And you pointed out that at the present time, a lawyer, in order to practice in California, must become a member of the State bar.

Mr. GREEN. The State bar association.

Mr. NIXON. Which is, of course, governed by a statute which lays down the rule.

Mr. GREEN. That is a lawyers' union. We classify that as a lawyers' union.

Mr. NIXON. Yes; I understand that.

Would you favor similar treatment for unions?

Mr. GREEN. By law?

Mr. NIXON. Yes

Mr. GREEN. Statute?

Mr. NIXON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. No. Do not ask us.

Mr. NIXON. You mean, you do not want the same rule to apply to unions as applies to the State bar?

Mr. GREEN. All that we ask is to give up the right to bargain collectively with the employer on that point.

Mr. NIXON. You are aware of the fact that the rule in California regarding the State bar and in other States where they have the same system, requires that the State bar association take into membership any person who passes the bar examination?

Mr. GREEN. I am not sure about that.

Mr. NIXON. That is the case. I know it. You see, you were speaking from your experience a moment ago. I am speaking from mine. I am a member of that bar.

Mr. GREEN. I see.

Mr. NIXON. And that is the case. Now, would you have any objection to a provision in the law which, if it allowed the so-called closed shop—and I recognize the variations in that—if it allowed the so-called closed shop, which would require that the union do just what the State bar of California does, allow anybody to become a member who is qualified under the rules of the union?

Mr. GREEN. That is generally the rule. That is the rule with the American Federation of Labor now, without any statute.

Mr. NIXON. Then you would have no objection to a law providing that?

Mr. GREEN. Why write it in a law when it is practiced, anyhow? But if a man comes and makes application for a job to get work and he is not a member of the union, all right; all he needs to do is join the union, as you join the bar association in California. That is all.

Mr. NIXON. Then your testimony is that there are no unions in the A. F. of L. which a man cannot go out and join today if he qualifies?

Mr. GREEN. No; I do not think so, generally speaking. Our A. F. of L. is against discrimination because of race, color, creed, or nationality. We set that forth, and we are opposed to any discrimination. But in some highly skilled trades, there come times during periods of unemployment when they have a tremendous big waiting list already in the union of men who are out of jobs and cannot find work anywhere, and they establish a rule that we will not take any more members into our union until our waiting list has been given employment.

That is a matter of procedure to protect them in their work.

Mr. NIXON. Then as far as you are concerned, you would object to a provision in the law which might allow unions to negotiate closed shop contracts but which would in effect require the unions to be open?

Mr. GREEN. I think that is a subject for contract negotiation, just the same as the employer can contract with the buyer of his goods for the sale of his goods.

Mr. NIXON. You think that a negotiating employer could insist that the union be open before he entered into a closed shop contract?

Mr. GREEN. If he can do that around the bargaining table, and we have many of them do that. But finally we worked out an agreement. Some are open shop agreements; some are closed shops.

Mr. NIXON. I am not speaking of the open and closed shop. I am speaking in this case of a closed shop contract with an open union, where anybody can join the union.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. You say that in some cases the unions have agreed to do that in order to get a closed-shop contract with the employer?

Mr. GREEN. No, I did not say that. The point I am trying to make plain, and I think you are, too, is that there are many employers who prefer the closed-shop arrangement to the open shop, because security and peace are established, and they are dealing with skilled workers. Take many of the building and construction contractors. They want the closed shop. They want it even more than the workers themselves, because it means stability to them, and security, and then the highest and the best type of service. They want it. But this Taft-Hartley law says that it is a crime if you sit around the table and negotiate such an agreement, notwithtsanding the fact that both of you want it.

Mr. NIXON. Then as I understand the sense of what you are saying, you say that if you do have a closed shop contract, the union should be open. You would agree with that statement; would you not?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, I agree that the union should accord them an opportunity to come in. But I do not think you need to define that by legislation. I should be opposed to having it in any statute.

Mr. NIXON. You mentioned a moment ago that under the law a union member in a union shop under the Taft-Hartley Act could be required to work with a Communist. And the example you gave was that the union might deny membership to a person who was a Communist, in the rank and file.

Mr. GREEN. That is right.

Mr. NIXON. And the employer would then keep him on the pay roll?

Mr. GREEN. That is right.

Mr. NIXON. And therefore you would then have a situation where the employer was forcing the union men to work——

Mr. GREEN. With a Communist.

Mr. NIXON. With a Communist.

Can you give one specific example in which that has happened in the last year and a half?

Mr. GREEN. I have not assembled the information on that. I do not know. But I am talking about what this Taft-Hartley Act provides.

Mr. NIXON. What it could do?

Mr. GREEN. Yes; what it could do.

Mr. NIXON. Will you furnish the committee one specific example before we get into executive session?

Mr. GREEN. I will look and see if it has ever happened. I do not know whether it has or not. But the law says it can.

Mr. NIXON. I understand.

Mr. GREEN. I am talking against the law and what the law provides. You are asking me what has been our experience.

Mr. NIXON. Obviously, we can interpret a law and bend its interpretation and set up all types of possibilities. I think we all recognize that. But laws are, of course, passed to deal with what we expect human experience to be. And in this case, the assumption was that if a union discharged a man from membership because he was a Communist, it was very difficult for us, who wrote this provision in the act, to think that the employer would insist that a Communist remain on the pay roll when he could fire him.

Mr. GREEN. That is what the law provides.

Mr. NIXON. I will say this: If you do give me one specific example of that, I will see that it gets to the press, because I think it would make quite an interesting case study.

The last point that I want to cover is the one that I think the country is more concerned about than anything else, and it is a real problem, as you have indicated, and that is the case of the so-called emergency strikes. As I understand it, you favor the provision of the Lesinski bill, as opposed to the injunctive procedure.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. You, of course, are aware of the fact that Mr. Tobin and Mr. Clark, the Attorney General, have indicated that in the event the provision of the Lesinski bill proves inadequate to stop a strike which proves to be dangerous to the national interest, in such a case the President would have inherent power to step in and take some action.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. That was their opinion, and I recognize that you indicated that you might disagree with that opinion.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. After all, Mr. Clark, as the Attorney General, is the last word on the interpretation of this bill. If that is the way the Administration is going to interpret the Lesinski bill—and they have indicated they will interpret it that way—will you prefer to have that emergency power lodged in the President to be used whenever he considers a strike as constituting a national emergency, rather than to have it outlined in an act specifically as to just how far he can go, and no further?

Mr. GREEN. I should be opposed to having it set forth in any statute whatsoever. If, on the other hand, that power is vested in the President and it is an inherent power that he can exercise, that is for him to decide, or for whoever is President to decide.

Mr. NIXON. Would you prefer, Mr. Green, that the President, under his emergency power, could, in a certain dispute, issue an order drafting workers into the armed services? Would you prefer that to the injunctive procedure of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. GREEN. Both of them are reprehensible; both methods.

Mr. NIXON. Both are reprehensible?

Mr. GREEN. Neither one is American. They are not in accord with American principles and traditions.

Mr. NIXON. The only point I want to make is this: Under the interpretation which Mr. Tobin and Mr. Clark have made of the Lesinski provision, there is not only that possibility, but there is a possibility of other action by the President which I think that you and other leaders of organized labor should take into consideration as the alternative to the present provision of the act. I assume that you have, and that you have come to the conclusion. But I think that you must recognize that the President, under the act, according to the interpretation of the Attorney General, would have the power to step in and probably take action against a union which, in my opinion, could be much more harmful to organized labor than the present provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Nixon, you have 1 minute left.

Mr. GREEN. I do not think we will ever reach that if you adopt this bill as provided for, the section dealing with the emergency power.

Mr. NIXON. You do not think the President would ever use the power?

Mr. GREEN. I do not think he would ever be required to. I think a settlement would be worked out through the exercise of good judgment and during the cooling-off period as provided for in this act that you are now considering.

Mr. NIXON. I have just one more question.

Mr. KELLEY. You have a half minute.

Mr. NIXON. I would like to say that there are a number of points on which we have agreed and disagreed, and we will continue to, probably. But I would like to say in closing that I was particularly interested in your comments concerning the work of the A. F. of L.'s representatives abroad.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. I had the privilege of meeting Mr. Irving Brown, your representative in Italy, 2 years ago, and I subscribe to your remarks 100 percent as to the work the A. F. of L. is doing abroad in developing free trade-union leadership in opposition to the Communist trade-union leadership.

Mr. GREEN. That is right. I am glad you found that out. And we have additional members there doing the same work.

Mr. KELLEY. Your time has expired.

Mr. Lesinski, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Green, I want to refer you back to communism, a thing that you and I not only hate, but we think is un-American.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. LESINSKI. The question was asked of you, Is communism on the increase on account of the Taft-Hartley Act? The proof of the pudding is in my own election, when a candidate delegated by the Communists to run against me got over 13,000 votes. That is something that never happened in my district. And they used the argument that I did not fight hard enough to eliminate the Taft-Hartley Act, although it was in my power.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. LESINSKI. And when the regular election came, my opponent on the regular ticket used this same newspaperman to write the same type of articles.

Mr. GREEN. I see.

Mr. LESINSKI. So apparently communism is on the increase.

Mr. GREEN. That is the evidence there, surely.

Mr. LESINSKI. Now, is it not a fact, as far as trade-unions are concerned, that the biggest job to eliminate Communists was done by Walter Reuther?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. LESINSKI. He fought the Communistic outfit all through their union, and has eliminated most of them.

Mr. GREEN. Yes; that is right.

Mr. MCCONNELL. May I ask a question?

Mr. KELLEY. Do you yield?

Mr. LESINSKI. I yield to Mr. McConnell.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Has he been able to eliminate them during the past year?

Mr. LESINSKI. He has eliminated a good many of them.

Mr. MCCONNELL. During the past year?

Mr. LESINSKI. Well, the past 2 years.

Mr. BURKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY. Will you yield to Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Will you yield at that point, Mr. Lesinski?

Mr. LESINSKI. I yield to Mr. Burke.

Mr. BURKE. Is it not a fact that that battle has been going on over a period of 12 years, rather than the last year?

Mr. LESINSKI. It has gone on, and, of course, all of us remember when that particular union was organized, by John Lewis. He took all his fair birds into the union for organization purposes. Now the present officials have a hard time getting rid of them. But they are doing the best job possible.

The same thing was brought up as far as the present coal strike is concerned.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg your pardon. That is no strike.

Mr. LESINSKI. That is what I want to bring out.

The gentleman testifying for the Southern Coal Association stated they set this present strike.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. LESINSKI. Well, is it not a fact that Mr. Lewis has a bargaining agreement that he can choose any 2 weeks within a year for a vacation period?

Mr. GREEN. That is my understanding; yes.

Mr. LESINSKI. That is my understanding.

Mr. GREEN. There is no strike or violation of the contract.

Mr. LESINSKI. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. GREEN. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. LESINSKI. Now, Mr. Green, the last question I want to ask you is a question that Mr. Nixon asked about his bar association's taking all members that passed the bar.

Do they not discharge a good many of those members and throw them out of the bar association because of certain doings that are not ethical?

Mr. GREEN. I could not answer that question. But it is my understanding——

Mr. LESINSKI. Every State has that same law.

Mr. GREEN. It is my understanding that they have disciplined their members.

Mr. LESINSKI. And naturally, they never can do the same thing again and practice law.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. LESINSKI. Well, you have the same thing in your closed-shop unions.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. LESINSKI. If a man becomes a rat, you try to get rid of him.

Mr. GREEN. Of course, and you have to do it in order to have the contract that you entered into with an employer carried out to the letter.

Mr. LESINSKI. That is right. I agree with the gentleman.

That is all, Mr. Kelley.

Mr. SMITH. I would like to ask Mr. Lesinski a question.

Mr. KELLEY. Will you yield to Mr. Smith?

Mr. LESINSKI. I yield to Mr. Smith.

Mr. SMITH. Do I understand you to say that John Lewis made a deal with the Communists when he started organizing the CIO?

Mr. LESINSKI. No. He did not make a deal with them, but he had them in as organizers.

Mr. SMITH. That was under the Wagner Act?

Mr. LESINSKI. Well, that had nothing to do with John Lewis.

Mr. KELLEY. All time has expired.

Thank you very much, Mr. Green. You have made a good contribution to the work of the committee.

Mr. GREEN. Thank you. Thank you, all of you. I appreciate the questions that all of you have asked me, because it brought out points that I think have helped us.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Woodruff Randolph, president of the International Typographical Union.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, in the course of human events, the stomach gets empty. And in the course of missing so many meals and living irregularly, we develop stomach ulcers.

Mr. KELLEY. We will recess for lunch as soon as Mr. Randolph is finished. The purpose is that the House is in general debate, and it is likely to go into the reading of a bill, and then we cannot meet. So we will continue with Mr. Randolph and finish with him, and then we will recess for lunch.

Mr. JACOBS. That still does not help us in our irregular habits. I am putting in about 16 or 17 hours a day here—we were here until after midnight last night—and I frankly do not think it fair to the members to have to sit here. I do not know how the witness feels about it, whether he wants to proceed. I imagine he also eats once in a while.

Mr. KELLEY. The Chair is going to rule that we will hear this witness, and then we will recess.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Chairman, continuing on with this, would it not be sound procedure to decide how many we are going to hear in the course of the day, so that they will not sit around here until all hours and then be told we cannot hear them anyhow, which is unfair to the witnesses here and also unfair to the members.

I left here at 10 minutes past 12 last night, and we are in here today. Let us have some reason about this thing.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, I am going to get a lunchbox and bring my lunch from now on.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. McConnell, we will hear these witnesses, and when we come to the end of the day, we will adjourn, and they are satisfied to wait here or be called later.

Mr. MCCONNELL. What is the end of the day?

Mr. KELLEY. I would say half past 5.

Mr. JACOBS. Midnight.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Not midnight.

Mr. KELLEY. Do not tie the Chair down. It is tied down enough.

Mr. Randolph, do you have a long statement there?

Mr. RANDOLPH. It will take about 12 minutes to read.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you want to read it or summarize it? We would prefer if you would summarize it for us.

Mr. JACOBS. If we are going to hear the gentleman, let us let him read his statement.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Randolph.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I will defer to the Chair's desires. I will read about one page here, and then I will direct you to where the rest of it can be found in the matter that we have presented.

TESTIMONY OF WOODRUFF RANDOLPH, PRESIDENT, INTERNATIONAL TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION, ACCOMPANIED BY HENRY KAISER, COUNSEL

Mr. RANDOLPH. Chairman Kelley and Congressmen, my name is Woodruff Randolph. I reside in Indianapolis, Ind. I appear here as president and in behalf of the International Typographical Union. We have submitted to your committee four printed documents. The first is my statement and testimony before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare on S. 249, which I understand is identical with H. R. 2032.

The second is a booklet entitled "Taft-Hartley and the ITU," which sets forth briefly the agonizing experience of the ITU under the Taft-Hartley Act.

The third is a summary of a contempt case in which we were involved under the Taft-Hartley Act.

The fourth is entitled, "The Taft-Hartley Law Is a Slave Labor Law," and listing its most destructive provisions.

I express the hope that the members of the committee may find time to peruse these documents, particularly the second, which demonstrates exactly how the Taft-Hartley Act is a continuing threat to the existence of any craft union. It is my purpose orally to summarize those statements. If the members of the committee will read from the testimony and statement to the Senate committee, beginning on page 1, the last paragraph on that page beginning with the words, "To summarize these documents is not easy," and continuing through pages 2, 3, and 4, and finishing at the top of page 5, they will have substantially the statement that I have here typed, with necessary changes to indicate H. R. 2032 instead of S. 249. To that extent, the time of the committee will be saved, if the chairman will permit the statement as I have it here to appear in the record as though it were read.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. RANDOLPH. In view of the fact, Mr. Chairman, that we have incorporated these four printed documents mentioned in the statement as a part of our statement, may I respectfully request that they be included in the record?

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Thank you, sir.

(The documents referred to will be found in the appendix at the end of today's hearing, beginning on p. 1019.)

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think, Mr. Chairman, that a few words from me concerning the effect of the Taft-Hartley law and our organization, and a few words about the organization, would be helpful to you. This is entirely extemporaneous and without thought because of the change of your plans.

I want to point out that while the Taft-Hartley law was under consideration, we heard a great deal about the fact that labor unions had to be regulated.

Mr. KELLEY. I fear we are going to have to recess for that lunch, because all of the members will have to go to the floor to vote. We will recess until a quarter of 2.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, before we recess, I wish to say that I would like to hear Mr. Randolph's statement. He came here as a witness. I think that we can find time to hear him. I do not want Mr. Randolph to think for one moment that the statement I made was in any way to cut him off. I shall be very much pleased if we hear his entire statement so that we can put questions when we come back.

Mr. KELLEY. We will decide on that when we come back.

Mr. BURKE. I would like to hear it read.

Mr. SMITH. May I make a comment on that? I know that the gentleman over there thinks that I am not very liberal, but I want to say this, that I think this gentleman is the most important witness, so far as I am concerned, that is to come before this committee this year, because I think he knows more about what the Taft-Hartley Act has done to a union than anybody else that has come in here.

Mr. KELLEY. The committee will stand in recess until 1:45.

(Whereupon, at 12:35 a recess was taken until 1:45 the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(Pursuant to recess, the subcommittee reconvened at 1:45 p. m.)

Mr. BAILEY (presiding). The subcommittee will be in order.

Mr. Randolph, president of the International Typographical Union, will resume where he left off at the noon recess.

Mr. Randolph, I believe there is a request from one or two members of the committee that you read your statement in full. I believe we will accord you the time. They seem to be interested in matters you are going to present, so we will be glad to have them.

TESTIMONY OF WOODRUFF RANDOLPH—Continued

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think, Mr. Chairman, if the members of the committee desire to follow me, they could turn to the first page of this pamphlet, to the last paragraph on the first page, from which I will begin to read.

To summarize these documents is not easy, for each of them is itself a summary of a mass of experience and a body of litigation without parallel in the labor history of the United States, which will, we trust, never be repeated. But, in brief, they demonstrate that since it was founded in 1852, the ITU has consistently adhered to four principles upon which voluntary trade-unionism is necessarily based. These are (1) an insistence upon respect for the rules laid down by our members concerning the conditions upon which they will sell their services, in order that each union member may democratically and directly participate in determining these conditions; (2) the refusal to work with competing nonunion men whose willingness to work at lower wages and under substandard conditions threatens each member of our union; (3) an insistence upon respect for our jurisdiction in order that craft standards may not be undermined by the assignment of work to lower-paid and inferior craftsmen; and (4) the refusal to work on struck or substandard goods produced under sweatshop conditions.

We demonstrate that without being guided by these principles, a union cannot live. We show that the Taft-Hartley Act makes impossible the attainment of these objectives and thereby makes free trade-unionism impossible.

Section 8 (b) (3) requiring unions to bargain collectively has been used to attack the very concept of union rules; our duty to enforce those rules has been attacked as "restraint and coercion" under section 8 (b) (1). The legality of over 30 of our internal laws has been challenged. The right of our members not to work with nonunion men has been limited by denying our right to a closed-shop agreement, and the right itself has been questioned and is doubtful.

A form of voluntary servitude, we are told, is set up by which our members can be required to work with nonunion men against their will. Our right to strike to defend ourselves against the assignment of work to nonunion men is denied by section 8 (b) (4) (D). Our members are made slaves by the provisions of section 8 (b) (4) (A) which compel them, under the whip of an injunction, to act as strikebreakers and to process goods made by men working in opposition to us.

In each of these instances—and each is vital to the preservation of our union—our right to strike in self-defense against efforts to destroy us is denied.

The Taft-Hartley Act may be summed up by saying that it denied the right to strike whenever an object of a strike is to preserve the union—and that right is, of course, more fundamental even than the right to strike for better wages or hours.

We demonstrate in our statement that we decided, shortly after the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, to go down fighting, if we had to, rather than submit to slow decay.

We formulated certain policies which, in our judgment, would protect us within the law against the worst ravages of that act.

In pursuit of those goals, and in an effort to preserve an organization which has a century of tradition behind it, which has enjoyed amicable relations with the employers in the industry and which has contributed more than any other single factor to stabilize this industry and the conduct of the men and women employed by it, we have suffered the following:

(1) We have been compelled to spend over $11,000,000 of members' hard-earned dues in support of strikes and other defense activities to preserve the union against the Taft-Hartley Act.

(2) We have been subjected to the issuance of eight complaints, containing substantially identical allegations and relying on the same evidence, by General Counsel Denham of the NLRB.

We have been forced to engage in five long-drawn-out NLRB proceedings, covering substantially the entire country, at great expense to ourselves and our members, without having obtained a single decision from the NLRB in the course of 16 months of litigation.

(3) We have been forced to submit to a sweeping injunction and to a contempt action under that injunction, brought by NLRB attorneys for the chief purpose of breaking a strike of our members at Chicago, Ill., which has continued since November 24, 1947. The only redeeming feature of our experience under the Taft-Hartley Act has been that, despite the best efforts of a coalition of newspaper publishers, General Counsel Denham, the NLRB and the Federal courts, that strike has not been broken. Nor will it be ended until we have the employers' assurances that they will concede us the same right to live that we so freely concede to them.

(4) Collective bargaining in our industry has been carried on, not with our employers, but with General Counsel Denham and the Federal courts.

We demonstrated that this interference with the processes of collective bargaining has gone so far that we were held in contempt of court for, among other things, failing to include a provision for a neutral "tie breaker" in a proposed contract clause setting up a joint employer-union committee for the training of apprentices.

We believe that this is the first time in American history where either a union or an employer was held guilty of violating the law for failing to place some language in a proposal made in the course of collective bargaining, which the employers were free to reject, and frequently did.

I should emphasize that during this entire course of litigation, when NLRB attorneys cooperating with employers watched the behavior of every member of the ITU, it has never even been alleged that the officers or members of the ITU:

(1) Have engaged in violence, fraud, misrepresentation, threats, or any other conduct which could properly be called improper.

(2) Have discriminated in employment, or caused employers to discriminate in employment, against any individual. No person has even filed a charge that he has been discriminated against by any action of our organization.

(3) Have unjustly or improperly suspended or expelled any member from our organization, or improperly or unjustly refused to admit any person to membership.

(4) Have been guilty of any financial impropriety, or have denied any member the democratic rights which he has as a member of our union, or have done other than enforce the union rules, democratically adopted by the members themselves.

As Trial Examiner Leff found in the case brought by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association:

> Respondents (the ITU) urge in justification of their conduct that their motive and intent was to preserve the union and promote its economic interests. I have no doubt that this is true.

But, under Taft-Hartley, "preserving the union and promoting its economic interests" is illegal. It is for that reason that it should be repealed.

Our statement further shows that the injunctive power under Taft-Hartley is far worse than anything that preceded the Norris-LaGuardia Act—that General Counsel Denham, certainly not with the disapproval of the National Labor Relations Board, has administered the Taft-Hartley Act in a biased and hostile manner; that the so-called "Watchdog Committee" has been used to interfere with the affairs of the executive branch of the Government; that injunctive actions under Taft-Hartley are speedy, but clarification of the law by the NLRB is delayed for weary months running into years; and that the law is so unjust, confused, and contradictory that amending it is impossible.

This experience, plus our analysis of H. R. 2032 as amended, convince us that the Taft-Hartley law should be immediately replaced by H. R. 2032 with certain reservations noted in our analysis of the measure.

We do not welcome all of the amendments to the Wagner Act which are proposed. We foresee the gravest dangers if, through a process of further amendment, more restrictions are placed on free management-union relations. But, recognizing that there are problems with which H. R. 2032 has attempted to deal, we are prepared to accept it on an experimental basis in the interest of speedy repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. If in practice H. R. 2032 as amended operates to interfere unduly with the carrying on of the normal and legitimate business of our organization, we shall of course bring such matters to the attention of the Congress.

I started to say briefly and extemporaneously before we adjourned, Mr. Chairman, that there appeared to be a sentiment developed over several years of time that labor unions were almost, if not completely, in the wrong, since they had gotten too big for their britches. That was the sum and substance of the general publicity throughout the country, and the newspapers and magazines were constantly full of criticism of labor unions, and there was also criticism of the matter of strikes.

I want to say for our organization that we believe that trade-unionism is a good thing. We believe that it is absolutely necessary if those who work for a living are to have anything at all to say about the wages, hours, and working conditions under which they are employed. We understand quite well the so-called free enterprise system, and we wish it to be more free, and that there were more businesses created instead of less, as consolidations go on.

We understand that it is production-for-profit method, and we approve that, and we believe in its continuance.

We also call your attention to the fact that trade-unionism has improved that system of production and distribution. It is just as much a part of free enterprise as any other part, and the right to strike is as fundamental to us as the right to vote, or as any other right guaranteed under the laws of the land.

We decry this constant attitude toward unions that they are either too big or too powerful or too something else. We say unions are good for the country, and we say that unless workers are organized they are helpless under a dictatorship, and I mean absolute dictatorship, of the employer, whoever he may be.

The emphasis that has been put upon criticizing labor unions by mediums of publicity has been mistaken for the idea that the people of the Nation are against unions. They are not.

We decry the attitude of those who even in public office will say, "Yes, I believe in trade-unions, but—" The minute they put the "but" on there were know they are against trade-unions.

There can be no if's, and's or but's about the question. Either you are for trade-unions, or you are against them. They are as much a part of our free enterprise, as I said, as any other part, and we are proud of their accomplishments, and we realize they are the only force in this Nation—I say it advisedly, and I emphasize—trade-unions are the only force in this Nation that look out for the wages and working conditions of the big mass of working people and, as such, the trade-union movement should be respected. I believe it is respected by all those who respect the Nation as a whole. I believe trade-unions are hated by those who want to minimize their influence.

It makes no difference how many members there are in trade-unions, if their bargaining power is minimized and constantly kept at a low ebb. It is their bargaining power that makes them either successful unions or destroys them, and their bargaining power has but one force attached to it. That is the right to strike. Take away the right to strike and there is no bargaining power on the part of a union.

Taking the background of publicity that was given for several years, and especially during the war, against strikes; and then the emphasizing of strikes that interfered with the national interest or public conveniences, and labor unions were put behind the eight-ball. So much so, that in a national election when Congress took a Republican color a mandate was claimed on the part of those elected to curb labor unions, and the activities of those operating under that alleged mandate took the form of quoting various types of expert advice on what and how to curb labor unions.

There was assembled in this city those who prepared the Taft-Hartley law, and among them were men who had had some experience in the National Labor Relations Board, and attorneys for large corporations, and a law was framed.

We on the labor side believe it was framed in both meanings of the word. It was framed against labor by very clever people. My impression is that very few Members of Congress knew what was in the bill. There was a very nice strategy used by the introduction of the Hartley bill in the House which, if it had become law, would just about have ruined every labor union in the country, and certainly would have stopped us almost in our tracks in our efforts, fraternal as well as economic; but then the bill in the Senate was regarded as a very moderate bill, and they said, "This is an easy bill, a nice one, and this is all you need, and nothing more."

And in the conference between the House and the Senate one of the most vicious clauses in the whole bill was inserted, and it was never debated on the Senate floor. It was a clause that absolutely slices a craft union up at the will of the employer, where a union may not strike if an employer seeks to dismember it piece by piece, by giving its work to some other trade or class, union or nonunion, of course.

During the summer, before last election, in November, employer services were telling and advising employers not to go too far with the Taft-Hartley law; at least, not until after election, and a lot of them did not. That was not true as regards the International Typographical Union.

Bear in mind, gentlemen, that here is an organization, our union which has been in existence since 1852 without criticism from anybody. We were not any of those alleged bad unions that were disrupting the economy of the country, and no one ever accused us of not being democratic, and no one accused our officers of being labor bosses and dictators. We were held out as a model union. We kept our activities economic, and we did not mess around with politics, and we had no class-conscious attitude. We were taking care of our business, namely, wages, hours, and conditions for our members besides some fraternal benefits by way of old-age pensions and the Union Printers' Home for aged and incapacitated people, and mortuary benefits.

Now, mind you, on the average of 95 cents out of every dollar of dues that came to the International Typographical Union was returned to the members in some form of benefit, either the pension, or a mortuary benefit, or the Union Printers' Home, or the Typographical Journal; 95 cents out of every dollar that came to the international union went back to the members, and the union operated on an average of 5 percent of its income.

No pure charity ever did that. So we were held out as a model union, and certainly not the type of a union—if such exists—that caused the adoption of the Taft-Hartley law that called for the curbing of unions. And yet the very first union to be attacked was the International Typographical Union, the very first union to feel the impact of the law was the International Typographical Union, and the very union that has been punished more than any other by the General Counsel's Office is the International Typographical Union.

I wanted to give you those introductory remarks to set you right on some fundamentals, and that is that trade-unionism is good for the country, and strikes are necessary for the country if we are not to take an economic dictatorship from the employers alone. Strikes are necessary if there is to be equality of bargaining, and disagreement over the results, and those who decry strikes and refer to them as something bad, just do not know what they are talking about. The bad conditions existed before there were trade-unions, and before there was a possibility of strikes.

There is where your bad conditions were, but when unions became of sufficient size—and especially in some of the mass-production industries—of sufficient number to have a bargaining power, they increased the opportunity to live of those who worked in it, but the Taft-Hartley law was a law that was framed to reach all unions, and to not only weaken all unions but so far as craft unions go, the law was made to absolutely destroy them.

And there was the propaganda while the law was going through Congress that there was a section in it that favored craft unions as against industrial unions when it came to the National Labor Relations Board making certifications. The fact is that a craft union would do well to live long enough to ever get before the Board. And why were we not sliced up and destroyed? Well, simply because there was enough printing and publishing to be done in the Nation so that our people could keep on being employed, and because the large majority of employers, both in the newspapers and the commercial printing field, thought enough of the Typographical Union that they were not in sympathy with destroying tactics that were being pursued by General Counsel Denham leading and encouraging the employer representatives in the plans of those particular representatives to destroy the organization.

I might make this other observation, that those who have testified before this committee and before the Senate committee on behalf of the printing industry of America, and those representatives of the newspaper branch, the American Newspaper Publishers Association that pursued us through the National Labor Relations Board procedure on charges and trials are simply paid representatives of an association that has absolutely no bargaining power in the industry. The printing industry of America is composed of nonunion commercial printing shops, and those who, before the Taft-Hartley law had been union shops. The organization has two sections: There is the PIA itself of all of the members, and then there is the union-shop section of the PIA. And by their own organization they show there are lots of nonunion shops, and that we do not have any dictatorial power or control over them so as to compel them to do uneconomic or impossible things. They do no bargaining, the representatives who appear here, whether it is by an attorney or by the employer, or officers of that association, they do no bargaining for the association. It is simply an organization of employers, but as such, they hire attorneys and employees to get what they can out of legislation to embarrass and hamper the union.

The American Newspaper Publishers' Association has no labor agreement of any kind whatsoever, and does not engage in collective bargaining, and yet the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, as such, with no power over any of its members, and doing no bargaining for any of its members, under the Taft-Hartley Act preferred charges against the International Typographical Union, and a complaint was issued and a trial had, and there is a case before the Board. Also, notwithstanding the fact that the International Typographical Union, as such, does not do any bargaining either—that is done by the local unions of the organization—here we have the American Newspaper Publishers' Association taking part as though it were an interested party in collective bargaining, and getting all the benefits possible out of the NLRB in charging the international union with violating the law, and attempting by the use of the NLRB procedures and the Government, including the courts, to get an advantage over local unions that do bargain by stopping the international union from supplying strike benefits to them when they need support in a strike.

So, by the use of the Government and the courts, the American Newspaper Publishers' Association succeeded not only in having us enjoined in a Federal court, and being compelled to follow the dictates of Robert N. Denham as to what the law might mean, but we were also compelled to suffer the humiliation of a citation for contempt, and a finding of contempt, because we might, gentlemen, under the terms of a contract entered into between a local union and an employer—we might discriminate against some one man, and because, if you please, a committee appointed to control the education of apprentices in the craft might disagree as to whether or not an apprentice had had full training in the trade, and because there was no tie-breaker on an even-numbered committee we might at some time in the future discriminate against a nonunion apprentice.

We have the disgraceful example of the Government telling the unions through the international union and, mind you, the local unions which were not parties to this suit—we find the Government telling the local unions what they must do through the international union itself.

Am I making too long a speech, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. BAILEY. I expect the committee members will want to question you. We are probably encroaching upon someone's time.

Is it not a fact, Mr. Randolph, that the International Typographical Union had long enjoyed a reputation as a democratic union, and prior to the Taft-Hartley Act its relations with the employer were both peaceful and mutually beneficial?

Mr. RANDOLPH. They were, Mr. Chairman, and the democracy of our union far exceeds the democracy of the country in both quality and quantity. I will prove it to you by showing you our books of laws which is made by referendum vote of the members, or by a convention of the delegates, by secret ballot, and I want to point out to you if they do not like a law on the books they can, by initiative petition get a referendum vote to change it, and this Congress has not allowed that in this country.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Randolph, do you know Gerard D. Reilly?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have met the gentleman, and I have been examined and cross-examined by him at length in four or five cases in the past year.

Mr. BAILEY. In addition to being an attorney for General Electric, I believe he is also an attorney for some of the printing associations, is he not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. He is the attorney for PIA—that is the Printing Industry of America—and he is connected with the Inland Press.

Mr. BAILEY. What would you say to Mr. Reilly's assertion when he appeared before this committee a few days ago—and we will find this on page 1124 of the transcript and I quote:

> Actually, if the printing industry seemed to get along ideally with the unions, in many instances it was because it did not have the bargaining strength to resist the exorbitant demands and the impositions of uneconomic practices.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I would say he does not know what he is talking about at all. I know that is not the case. I know every time the International Typographical Union has had a strike on a national basis it has cost the union millions of dollars and the loss of many thousands of members. And I know if you will look into the situation you will find we have no uneconomic practices that we force on employers. All of our matters are governed by agreement with employers in collective bargaining. And, further, his idea that the employers do not have the strength to resist our pressure is untrue, because we have not yet succeeded in stopping a man from continuing in business, either as a commercial printer or as a newspaper publisher. Every time we have a strike he seems to keep on operating just the same.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Randolph, Mr. Reilly again testified—and this time it will be found on page 1125 of the transcript—

> The ITU does not engage in full collective bargaining because of the insistence that employers must accept the laws adopted by the union. Those laws are not subject to bargaining or arbitration.

Is it true that the adoption and the insistence upon compliance with such laws in any way conflicts with full collective bargaining?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Not at all, Mr. Chairman, and I think you are entitled to a brief statement on that, because it is so confusing.

As it was stated by Mr. Reilly, it might be regarded by reasonable people as a valid objection, but it is not so. The fact of the matter is that since 1852 when the international union sought to establish, for instance, the 11-hour day, it made a law that no local union could make an agreement thereafter for longer than 11 hours a day, and when it established the 10-hour day, the 9-hour day, the 8-hour day, and the 44-hour week, it has repeatedly changed the laws so no local union could make an agreement for a longer period. And, by the way, every reduction of hours cost a strike to do it.

Mr. BAILEY. In questioning Mr. Wilson, of the General Electric last night, I read into the record an existing paragraph in the contract between the General Electric and employees. It was the paragraph that provided for arbitration in case every other method failed. I accused President Wilson of bad faith or lack of good faith in that in two instances where they had arbitration decisions, instead of accepting them as final, they went to court to try to have those arbitration findings set aside.

I want to ask you in this regard, at this point, if they are discriminating against your unions in a similar manner by saying there are certain things that they do not have to arbitrate; is that right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not quite understand you, but I will say this, that both the employers and unions have certain things that they will not arbitrate. Naturally an employer is not going to arbitrate as to how he is going to run his business or how much profit he is going to make, and the unions are not going to arbitrate what they consider as their basic code of organization. There is a floor upon which collective bargaining is based. We do not arbitrate these matters that we have nailed down in our book of laws over a long period of negotiation and collective bargaining in this industry. We accept our gains and we nail them down in the lawbook, and we say that no local union shall make a contract for any different condition than is provided in the book, and those conditions have to do with union security and with minimum wages under certain circumstances, and the number of hours per week of work, rates of time and a half for overtime, protection against discharges, and various other things that have been the practice of the industry; and those we do not arbitrate.

Mr. BAILEY. Will you briefly explain the development of the closed shop in your union, and its importance to both the union and the industry?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, without the closed shop our organization cannot live very long. The reason for that is that it is a skilled craft, and it covers a number of processes in the trade which the employer is able to take away from us one at a time under the Taft-Hartley Act, and then there would be no union left; and, furthermore, the closed shop has been necessary to maintain that stability which our organization has supplied to the printing industry over these many years.

Mr. BAILEY. One more question: How accurate was Mr. Reilly in his statement on page 1134 of the transcript wherein he accused your organization of being a closed union, and that by combining the closed union with the closed shop it has created "artificial shortages in the supply of compositors and accompanying artificially high costs, wasteful featherbedding practices, and the like"?

Mr. RANDOLPH. He did not testify what such featherbedding practices were?

Mr. BAILEY. I am just quoting his testimony as appears in his presentation.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is wholly untrue. The alleged bargaining strength of employers is washed out and ours is magnified. As I said a few minutes ago, the truth of the fact is that every time we have a strike the employer has been able to keep on operating regardless of the withdrawal of our people, and that shows he is wrong on that point; and, furthermore, I say we have no uneconomic practices, and we have no featherbedding. We have a responsible craft union with 100 years of background and that cannot be denied. We have not had a closed union, and we have, by the way, a law in our book of laws that permits a nonunion applicant whose application has been rejected by a local union, which permits that person to appeal to the executive council of the International Typographical Union against such a decision. I doubt if there is any union or any lodge or any group of people in this country which has as liberal an attitude toward those who apply for membership.

Mr. BAILEY. One more question.

You make a rather grave charge when you say the so-called watchdog committee has been used to interfere with the affairs of the executive branch of the Government.

Would you like to expand on that? I saw that in your statement. Do you mind explaining just what you referred to?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I referred there to the activity of Counsel Shroyer of the watchdog committee and Senator Taft, a member of the watchdog committee, and of course Counsel Denham was also in on that pressure against our union.

Shortly after our convention adopted our collective-bargaining policy Mr. Denham stated at a bar association meeting that we were wrong and that we could not get away with it. Mr. Shroyer attended a convention in French Lick, Ind., and likewise advised them the ITU was all wrong, and the result was that immediately Mr. Denham started out after the International Typographical Union, and the encouragement of the Government to these bodies made it impossible for us to get along with them through their national association because they were advising their local people not to do business with the International Typographical Union on our collective-bargaining policy.

The result was the employers, such as the group in Chicago, undertook to hold wages down—admitting we were entitled to an increase—in an attempt to force our local union in that city to give them a contract under which they could dismember the union. The union would not do that, and a strike ensued for wages in that city, which is still going on and has been going on for a year and 4 or 5 months.

While that strike was going on Mr. Taft entertained in his office the publishers of newspapers in the city of Chicago. John S. Knight, one of the publishers from Chicago, also publishes a newspaper in Akron, Ohio, and he might have been a constituent of Senator Taft, but the rest of the people were not. Present also were representatives of the Herald-American, the Hearst paper, the Chicago Tribune, and the Chicago Sun-Times. They called in the attorneys from the National Labor Relations Board and the general counsel's office. We protested to the President of the United States, who caused an investigation to be made, and the President's investigation elicited a letter from Mr. Findling of the general counsel's office, which indicated quite frankly that Mr. Taft had put the heat on the National Labor Relations Board—and for what? To cite us for contempt on some kind of an allegation that we were not obeying the law; and after the conference in Senator Taft's office the citation for contempt was pursued by Mr. Denham and secured, and I gave you the fanciful results of that. And the judge was asked—and, mind you, on the theory that we had not asked for the right things in collective bargaining—the judge was asked to shut off strike benefits in the city of Chicago. It is fantastic; is it not?

Mr. BAILEY. Rather so.

That is all the questions I have. Mr. Irving, do you have some questions you would like to ask Mr. Randolph?

Mr. IRVING. Just a couple of questions, Mr. Chairman. Is it not true that your employers, as distinguished from the position taken by Mr. Reilly on behalf of the commercial printers' association, were in favor of the closed shop? I understand—I think the name of the gentleman was Keefe who testified to that effect.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. O'Keefe. Yes, I mentioned his testimony in this pamphlet, and I want to say that the watchdog committee took out after us in Chicago; at least, Congressman Hartley appointed a subcommittee to carry on an investigation in the city of Chicago concerning the newspaper strike in that city, and a subcommittee did visit Chicago and carried on a 3-day session, at which I testified, as did other members of the union and employer representatives, and Congressman Kersten asked Mr. O'Keefe, who is the secretary of the Chicago Newspaper Publishers' Association, some pertinent questions. It will only take a few minutes, and I would like to read it. That is on page 40 of this pamphlet.

Congressman KERSTEN. Up until now and for a great many years past you had a closed-shop agreement; didn't you?

Mr. O'KEEFE. Yes; we did.

Mr. KERSTEN. How did that feature work out in your previous contracts, so far as your closed-shop provision of the contract was concerned?

Mr. O'KEEFE. We never even discussed it. It had been there for years and it has remained there.

Mr. KERSTEN. Did you have any real difficulty with it so far as your union, the ITU, is concerned?

Mr. O'KEEFE. We did not. As a matter of fact, most of the Chicago publishers, or all of the Chicago publishers, I would say, would prefer to continue a closed shop if it were legal.

Mr. KERSTEN. The reason for that is that this particular union has been a long-term institution that has a certain amount of tradition behind it, a considerable amount, and it is a responsible union, and under those conditions a closed shop has worked out so far as the Chicago publishers are concerned. Is that right?

Mr. O'KEEFE. Yes; it has.

In addition to that, I want to say that even now, a year and 4 or 5 months after a strike ensued for a matter of wages, the publishers of the city of Chicago are now willing that a contract be entered into containing a provision that if the Taft-Hartley Act is amended to permit the closed shop it will automatically be included in the next contract.

Mr. IRVING. In your statement you have emphasized the unnecessary difficulties imposed by the boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. Will you elaborate on that?

In Mr. Reilly's testimony before this committee—and I think it is page 1138 in the transcript—he says:

In the printing industry the secondary boycott is a powerful weapon which could thus be employed, as it was before the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, to coerce small employers into signing up with unions which do not represent labor employees.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It says "employees" in the transcript. I want to say just another word in addition to what I said on the closed shop as to the newspaper industry. The same sentiment exists among the commercial employers themselves. In the commercial field they are also in favor of the closed shop, and not as testified to by the lawyers and secretaries of the association.

As regards the matter of secondary boycott, I want to point out it is a very important question and one that goes to the stability of the industry itself. It not only goes to the survival of the union, but to the very stability of this industry. I want to point that out in this way: Here is the city of Chicago, for instance, with several hundred print shops, and there is an association of employers in that city, mainly the larger employers, and there is the union. For all of the history of this organization—our No. 16—as long as there was an employers' organization in Chicago, the union bargained with that group. I can recall a time when there was less than one-third of the members of the union employed in shops owned by that group of employers; and yet the union bargained with them. That was the only bargaining unit the union had to bargain with, and they bargained with them, but the employers insisted and the union gladly undertook to comply with that insistence, that whatever was agreed upon with that group of employers would be enforced by the union in all of the other shops. In other words, the employers in Chicago were not as good union men as the men they employed; and, therefore, their stability depended upon the union itself enforcing in other shops the same thing that was agreed upon by that bargaining group of employers. That is not only true as regards the commercial field, but it is also true as regards the newspaper field. And this union has not undertaken to use the boycott weapon at all except insofar as to protect itself from the product of a cheap undercutting employer whom some employer might want to use to do a part of the printing job, thereby undercutting the price of the employers in the city by taking a cheaper grade of type, or various other processes of the trade.

Now, if our union members cannot refuse to handle a nonunion product, it takes away the stabilization of that unionism and the closed shop as afforded to that industry, and makes it possible for the employers to engage in cutthroat competition, to their own destruction.

Mr. IRVING. I do not know if you have answered my question satisfactorily. But I have consumed all my time.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am sorry I am so long-winded.

Mr. JACOBS (presiding). Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. I have no questions.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Randolph, your union is known as one of the oldest unions in the United States; is it not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We claim to be the oldest.

Mr. BURKE. It is just about the oldest continuously organized union?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We claim that. We think that is true.

Mr. BURKE. And during the 100 years or more that your union has been organized, it has become recognized pretty much as a typical American institution; that is, as typical as the Chicago Tribune or the Toledo Blade or any other newspaper, or Sears Roebuck, or any other type of establishment that you would care to mention?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We claim to be the best in our field, very modestly.

Mr. BURKE. I do not blame you for that.

It seems to me that I read somewhere not too long ago an article about the history of printers, and there were some very interesting statistics about that particular organization and the industry itself. It seemed that in the early eighteen hundreds, probably around 1820, or somewhere along in there, the average life expectancy of a printer working at his trade was 26 years of age.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Twenty-eight.

Mr. BURKE. Twenty-eight, was it? And by the time the printers' union had become pretty well organized, sometime after the Civil War, the life expectancy through the activities of the union had jumped to somewhere around 45 or 46 years of age.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think it was about 1890 when it got up as high as 40 or 42. It was pretty slow crawling. But since 1890, it has gone up to 65.

Mr. BURKE. And printers now can expect about the same type of life expectancy as any other group of people; so that would seem to tend to prove that the union certainly did a great deal for its members throughout its history.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes. Not only did it do that for its members, by extending their life, but look what it did for the industry in supplying the services of a trained man for that many more years.

Mr. BURKE. That is right.

I notice this particular line of questioning has no direct bearing upon the particular act, but I did want to bring it out, to set in the record the type of information that you have and the fact possibly a union can be just as good as a business establishment.

Mr. RANDOLPH. We think we have a much higher moral standard than most businesses.

Mr. BURKE. I do not blame you for that.

That is all.

Mr. BAILEY (presiding). Are you through, Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs, you have not used your time.

Mr. JACOBS. May I reserve my time until the end, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. BAILEY. It is agreeable to the Chair.

Mr. McConnell, do you have any questions?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Off the record, I just wanted to ask if it is all right for a person to reserve his time.

Mr. BAILEY. I think in this particular case it is, since Mr. Randolph is from Mr. Jacobs' district. It is not a general rule, but just a matter of courtesy.

Mr. JACOBS. Frankly, Mr. McConnell, I wanted to reserve my time and then ask Mr. Randolph in the end whether he has anything further that he wants to say as summary. After all, his organization is located in my district, and it is a courtesy to him, if you do not object.

Mr. MCCONNELL. That is all right. I am quite in accord with courtesy.

I have no questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. I believe it is the policy of your union that all contracts signed with locals and with their employer must go to your headquarters at Indianapolis to be approved.

Mr. RANDOLPH. They must go there to be approved as being in compliance with our laws. We do not examine them as to sufficiency of the subject matter, except whether or not the subject matter is in compliance with our law.

Mr. SMITH. Now, I will ask you a direct question. Did a contract ever come into your office from a local in which the only question was the amount of wages, and the contract was turned down by you simply because it was not high enough wages?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not recall any such.

Mr. SMITH. Are you ready to say that it never occurred?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Since 1944, I have been in the position of president, and I do not recall any contract having been so turned down.

Mr. SMITH. And you would not turn a contract down if it did not meet with the amount of wage that you thought they ought to have?

Mr. RANDOLPH. You know, when you deal in absolutes, you always run into trouble. I can imagine a circumstance where I would not approve a contract if it was so low that I could see a scheme for the evasion of dues paying. I might take some action on it. For instance, we have some very small local unions, you know. We charter as few as eight printers into a union, sometimes they would drop down to seven, six, five, and so on, and at other times they will grow. But if some of these unions are composed mostly of proprietor members—as some of them are—that is, members who have little print shops and employ maybe no employees or maybe one or two, for the whole town, and if out of eight we had five employer members—and they sent in a scale that was half the amount that it ought to be, I would smell a mouse—that the employer members set the scale low so they would pay low dues, and I would not approve it until I looked into it. Now, that is one of the absolutes, and one of the impossibilities, perhaps, of the situation.

Mr. SMITH. You put in some other factors that I am not concerned with and did not have in mind. I am talking about a man that runs a paper with maybe eight employees, and the employer and the union want to make a wage rate that you do not think is sufficient, and you would disapprove it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; we would not do that.

Mr. SMITH. You would not do that?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No.

Mr. SMITH. You never have?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. SMITH. Now, I believe you testified that you were not in favor of featherbedding.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not say that, because I do not know what "featherbedding" is. I reject the word completely.

Mr. SMITH. All right. Let us be more specific. I have heard it constantly said there are a lot of places in this country where union printers set up advertisements for a paper and then junk them, so to speak, because there has been a plate coming in from some national advertiser, and that plate was used, and you have in your contract that you have the right to set up all ads that come into the shop; is that true?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is not true.

Mr. SMITH. Now, just explain to a layman what you are talking about.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think I know what you are talking about. But we do not have the practice of resetting national advertising. We do have, and have had since 1872, a practice that is covered by contract whereby the members of a local union will do all of the work of an employer; and it is seasonal, and spotty, causing us considerable unemployment in the matter of supplying good help to do that. But whatever local advertising there is in that city is set in each of the offices. If one office will set an advertisement of a local firm and send a mat of that over to their competitor for printing in his paper, the competitor gets the ad for nothing, and he charges no less for his ad. He is getting the benefit of the composing room of the first plant. Now, for all of these years, and not just recently, you know, but since way back to 1872, we have had what amounts to a fair-trade-practices act by insisting that the union get the benefit of setting that ad for both publishers instead of one publisher getting the ad for nothing, and further protecting the first publisher against having advertisers use his plant to do the composition work for the other publishers in town.

That publisher may have the best plant, give the best service, and have the best type, and the advertisers may have him do the composition, and then make mats to be sent to the other papers who may not give him that kind of service or that kind of type, and the other papers would get the composition for nothing and the members of the union would be deprived of the work involved.

It is not featherbedding, and no publisher has ever proposed, when he gets an ad for nothing, that he give the advertiser a rebate. Far from it. Who is featherbedding? The publisher or we? We are asking for the work. The publisher is getting the mat for nothing. Who is "featherbedding," if you know what the word means? I do not. There is nothing wrong about the practice, and even under the Taft-Hartley law, the trial examiners have held that there is nothing wrong with the practice and that it is not violating the law.

Mr. SMITH. Were you consulted about the present bill that we are considering before it was printed?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; I was not.

Mr. SMITH. Do you know who prepared the bill?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have been hearing rumors about that ever since it has been on the books. Do you know who prepared it?

Mr. SMITH. I am not talking about the Taft-Hartley law. I am talking about the one we are considering.

Mr. RANDOLPH. No. I beg your pardon. I thought you were talking about the Taft-Hartley law. I was not consulted about this bill.

Mr. SMITH. Do you have any contracts in existence now for a 35-hour week?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes; we do.

Mr. SMITH. Whereabouts?

Mr. RANDOLPH. One in Seattle, one in Miami, Fla. We have a strike on in Miami now. It was a 35-hour week while we were working. There are quite a few of them.

Mr. SMITH. Is it the objective of your union to try to get more 35-hour-a-week contracts?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is a matter for local unions themselves. They set their own sights on that kind of thing.

Mr. SMITH. There has been no national policy fixed on that?

Mr. RANDOLPH. There has not been a national policy fixed on it. Our laws provide that a local may not make a contract for more than 40 hours a week.

Mr. SMITH. Does your national union send out what you term so-called laws to regulate the number of apprentices that may be taken in?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We have among our general laws a provision that the contract shall not provide for more than a certain ratio of apprentices to journeymen. As a matter of fact, before the war, that ratio of apprentices and the new members we took in, and so on, kept the industry well enough supplied with printers so that we had approximately 8 percent working less than full time. When the war came on, it took away a lot of our people, and business, which is now commencing to level off, resulted in a temporary shortage of printers. Some of our employer critics assumed that the union should supply them with enough printers so that they would never have to work any overtime. We do not undertake to do that. Since the temporary shortage of printers has set in, our members have worked 5 to 6 percent overtime, as shown by our records.

Mr. SMITH. There is a terrific shortage in linotype operators, is there not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; there is not a terrific shortage. There is a temporary shortage. And that, I say, is leveling off now. Many places are reporting printers laid off and printers available. There are some squawks from smaller places where they will not bring the wages up high enough and the men will leave that town and go to a bigger town where they can get more money. But that is only the natural ebb and flow of the trade.

Mr. SMITH. I yield the balance of my time to Mr. Nixon.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Nixon?

Mr. NIXON. I noted your comments concerning the democratic procedures in your union, and I might say that before you testified I had had an opportunity to study some of the history of the union and had a pretty good idea as to some of these practices you referred to.

You may not have been following these hearings. But the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Jacobs, has suggested on several occasions that when the committee resolves itself into executive session to write this bill, he is going to submit amendments to the administration measure which will provide that all unions must follow certain democratic practices. He will have to speak for himself as to what those amendments are going to be. But in effect, the general idea would be to require that all unions follow the better practices of unions such as yours.

Would you favor such legislation? And in answering the question, I should like to say that in reading over your testimony before the Senate in answer to questions from Senator Taft, I gathered the direct impression that you would be unequivocally opposed to such legislation due to the fact that you oppose interference with the internal organization of a union. Is that still your sentiment now, or have you changed your ideas on that point?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, no. I still believe that such legislation is not sound and should not be put on the books.

Mr. NIXON. I will not develop the point further now, because Mr. Jacobs follows me and he can develop it as he likes. But I think that it would be well when he does question you, if you have any further comments on that point, to make them to him, because it is an issue that is going to be before the committee. In other words, the issue will be whether or not the new administration bill will go further than the Taft-Hartley bill in interfering with the internal organization of a union.

So I will leave the point here because I know he can discuss it much more completely than I, since he has his specific amendments, I am sure, in mind.

Now, you indicated, also, that as far as your union organization was concerned, the union was not a closed union; it is an open union.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It does not refuse new members who qualify and are of good character.

Mr. NIXON. And who meet the professional standards and the character standards that the union has set up?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Mr. NIXON. You, of course, also indicated in your statement that you favor a provision in the law which would allow the closed shop. Would you object to a corollary provision in the event that the law did allow a closed shop which would provide that unions would in effect have to be open, in order for a closed-shop contract to be negotiated by the union and the employer?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Of course, I do not know just exactly what you mean by "open." But if I do understand what you mean, my answer would be that I would be opposed to that kind of provision.

Mr. NIXON. I am sure you do not intend to leave the impression with the committee that there is no such thing as a closed union. I have, for example, just received in the mail today a newspaper account of unions in the retail trades in the Los Angeles area that have closed their memberships starting last week, due to the fact that they say there are too many people working in those trades, and for a certain period of time now, it is necessary to close the membership because otherwise there would be too many members of the union for the available jobs.

I think that obviously one question that will come before the committee is that in the event the closed-shop contract is legalized, either in those industries where it is traditional or in other cases, there is going to be considerable insistence that there should be a corollary provision that the union could not be closed. And it is my understanding that you would oppose such a provision.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I certainly would. And there is very good reason for it. It is not a place for legislation at all. A union such as ours, which is a craft organization and which has tried and has successfully maintained enough people to take care of the industry, is doing both itself and the industry a service. Now, to make a law that all of the people who developed into printers had a right, per se, to come into our union is certainly not sound because the union has to have a fair control over the number of people serving the trade if it is going to live. In times of stress when there is a lot of unemployment, as there was in 1932 and 1933, one-third of our members were unemployed. Our unions did not take anybody in during that time. If there is any period of unemployment that develops our unions will not accept new members. And they are perfectly right in not accepting new members. Why should free riders on the outside come running in to get the benefit of unionism and that degree of help that we give to our members in times of stress when they have not bothered with coming into the union in other times and paying their part of the expense and the trouble that goes with unionism?

Unionism is an uphill job. It is not easy. It is work that is opposed by employers. They have had a constantly struggling job to hold themselves together. Why should anybody be allowed to be legislated into a group of union people?

Mr. NIXON. Your answer, Mr. Randolph, is predicated on the fact that the people who would be trying to get into the union would be people that have been on the outside as free riders?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. And who just wanted to come in during times of stress so that they could get good contracts which the union was able to negotiate.

Let us take the case in a city where the union had organized virtually all of the printing establishments in that city. And there are some, I think. And the type of situation involved is that new individuals are going into the printing trades, new blood. The same rule should apply as far as you are concerned? You think that the union should be closed, and the union should determine who gets the available jobs?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; that is not so. Our apprentices are selected by the employer himself. For the first year they are on probation. They can be discharged at the will of the employer. After that, they get a status of apprenticeship, and they are started out to learn the trade.

There is no difference between a young fellow getting a job that way and what it would be if he got a job in a nonunion place to learn the trade. Certainly, no one has the legal right, per se, to go and learn a particular trade because he wants to, any more than he has a right to go to become a doctor without going through the training and paying the fees for it. We do not concede that just anybody who wants to be a printer has per se the right to be a printer, because in 100 years we have established some standards and some wages and conditions that are worth while.

Mr. NIXON. Again, Mr. Randolph, you are getting off the point that I tried to make. You used the analogy of the doctor. Well, let us use that analogy. Of course, the doctor does not have a right to practice medicine until he becomes qualified, and a printer does not have the right to go into a plant and work unless he is qualified as a printer. But the point is that if a doctor does become qualified and passes the State medical board examination, he can become a doctor. As far as the printer is concerned, where you would have a situation in which the union had in effect closed its membership, here you would have a case where a man who had qualified from a technical standpoint in becoming a printer would not be able to become a member of the union.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, why does not he keep on working where he became qualified?

Mr. NIXON. Where he became qualified?

Mr. RANDOLPH. In a nonunion shop, where he learned the trade. Why doesn't he continue to work there?

Mr. NIXON. Let us suppose that in this case, he had attempted in the first instance to take his apprentice training in a union shop, but there was not room because the rules of the union as to the number of apprentices you would take. In other words, he was forced to go out and take his training in a nonunion shop. In effect, the union would be indicating to this man that due to the fact that there were not enough jobs to go around, the union would have to distribute them only to their members.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, what is wrong with that?

Mr. NIXON. You used the analogy of the doctors. You will have to admit that it does not apply, does it?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No. The doctor also can go and practice medicine without joining the AMA if he wants to. And the nonunion printer can keep on being a nonunion printer if he wants to.

Mr. NIXON. And also not be able to get a job. I realize——

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, that is not true.

Mr. NIXON. Yes, yes, I know. I know your argument on that, that in most of the cities there are lots of nonunion shops. Well, you know as well as I do that there are a number of cities where that is not the case.

Mr. RANDOLPH. You see, what you are doing is talking from a hypothetical case without any practical effect.

Mr. NIXON. Now, just a minute. You say it is a hypothetical case. You mean, there are no situations where printers are unable to ply their trade due to the fact that they cannot get in the union?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We do not get that information. That, as I say, is hypothetical, and comes from Taft-Hartley propaganda. Now, as a matter of fact, this limitation on apprentices is for the purpose of trying to have a fair balance of trained employees to take care of a fair volume of work, and it is just as much to the employer's advantage as to ours, and it is absolutely essential as far as we are concerned, because if we have twice as many printers as jobs, we can only get half as much work, and the scales are going to be lower.

Mr. NIXON. Then as far as you are concerned, you do believe that any individual who is not now a printer and who wants to become a printer, or a doctor, for that matter, as far as you are concerned, you do not believe that the union rules should prohibit him from doing so, either practically or otherwise?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well——

Mr. NIXON. You agree with that statement?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Not the way you put it.

Mr. NIXON. I did not think you did. What do you think?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Because you are trying to make it appear that way to the whole industry. Let us be fair about that. I explained to you how our apprentice ratios are based on the number of journeymen and the needs of the trade. Now, I will say to you further, if you want to be hypothetical, suppose you wipe out the union entirely, assume a condition where there is no union in the industry; how is a man going to be a printer if he wants to be a printer? He has to get a job, does he not? If the employer does not want to hire him, he does not get a job, and the poor guy cannot be a printer. Well, you turn right around and try to take that kind of situation and say the union men are keeping them from being printers. It is not so at all. It is the volume of printing in the country that keeps people from being printers. And a boy has just as much trouble, if not more, in getting a job with a nonunion shop as an apprentice as he does in a union shop.

Mr. NIXON. There is no question about that.

Mr. RANDOLPH. So why cry about the boy in one case and not cry about him in the other?

Mr. NIXON. I think from your answer to the questions, it is quite apparent that the rules of a union, where you do have a closed shop, necessarily have the effect, in times of unemployment, as you have indicated, of keeping new people out of the trade. Now, that may be a desirable effect.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It does not. I did not say that.

Mr. NIXON. We will let the record speak for itself, because my time is up.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Randolph, I just wanted to ask one question that occurred to me while Mr. Smith was questioning you. He asked about the approval of a contract by your central union, or by your international body; is that right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Mr. MCCONNELL. And you have stated that you knew of no such case?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No. His question was, if a local and an employer agreed on a contract and forwarded it to the international union for approval as to whether it is in compliance with our laws, would the international union object if the only question involved was a matter of wages, and would we refuse to approve it on the theory that the wage was too low.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. And I told him, "No," and I gave him a possible exception to that.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Now, I wanted to ask about the contract that was drawn up with the union headed by Claude Baker. Is that his name? Claude Baker was formerly the head of the ITU?

Mr. RANDOLPH. He was.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Is there a case of that nature pending at the present time? I think that is what Mr. Smith was getting at.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Baker has not been the president since 1944.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Does he head a local union in California?

Mr. RANDOLPH. He is at the present time president of the San Francisco Typographical Union.

Mr. MCCONNELL. And did they draw up a contract and submit it to your people, and was it rejected? Or what was the story? I do not know; I am just after information.

Mr. RANDOLPH. There was a current internal matter without benefit of results. I would rather not discuss it. It had no connection with wages whatever.

Mr. MCCONNELL. No connection with wages?

Mr. RANDOLPH. It was an internal matter with the union, and I do not want to talk about it, especially since Taft-Hartley is not supposed to be connected with the internal affairs of unions. It is not supposed to be.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he cares to ask Mr. Randolph to return here at 4:15 when we will resume the hearing?

Mr. JACOBS. That depends on what Mr. Randolph says and how he feels. If Mr. Randolph has anything further that he has to say, he could determine that.

We have to go now. They are probably down to the R's on the first roll call.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Gentlemen, I think I have about exhausted the subject, unless you have some more questions you want to ask.

Mr. JACOBS. I did desire to go into some matters, especially in view of Mr. Nixon's remarks.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I will be glad to stay here until you come back.

Mr. JACOBS. But I do not want to require you to come back.

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, no. I shall be glad to stay here. That is what I came to Washington for.

Mr. BAILEY. The committee will stand in recess until 4:15. We have to answer a roll call at this time.

(Whereupon, at 3:25 p. m., a recess was taken until 4:15 p. m.)

(Pursuant to the recess, the subcommittee reconvened at 4:15 p. m.)

Mr. BAILEY. The subcommittee will be in order.

At this time we will resume where we were when we took the recess for the roll call.

I believe the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Jacobs, has some time; if he cares to use it at this time it is at his disposal.

Mr. JACOBS. Is that an invitation to save time, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. Randolph, did you have any further statement you would like to make for the record? Originally, I had intended to reserve my time for that question, but in view of some questions put by another member of the committee, I want to develop a little further.

Do you have anything further?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, I do not have anything further.

Mr. JACOBS. In regard to the question of elections in unions that Mr. Nixon brought up, I am familiar with the operations of the International Typographical Union. As a matter of fact, as a part of my examination of Mr. Reilly I put in an article by Mr. Hart. Is the name Hart?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Hard.

Mr. JACOBS. That article appeared some years ago in the Reader's Digest.

I listened with considerable interest to your statement here in regard to officers. I believe you have two political parties in your organization?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, we have at least two.

Mr. JACOBS. And you do have elections where everybody is permitted to vote?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. And you proceed upon the same theory as our concept of government, that the officers govern by the consent of the governed?

Mr. RANDOLPH. They do not even govern; they just see that the law is enforced, if they can.

Mr. JACOBS. In a case of that kind, of course, a law that would require a union to have an election of officers would not affect your union in the least, would it? I mean, you are doing it anyway?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We are doing it, but we would feel rather insulted about it.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, would it not also be true that I might feel offended because of a law condemning a person for larceny, and I would say, "I do not intend to commit larceny." But the law is passed for a man who does.

Mr. RANDOLPH. You are entering into another field entirely. This matter of labor relations is not a criminal action; it is clearly respectable and a free relationship of people who form unions, and they should not be interfered with by government as to how they should run their unions.

Mr. JACOBS. I have in mind particularly two or three cases I know about in regard to another union where the members of a local were denied the right to elect officers for some 16 years, and when the officers who were in charge of the local left, they took the books with them, and it was later discovered that about a third of the treasury was gone. And when the local union finally had an election of officers, they found the wage scale was about 25 percent below the wage scale in the area, and that was the first time in 16 years they had been allowed to elect delegates to go to the convention. There had been delegates going to the convention, but they had been appointed by the international union. The new local officers were going to question the financial report, and they were expelled—or, at least, one of them was expelled—and they were all denied the floor and were never permitted to come up on the floor at all. That is not democratic action, is it?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No.

Mr. JACOBS. In addition to that, when they came around to nominate officers—and I will give an example, a typical example—and, incidentally, the officers were elected by a referendum vote, and were not elected by a convention vote in this particular organization.

The general executive board member from the first district was nominated—and there are quite a few pages here in the nominating speeches—and after Charles Johnson, a member of local union 1456 was nominated, a delegate stated, "I want to second the nomination of Brother Charles Johnson, in behalf of local 874 and local 176."

And then President Hutcheson, of the carpenters' union, says: "Any further nominations?"

A delegate by the name of Tolve, local union 543, said:

> Mr. President, members of the executive board and members of the twenty-fifth general convention, it is a great pleasure to get up here today and nominate a man who did great work for our organization. His name is John S. Sinclair, Mount Vernon, N. Y. Brother President, I do not have any ax to grind; I have known Charlie Johnson for a good many years, and I want to say to you——
>
> President HUTCHESON. Just a moment—does the Chair understand now you want to second Charlie Johnson's nomination?
> Delegate TOLVE. No.
> President HUTCHESON. Then I will have to rule you out or order. Are there any further nominations?

Without expensive court litigation—I mean, how can those members cope with that sort of a situation? I am not out for regulating a union like yours, and say you have to have elections, but I am thinking about a union of that kind that operates in that way.

Mr. RANDOLPH. There is a line you know, separating the field where Government ought to interfere.

Mr. JACOBS. I think you are right.

Mr. RANDOLPH. And where it should not interfere and, I think, the line would be crossed if the Government undertook to transact the internal affairs for the members of the union. In other words, if they have sense enough to have a union they should have sense enough to run it, and no matter what the Government does they are not going to run it if the Government takes it over. And, as a matter of good law, I think the Government should stay out of the business. They can correct the condition internally. Our people, of course, being printers, can print circulars until they get in your eyes, but a little pitiless publicity directed against the general president and against the abuses of their own law would perhaps correct the situation.

Mr. JACOBS. As a matter of fact, you allot the opposition space in your magazine, do you not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Oh, yes; that is true. Each candidate has a certain allotment of space in each election, in the Journal, but that is not all. They go into widesperad publicity on the matter, and I lay it down as fundamental that if the members of a union do not have the ability to run it they should not have a union, and they would probably disappear by that kind of tactics.

Mr. JACOBS. May I state the members have done exactly that, and had circulated—the local, rather—a statement of the controversy with the general president. It was never denied it was the truth. That was why the delegates were denied the floor, and one was expelled.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not think you should be discouraged so soon. It takes years, sometimes, to bring about such a condition. There was a definite policy enforced in our organization from 1900 to 1920, and the minority struggled to become a majority, and finally did become a majority in 1920, so do not get discouraged. It is the American way. I resent the interference of Government in any field where the voluntary associations of people are required to not only organize, but keep a voluntary association going.

Mr. JACOBS. You agree with me, assuming the circumstances I stated are true, that that is a very bad method for a union to conduct itself from the members' viewpoint?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I would agree with you, and if I were in that union I probably would do a lot of printing.

Mr. JACOBS. I believe you would. But, on the other hand, if these carpenters are afraid of their union status—and I might go further and state that after they resisted this action, Mr. Hutcheson went into a local court and put up a $700,000 bond and got a mandatory injunction without notice and ousted the same officers who had just collected back a lot of money that had been taken from their treasury, and they did not have a quarter to defend themselves in court. And the judge knew that the officers were sitting in the anteroom trying to get an order themselves, and he did not even call them in.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not think it is a place for legislation.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, your feeling is that it is an evil, but is not something we should legislate upon?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Unless you want to legislate all of the activities of all of the unions.

Mr. JACOBS. No; I would not go that far. I would suggest they must hold an election in accordance with their constitution and bylaws.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Suppose the constitution called for an election every 100 years. Then you would have to move in further. If they had an election every 4 years, or every 3 years, you would keep encroaching when you step into that field. It is the natural tendency of not only the Government to encroach, but the tendency of the people to rely on the Government to tell them what to do, and that is bad.

Mr. BAILEY. You have 1 minute, Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. At least, that is the problem.

That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. I wish to thank you, Mr. Randolph, and your associates, for your appearance.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for the opportunity to appear here.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to include in the record some material submitted by Congressman Reva Beck Bosone of Utah, for the use of the committee, for reference, and not to be included in the formal record.

I also have a statement of citations which I desire to have printed in the record of Monday, March 14, 1949, in connection with the appearance of Carl Brown, president of the Foreman's Association of America.[1]

Mr. JACOBS. Is that an additional statement, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. BAILEY. No; just citations to clarify his position in appearing before the committee.

Without objection, we will receive for the record a statement by Miss Ella Best, executive secretary of the American Nurses' Association, and a statement by Gwilym A. Price, president of Westinghouse Electric Corp.

(Both of the above statements will be found in the appendix following today's testimony. See index for page numbers.)

The committee will now hear Mr. W. J. Van Buren, secretary of the national organization, Masters, Mates, and Pilots of America.

TESTIMONY OF W. J. VAN BUREN, NATIONAL SECRETARY-TREASURER, MASTERS, MATES, AND PILOTS OF AMERICA, A. F. OF L.

Mr. VAN BUREN. Mr. Chairman, if there is no objection, I would like to read my statement and then comment on it as I go along, or, more or less, clarify it.

Mr. BAILEY. That will be fine, Mr. Van Buren.

You may proceed.

Mr. VAN BUREN. Gentlemen of the committee, thank you for your courtesy in receiving my testimony on behalf of a union which for 62 years has maintained beneficial relations with employers in the marine and shipping industry.

The Masters, Mates, and Pilots of America, A. F. of L., is a union with 62 years' depth of experience in the field of good labor practices. In our entire history I can recall only two strikes in the industry. There have been times, of course, when we have remained idle because of a strike in which we were not engaged because our own immediate interests were not involved.

You no doubt understand that in our line of activity we work when all others work and when the others cease work we are forced of necessity to stop. In other words, Mr. Chairman, if we have no crew on the ship, we cannot sail it. We are what might be called in other branches of industry supervisors or foremen who are the overseers of some immediate projects, the transportation of cargo; it may be bulk in some instances and not in others.

[1] See p. 705.

I am sure that most of you members of this committee who have entered or left New York Harbor have seen the tugboats hustling around shoving the big liners into their berths, and others escorting the barges across the Hudson River with supplies to keep the city going; or on the Great Lakes engaged in the less glamorous task at the heavy cargo terminals, or, further still, in the Gulf ports or the Pacific; and in many other places where vessels are engaged in State-side shipping. We are the men responsible for the safety of lives, property, and cargo on the vessels large or small on which we are employed.

Through no fault of our own or that of the transport industry, we among the Masters, Mates, and Pilots of America have been placed in not only a most difficult position as a result of the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act, but also in a most unconventional location among unions as they exist today.

I offer ourselves as an example of what ill-considered legislation can and does do to a group of employees whose bargaining rights and relationships with their employers have always been well maintained.

For years we have been subject to all the provisions of the Railway Labor Act.

I might say at this time, Mr. Chairman, our organization contains two different classes of deck officers. We have deck officers employed on railroad vessels, and we have deck officers employed on deep-sea oceangoing and coastwise vessels. The railroad end of our organization comes under the Railway Labor Act. Any time 51 percent or more of those in any of our group—that is, the railway group—could demonstrate the fact that they represented the majority, we have been authorized and empowered by law to file a statement with the National Mediation Board, and proceed with negotiations on behalf of those whom we represent.

As I said previously, we have made progress with a minimum of confusion. Perhaps every one of us will agree that the Railway Labor Act has been the basis for a great deal of industrial peace. At least those of us who are under the act view it as such.

But now along comes this Taft-Hartley Act, carrying with it every indication that the technicians and advisers who worked on that legislation knew so little of what they were doing. All they needed to do was to reach for the nearest copy of the Railway Labor Act and read it and to make a few inquiries of the field to which it applies. I understand this committee had hired some high-priced, high-powered men to render competent advice.

What kind of advice must Congress have received when a union which suffers all the bad effects under one law is denied even the elementary benefits allowed to other unions, while at the same time that same union is definitely and completely included under another law which long since established the methods by which that union is to operate?

I refer there, Mr. Chairman, to that part of our group who come under the Railway Labor Act. We are supervisors in the full sense of the word, I believe, or foremen. The Railway Labor Act does not say that we cannot be organized. They do not say that we cannot bargain for those of our group who are working on railroad-owned and operated vessels, but the Taft-Hartley Act says that we are supervisors and we cannot organize.

We have, within the last few months, lost about 350 men out of the Great Lakes because the NLRB denied us an election. Our organizer organized those men out there, and we asked for recognition from the employers for six bulk carriers on the Great Lakes, and naturally they refused. We had hearings in Cleveland before a subboard out there, and it was referred to Washington, and they turned us down. I have a copy of the decision here with me. You see, one branch of our group is supervisors, and we do not deny that. They are in charge of the vessel and everything it does, and we do not deny that; but we do not like to be denied the privilege of organizing. We cannot, under the Taft-Hartley Act, organize that group of our employees.

If there is any other union that has received such unique and unfair treatment at the hands of the Congress, I shall be pleased to make note of the fact when anyone can point out the case in point.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act, we are called supervisors and for this reason, we are outlawed from pursuing the bargaining process. Under the Railway Labor Act, we have all the rights and privileges any union under its jurisdiction can have. I ask any of you Congressmen whose State has a coast line, or even if it has not, who is going to tell the Masters, Mates, and Pilots of America where we head in after that?

We are a bargaining agency, and we are not a bargaining agency—at the same time—by law, and I submit that here is a very good trick if it can be done. But it cannot be done. What could possibly have been the purpose in creating such a situation that we do and we don't at the same time, by law?

If any evidence were needed whether the Taft-Hartley Act in itself is in violation of already existing law, I need only call attention to the decision and order of the National Labor Relations Board in the matter of six steamship and transportation companies on the Great Lakes against the national organization, Masters, Mates, and Pilots of America, A. F. of L., dated January 1949, and that was the decision I was referring to, Mr. Chairman. I have a copy here.

In a petition to the NLRB, this union sought to establish itself as the recognized representative of the employees of these six companies whose bargaining rights fall within our jurisdiction. The Board found that the employers are employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act, as domestic owners and operators of bulk cargo on the Great Lakes. For the union, the Board well and accurately described the duties of the masters, mates, and pilots, but they did not give us any relief.

Our relief does not lie with the National Labor Relations Board or the court, but quite clearly with the Congress that created this intolerable condition. All we ask is that we be permitted to go our way in the same orderly manner to which we were so long accustomed. We can find no legal patchwork that would serve the purpose. In addition, we stand foursquare with the position taken by all the other 105 international unions in the American Federation of Labor. Now that we in the Masters, Mates, and Pilots of America have been done this grievous and reckless injury of putting us clearly under two laws in conflict, we call for outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, and full restoration of the Wagner Act.

We have no quarrel with the National Labor Relations Board. That Board could have acted in no other manner than to our detriment because the Taft-Hartley Act has made it so.

I cannot too strongly call attention to the exceptional teamwork required of offices and men aboard a vessel. As I read the Taft-Hartley Act and its implications toward those of our union, I am left to wonder how far any one of us might go toward fishing out a man overboard just because we are classed by this law as "management." Did this law ever intend that because literally "we are all in the same boat" when we are on duty, that we must count 10 and decide whether management owns us or we, too, are laboring men? The Taft-Hartley Act has aroused some queer thinking, perhaps the queerest of which is the law itself.

Mr. Chairman, the story of the Masters, Mates, and Pilots of America can be simply and briefly stated. This, I believe I have done. I leave with you the same question I have asked earlier: How can we live under two laws in conflict? Under the one we are allowed to bargain for our members as full-fledged members of the human race and organized labor. Under the other law, also passed by the Congress, we are denied the rights granted us under the first law.

Gentlemen, in your hands lies the relief—repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. KELLEY (presiding). Mr. Van Buren, does your association embrace the pilots on the ocean?

Mr. VAN BUREN. We do represent those; yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. All of them?

Mr. VAN BUREN. Most all of them; yes, sir. I dare say 95 percent of them.

Mr. KELLEY. Captains are not included in this?

Mr. VAN BUREN. Yes; they are.

Mr. KELLEY. Are they?

Mr. VAN BUREN. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. Captains of vessels?

Mr. VAN BUREN. Masters, Mates, and Pilots. That is our name.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. I have no questions.

Mr. VAN BUREN. We had been going on before the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act without any trouble. We went in and organized those men and they have been our members, but since the enactment of this we have been stymied. Under some of the contracts we had on the ocean liners, when we went into negotiating following the enactment of this law, in some instances, we had to give a letter of indemnity whereby, if it was found the law was violated and suit was started against them, we would indemnify them. We had to do that, and we did not have to do that before. We did not have any trouble with the Railway Labor Act, those of our group who come under that.

Mr. KELLEY. Do I understand that heretofore you were under the Railway Labor Act?

Mr. VAN BUREN. One part of our organization is, those of us who are working on railroads and operating on vessels, and the others are ocean-going, coastwise, and on the Great Lakes.

Mr. KELLEY. Of course, the Taft-Hartley Act would forbid you to have an organization of the masters and pilots?

Mr. VAN BUREN. If the company does not want to talk to us they do not have to. That is what happened with the six companies on the Great Lakes. We had 350 of the men in the 6 companies, which comprised the majority, and we asked the company to talk with us about a cotnract and they refused even after we showed them the authorizations that we had in our files. We appealed to the NLRB, and they held a hearing in Cleveland, but they could not get any place, and it was referred to Washington, and we got the decision from Washington that we were supervisors and that we can only organize and represent those people if the employer is willing to negotiate and talk with us.

Mr. KELLEY. Of course, under the present bill there is nothing said about that. You would be all right under the present bill?

Mr. VAN BUREN. We would be all right there.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you have pilots in the organization of the steamships known as the Far East Conference, Mr. Van Buren?

Mr. VAN BUREN. We are affiliated with those foreign groups.

Mr. JACOBS. I am talking about the ships that apparently run out of New York and are east coast; they are organized into an organization called the Far East Conference. Is that term familiar to you?

Mr. VAN BUREN. That might be the shipowners.

Mr. JACOBS. It is an organization of shipowners.

Mr. VAN BUREN. Oh, yes.

Mr. JACOBS. You are familiar with that term?

Mr. VAN BUREN. Yes. We represent those masters and mates.

Mr. JACOBS. On those ships?

Mr. VAN BUREN. On those ships.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, with your permission I would like to read into the record, as bearing upon this point, portions of an editorial from the New York Times, August 14, 1948, which reads as follows:

> Under the system (the Far East Conference) which is a part of most conference agreements, a shipper who agrees to use conference lines exclusively gets a lower rate. The companies excepting a few independents believe the practice stabilized trade and prevents costly rate wars in ocean commerce. History tends to support them. Maritime law exemptions—exempts steamship conferences from antitrust legislation which would were it not for such exemption prohibit the rate making, the exclusive features and other measures admittedly aimed at the lone-wolf operator. There is some ingratiating quantity in the lone wolf who bucks the crowd and whose very presence in many trades keeps the big companies on their collective toes.

I read that into the record to show the very people these people are bargaining with apparently are permitted under the law to operate as a combine themselves.

I should like also to read a couple of paragraphs from a letter that I received from Management Research Associates at Indianapolis, Ind.

> You asked the question about unionization of foremen. This is a touchy question because of the individual rights involved. However, if management does its job I think they would have no trouble at all in keeping the foremen from wanting to have the union. The first problem is that of selection. If the right man is selected for foreman, and if he is properly indoctrinated and obligated in the duties as a foreman, he will not want to join it. It may be that management will be forced to live up to its obligation, and the only way that that may be done is through the threat of unionization.

I would like to comment that as far as I know these people represent the management point of view on the matter.

Mr. VAN BUREN. Would you like me to comment on it?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes; go ahead and comment on it, Mr. Van Buren.

Mr. VAN BUREN. I believe, and I think the majority of us do believe, that if the employee was treated fairly in the first instance we would not have any labor unions today, because, after all, when you are paying dues in a labor organization you are paying for the protection of your job, and if those men did not need protection they would not pay dues in any organization.

Mr. JACOBS. I think you are right about that, and I think that is just what this man says and, as I say, so far as I know, he represents management's point of view. I think that I can agree with your statement, Mr. Van Buren, with the exception of page 2 where you say that the Taft-Hartley was drawn by technicians and advisers who knew little of what they were doing.

After I had studied it I came to the conclusion there were some pretty wise birds who worked on that.

Mr. VAN BUREN. I will agree with that, too. They were wise enough to leave us out.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. This is a new decision. I have never heard of this one before. I am glad you brought it up for this reason:

This question of foremen and supervisors having the right to self-organization has been strenuously stressed by management, particularly in heavy industries. They have pointed out to us here very specifically that that is one of the key sections of the Taft-Hartley Act that they want to reinstate under the bill.

If I get your picture correctly, you represent the masters, mates, and pilots. I know what the pilot does, and I know his responsibility, and the mates and masters—what is the master?

Mr. VAN BUREN. He is the captain of the vessel, in charge of the vessel. The mates are those who relieve him.

Mr. WIER. You are all employees of the steamship lines?

Mr. VAN BUREN. And the railroads, some of them.

Mr. WIER. I am coming to that. Your organization has been in existence quite a long while; has it not?

Mr. VAN BUREN. About 62 years.

Mr. WIER. And all of these 62 years you have been bargaining with your employers for contracts covering wages and hours and working conditions?

Mr. VAN BUREN. All except about 10 of them when we were more or less a fraternal organization; but then we went into the labor end of it, and we have been bargaining ever since, very successfully.

Mr. WIER. What portion of your entire membership is employed in the Great Lakes?

Mr. VAN BUREN. We do not have too many people out there. The only ones we have out there are those car ferries owned and operated by the railroads. We would have had more if it had not been for this decision. We have a combine out there called the Lake Carriers Association, which is spending lots and lots of money to keep the men employed on their vessels from organizing. Those were the men who were in the group of the six companies where we could not get recognition from the Board, and they classed us as supervisors and said we did not come under the act, and they would not hold an election.

Mr. WIER. Are your people pretty well organized on the east coast, on the Gulf, and on the Pacific coast?

Mr. VAN BUREN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Eighty percent?

Mr. VAN BUREN. Yes; more than that.

Mr. WIER. More than that. We come now to this question of the Taft-Hartley Act. All of these men were enjoying similar contracts without any interference by Government in your bargaining up until the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. VAN BUREN. Yes; and we have those contracts yet, but the only thing is when we go in to renew them, as I said before, in some instances, we had to give letters of indemnity because we were trying to get a preference of employment. We could not get the closed shop; they would not give us that, but they would go along with the preference of employment rule, but we had to give a letter of indemnity.

Mr. WIER. Did you ever have trouble over the masters and mates in collective bargaining?

Mr. VAN BUREN. They never raised the question that we were not entitled to be recognized in collective bargaining. We never knew we were placed as such a big boss as we are today.

Mr. WIER. After the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, as I interpret your story, you took that to the employers there and asked them for a renewal, and to change the conditions in them?

Mr. VAN BUREN. That is not correct.

Mr. WIER. You made mention of the Great Lakes.

Mr. VAN BUREN. We got turned down there. We had the railroad operators, and we never had any trouble there.

Mr. WIER. Where did you have the trouble?

Mr. VAN BUREN. The bulk carriers.

Mr. WIER. On the Great Lakes?

Mr. VAN BUREN. Yes.

Mr. WIER. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. VAN BUREN. We never had any contract. We have some excursion boats there.

Mr. WIER. I would like to get together with you here and find out where we are going. Some place in your organizational field you went to renew an agreement, as I understand?

Mr. VAN BUREN. To renew an agreement; yes.

Mr. WIER. And the employer said, "No, we are not going to deal collectively with you from now on"?

Mr. VAN BUREN. That is right.

Mr. WIER. You had not recognized the Taft-Hartley Act carried the indication of nonforemen; you have not recognized that yet?

Mr. VAN BUREN. We were told a long time ago, when the law was passed we did not come under the act because we were foremen.

Mr. WIER. Who told you that?

Mr. VAN BUREN. We had counsel tell us that when it was first enacted.

Mr. WIER. And you tried to renew the agreement and the employer said, "No," and you wound up before the National Labor Relations Board?

Mr. VAN BUREN. That is right.

Mr. WIER. Let me ask you this: If you people are eliminated from the provisions of the National Labor Relations Board, how about the chief engineers on all the boats?

Mr. VAN BUREN. They are, too.

Mr. WIER. They are not members of the union, your union, though, are they?

Mr. VAN BUREN. That is a separate organization. They are limited.

Mr. WIER. Did the National Labor Relations Board draw a line of demarcation between those who could enjoy the freedom of organization, and those who could not? Did they draw a line some place, or did they just say the chief engineers, the masters, mates, and pilots?

Mr. VAN BUREN. In their decision with us they said we were licensed deck officers, in substance, and therefore we were supervisors or foremen.

Mr. WIER. This is going to come on the House floor—I will conclude with this—I know they are going to attempt to put this in the bill, because it has been so heavily stressed and I want to get all the information I can as to the status of it, and I would ask you to file with the chairman a copy of the decision of the National Labor Relations Board in relation to their decision.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it will be made a part of the record.

Mr. WIER. That is what I want; yes.

Mr. VAN BUREN. This is the only copy I have.

Mr. WIER. Will you have a copy made?

Mr. VAN BUREN. Yes, I will do that.

Mr. WIER. That is, unless you want to go by default.

Mr. VAN BUREN. I want to get it in.

Mr. WIER. Yours is the first case that has a good groundwork. If you want to be returned to the status of a worker instead of a boss——

Mr. VAN BUREN. I will get it to you. I will have a lot of copies made.

Mr. WIER. And give us some ammunition. I have never heard of this status before. That is all.

(The decision referred to will be found in the appendix following close of today's testimony. See p. 1112.)

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Van Buren.

Mr. VAN BUREN. You are welcome, Mr. Chairman, and I want to thank the members of the committee for listening to me.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Oliver? Mr. Oliver is president of the International Federation of Technical Engineers, Architects and Draftsmen's Union.

Mr. Oliver, do you want to read your statement, or do you want to summarize it?

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to read it, if I may.

Mr. KELLEY. If you insist, but it is very long.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, if there is no objection, I would like to file the statement and only comment on it briefly.

Mr. WIER. I was going to say, Mr. Chairman, I have some knowledge of their difficulties since the Taft-Hartley Act, and it is closely related to the question brought up by the last witness.

In other words, the Taft-Hartley Act says supervisory employment is not included and, I think, that is the thing you are interested in.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. So, I think, if he lays some stress upon what the Taft-Hartley Act has done as to making determinations, and what the Taft-Hartley Act recognizes, I think that will cover your field.

TESTIMONY OF STANLEY W. OLIVER, PRESIDENT, INTERNATIONAL FEDERATION OF TECHNICAL ENGINEERS, ARCHITECTS, AND DRAFTSMEN, A. F. OF L.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee:

Under the Taft-Hartley Act, clauses were inserted which defined professional employees. They were defined in these terms:

(a) Any employee engaged in work (i) predominantly intellectual and varied in character as opposed to routine mental, manual, mechanical, or physical work; (ii) involving the consistent exercise of discretion and judgment in its performance; (iii) of such a character that the output produced or the result accomplished cannot be standardized in relation to a given period of time; (iv) requiring knowledge of an advanced type in a field of science or learning customarily acquired by a prolonged course of specialized intellectual instruction and study in an institution—and so forth.

And then the act states that the National Labor Relations Board shall never include people in this category with nonprofessional people in the same collective bargaining unit.

The way that is worked out, as far as our organization is concerned—and we represent engineers, architects, draftsmen, and other types of technical personnel—is what we have a large design office the National Labor Relations Board has to come along and decide which of the technical personnel are professional and which are nonprofessional, and find out whether all the people want to be in one bargaining unit or not, and if they do not, to hold separate elections. This provision was inserted almost wholly as a result of the activity of the engineers' joint counsel, which is an employer group which represents a number of the professional societies. I happen to belong to three professional societies myself, and I do not believe they should represent me in matters that involve working conditions and conditions of employment. To have this program is absolutely nonsensical.

For example, time-study men in plants are one group of people that we quite often represent. Those time-study men are former mechanics of some kind, and quite often machinists, or apprentice machinists, and certainly they could not be considered professional, and none of them are ever college-trained people; and yet, during the legislative history of the Taft-Hartley Act there was an attempt made by the employer group to call them supervisors. Time-study employees are those who go around with stop watches and determine the rates of pay by which other people earn their money, based on the way in which they work. That part of it was thrown out in conference, but somebody got the idea these people were professional, and so the NLRB has been required to hold that they are professional, so that when we get two groups in one of our design offices, professional and nonprofessional, of all things, the time-study people are in the professional, and it does not make sense.

Another thing about it that does not make sense is that all these people are technical people. They are doing similar work, sometimes identical work. They have the same identical conditions of employment, and we think they ought to be considered together.

This has caused us considerable trouble. We just had a case in the F. W. Sickles Co. up in Providence, R. I.; the company carried on long drawn-out litigation, first with the National Labor Relations Board and then with the district court and then with the Supreme Court, and the NLRB was upheld in its original decision that time-study men, for example, were not supervisors.

Aside from this professional aspect that we have trouble with, we have trouble with these designations of some of our people as supervisors when they are not, in fact, supervisors. Engineers quite often have technical control over work, but they do not supervise anybody. They do not have any right to hire and fire them, and they have no administrative responsibility. But they have technical control over a job, because they determine what job should be done and how it should be done. Yet there is a continual attempt by men in their groups to have them classed as supervisors, not because they are supervisors, but because they want to have them classed that way.

So we are opposed to the inclusion of a separate definition of professional employees. We think that all nonadministrative and nonexecutive people who are wage and salary employees should have the right to organize and to be grouped into logical collective-bargaining groups. We also think that supervisors should have the right to self-determination in organizing. I include there bona fide supervisors.

A lot of people are trying to compromise on that. They say, "Yes, supervisors should organize, but they should not be permitted to organize in the same unions that their subordinates are organized in."

I do not think that holds water, either. My organization is opposed to that. We do not think that the Government should tell people who should represent them, any more than they should say, for example, that an attorney who customarily represents employers may not by law represent employees. I think that every person who works for a living should have the right to determine which union, or whether any union, should represent him.

In addition to the points which I have made in my statement, that about summarizes my position, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you have any questions, Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. No questions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. I am hardly in a position to ask the gentleman any questions, since I did not show him the courtesy of being in when he read his statement.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Jacobs, at the request of the Chair, I did not read my statement.

(Mr. Oliver's prepared statement is inserted at the close of his testimony.)

Mr. JACOBS. I did not hear what you said; so it would not be fair to ask any questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. Yes; I want to review this field, because I have some interest and experience in it, and for your enlightenment, I will tell you something about the problem as I found it.

It is another one of those relationships to workmen, the exemption of foremen and supervisory employees that we are going into. Now, Mr. Oliver, follow me and correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. Chairman, I went into the General Mills, who have quite a large-sized mechanical division. I went into that under the Wagner Act and organized about 55 technical engineers, draftsmen, and affiliated workers. Management demanded an election, and we had the election covering that department. The election was held and we won it by a substantial majority. We presented management with a contract. Management began to negotiate with us, and in the very opening stages of the negotiations, management said, "Now, here, out of all these men that you cover in your contract, we maintain exemption for all of the heads of the departments."

The question came for hearing before the National Labor Relations Board as to the exemptions under that contract. And in 99 cases out of 100, management and the union reached an agreement as to who had authority under the National Labor Relations Board to hire, fire, and was a part of management. There was no disagreement under that.

Beyond that, we covered the rest of the employees and secured a good agreement.

Now, under that same process today, there would have been about 12 of those employees who were eligible under the Wagner Act to become members of this union who today would be exempted from it.

Is that correct?

Mr. OLIVER. That is about the average.

Mr. WIER. That is the average. Now, let me ask you another question. If I get the information correctly, in the Eightieth Congress I think there was a gentleman sitting here who happend to be a member of one of the engineering societies, was there not, a Member of Congress, who initiated this particular section on the engineering field?

Mr. OLIVER. It is my understanding that this wording was initiated by the Engineers Joint Council. I have referred to the Engineers Joint Council in my statement. They are an organization which represents a number of professional societies, of which I am a member of one. That is, professional societies such as the American Institute of Electric Engineers——

Mr. WIER. Pardon me. But I think I am familiar with that. We know the engineers' societies, the bourgeois, were for this amendment. But the man who engineered it in Congress, I understand, was a member of one of those societies. He is not here. You were not in office then?

Mr. OLIVER. No. I have only been in office about 6 months.

Mr. WIER. Well, this might be news to you. But he is not here now; so they will not have that help on the floor.

But I want to say that I join in saying that this Taft-Hartley Act did go far afield, and the National Labor Relations Board followed suit by their decision as to who was eligible under that professional title. And I want to be of some help to you in clarifying that.

Mr. OLIVER. Thank you.

Mr. WIER. In accordance with the old Wagner Act. That was far enough.

That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Oliver.

Mr. OLIVER. Thank you.

(Mr. Oliver's prepared statement is as follows:)

STATEMENT BY STANLEY W. OLIVER, PRESIDENT, INTERNATIONAL FEDERATION OF TECHNICAL ENGINEERS, ARCHITECTS, AND DRAFTSMEN, A. F. OF L., RELATIVE TO H. R. 2032, THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949

The membership which I represent is composed of technical and professional engineers, architects, scientists, as well as allied subprofessional workers employed throughout the United States and the Territories. About 20 percent of our members are employed in engineering capacities by various city, county, State, and Federal governments, and the remaining 80 percent are employed in private industry. Most of these members are college graduates or have equivalent technical experience. Many are registered professional engineers under their respective State registration laws.

My purpose in appearing before you is to discuss those features of the present Labor-Management Relations Act which affect "professional" employees. I refer specifically to section 2 (12) and to section 9 (b) (1) of Public Law 101, Eightieth Congress.

Section 2 (12), which is a definition of the term "professional employees," states that—

"(12) The term 'professional employee' means—

"(a) any employee engaged in work (i) predominantly intellectual and varied in character as opposed to routine mental, manual, mechanical, or physical work; (ii) involving the consistent exercise of discretion and judgment in its performance; (iii) of such a character that the output produced or the result accomplished cannot be standardized in relation to a given period of time; (iv) requiring knowledge of an advanced type in a field of science or learning customarily acquired by a prolonged course of specialized intellectual instruction and study in an institution of higher learning or a hospital, as distinguished from a general academic education or from an apprenticeship or from training in the performance of routine mental, manual, or physical processes; or

"(b) any employee, who (i) has completed the courses of specialized intellectual instruction and study described in clause (iv) of paragraph (a), and (ii) is performing related work under the supervision of a professional person to qualify himself to become a professional employee as defined in paragraph (a)."

Section 9 deals with "Representatives and Elections." In subparagraph (b) of that section it is stated that—

"(b) The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to assure to employees the fullest freedom in exercising the rights guaranteed by this Act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or subdivision thereof: Provided, That the Board shall not (1) decide that any unit is appropriate for such purposes if such unit includes both professional employees and employees who are not professional employees unless a majority of such professional employees vote for inclusion in such unit."

The enactment of such legislation in 1947 placed a new definition on the word "professional," a definition designed to include far more than the three commonly referred to as the learned professions of theology, law, and medicine.

In the engineering world, professional engineers are those engineers who have been licensed under their respective State laws to offer their technical services to the public on a fee basis. These engineers, however, are not employees, do not have employer-employee relationships and, thus, are not considered in any legislation designed to promote good labor-management relations. There is another small group of upper-bracket engineers who probably consider themselves in a professional category, who are employed by large industrial firms on a consulting basis. With few exceptions, however, such engineers also have bona fide executive or administrative functions and they, also, are automatically excluded from labor legislation since definitely they are management personnel. Self-employed engineers, as well as bona fide executives and administrators, should not be named and defined any more than bank presidents and other top-management personnel in legislation dealing with labor-management relations. Thus, in the language of the engineering profession which I understand those engineers who are employees, whether college graduates or not, should be accorded the same treatment in relations with employers as all the other employees.

Many technical engineers, probably for reasons of personal ego, are prone to consider themselves in the same category with professional doctors, lawyers, dentists, etc. An analysis of this situation, however, reveals that not more than about 5 percent of all engineers ever become actively engaged in direct consulting engineering work on a professional-fee basis and the remaining 95 percent serve their entire careers as employee engineers. The exact opposite is true, of course, in the case of professional doctors, lawyers, and dentists.

Prior to enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, no exclusion, either real or implied, existed for employees in technical categories, professional or nonprofessional. During the years of operation under the Wagner Act, however, the old National Labor Relations Board gradually established the policy wherein technical engineering employees having similar conditions of employment, regardless of the degree of difficulty and educational background required for specific jobs, were all included in the same collective-bargaining units. The Board, on numerous occasions, excluded from such units nontechnical employees such as clerks, timekeepers, stenographers, typists, etc. Our organization accepted that arrangement as being the most practicable and desirable, free from the standpoint of both employers and employees, for collective-bargaining purposes. Our organization does not seek to represent the nontechnical clerks and stenographers since, under the American Federation of Labor, they belong with the Office Employees' International Union.

Under the old National Labor Relations Board a number of decisions were rendered establishing a precedent wherein technical and professional engineers and allied workers were grouped separately from clerical and production workers. Several examples are quoted as follows:

Chrysler Corp. (1 N. L. R. B. 164, February 14, 1936): The designing engineers were considered a homogenous, professionally trained group, distinguished in function and training from clerical and production workers on the one hand, and from electrical engineers on the other. This group thus included body designers, including lead-off men, lay-out men, checkers, detailers, and beginners, engineering designers, including tracers as well as groups just mentioned; tool, special machine and die designers, including process engineers as well as the groups first mentioned, and except such who had authority to hire or discharge. All these were ruled to constitute an appropriate unit for purposes of bargaining.

Underwood Machinery Co. (59 N. L. R. B. 42): Engineering department personnel were excluded from industrial unit of employees of special machinery and steel fabricating plant upon finding that engineers are college graduates and work on salary basis at much higher rate than production and maintenance employees, and that draftsmen are also technically trained for their positions and work under the same conditions as the engineers.

American Bridge Co. (67 N. L. R. B. 776): Appropriate unit determined to consist of draftsmen, tracer draftsmen, squad leaders, and civil and mechanical engineers of structural steel and bridge fabricating plant.

A precedent for including all technical engineering employees in a single collective-bargaining unit has long been established on the railroads, administered under the Railway Labor Act. It is customary for the National Mediation Board to include in the same unit, "Technical engineers, architects, draftsmen, and allied workers, including such job titles as assistant engineer, instrumentmen, rodmen, chairmen, draftsmen, and other engineering and technical employees in the maintenance of way and structures, signal, and mechanical departments of the carrier." In this connection, the Railway Labor Act is customarily cited as an instrument of successful labor-management relations.

At the present time we have under contract technical engineers, architects, draftsmen, etc., earning wages varying all the way from a minimum of $112 a month to well over $600, covering the nonexecutive, nonadministrative positions. Those in the lower brackets, of course, are beginners—mostly high-school graduates who are in-service trainees learning to become draftsmen or engineering aides. Many of them later enter college for formal training and become qualified engineers. In the higher brackets many of our members have masters' and doctors' degrees.

In private industry, engineers employed in the design offices vary in numbers from a handful to several thousand or more. The salary levels in each office vary all the way from the minimum to the maximum figures quoted above, depending upon responsibility of the particular jobs and the education and experience required of the incumbents.

Prior to 1947 it was customary to consider all such engineering employees in an office as constituting a single bargaining unit and contracts were negotiated both by our organization and by others, as well, customarily covering the entire group. Since the passage of Public Law 101, however, the NLRB has had a mandate to draw a line through the engineering office to decide which of these people are professional and which are nonprofessional employees and some of the jobs are necessarily border-line cases and may land on either side of the line. Then, it is directed that the two groups thus formed be considered in separate negotiations. This is forced on the employer as well as the union and may work to the disadvantage of both. Our experience has been that where formerly we encountered little trouble in carrying on peaceful and orderly negotiations with employers, division of the bargaining unit under Public Law 101 has served to encourage lengthy arguments with employers, resulting in lowered morale, less production, and general chaos in the very vital sections of the plants upon which direct production activities depend for satisfactory operation.

It has been the contention of our organization that the Congress should not pass legislation encouraging the division of logical bargaining units. Elimination of the language of section 2 (12) and that portion of section 9 dealing with professional employees is a proper solution to the problem. We believe that a reversion to the Wagner Act will work to the ultimate advantage of both engineers and employers. Such legislation would permit the National Labor Relations Board to render its decisions on the same basis that it did prior to 1947.

It is my understanding that sections 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) were included in the Taft-Hartley Act largely at the request of an organization known as the Engineers' Joint Council, a coordinating body representing a number of professional engineering and scientific societies. This group has suggested the same provisions be continued. The most active of the professional societies attempting to block the organization of engineers in legitimate employee groups has been the American Society of Civil Engineers. Mr. E. Lawrence Chandler, assistant secretary of the American Society of Civil Engineers, is also chairman of a panel representing the Engineers' Joint Council, and testified in their behalf a few days ago before this committee. For the committee's information I might point out that, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, United States Department of Labor, there are a total of about 95,000 civil engineers in the United States. About half of all the civil engineers are employed by various Federal, State, and local governments and are not involved in the legislation under consideration. About 45,000 are employed in executive and administrative positions and also are not under consideration. It is from this latter group that most of the professional society members come, and they represent employer engineers, consulting engineers, construction superintendents, college professors, etc., and others who are not covered, and properly so, in legislation dealing with labor-management relations. However, their organization continues to inject its views into legislative matters affecting the welfare of employee engineers who, largely, work for their members. It should not be misconstrued that they are a bona fide employee group for such is not the case.

In furthering the interests of the employers they represent, the professional societies continually spread the canard that sections 2 (12) and 9 (b) (1) of Taft-Hartley are the only saving clauses which save engineers from being forced to join unions along with "janitors, roustabouts, window washers, and the like." Nothing could be further from the truth. The organization which I represent has been in existence for over 30 years representing engineers in collective bargaining. It has always been, and still is, an organization of engineers, run by engineers, and for engineers. Many of the problems of engineering employees, however, are identical to those of other people who work for wages or salaries. This is true particularly of legislative matters—hence our affiliation with the American Federation of Labor is of great benefit to the engineering profession as a whole because of the assistance, cooperation, and coordination effected through that affiliation. Such affiliation, however, does not mean that we are not a separate and distinct organization with complete autonomy and authority to manage our own affairs insofar as they affect the welfare of engineers.

In connection with the statement presented to this committee by Mr. E. Lawrence Chandler, representing the Engineers' Joint Council and a number of other professional societies, I would like to submit several observations. I, myself, am a member of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, one of the professional engineering societies which endorsed the statement presented by Mr. Chandler. I have been a continuous and active member of the organization since I joined as a student engineer in 1935. As a matter of fact, in my senior year in college I was student chairman of the campus branch of the AIEE. Without doubt, most of the technical progress which has been made in the field of electrical engineering in the United States has been coordinated and aided by the activities of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers. The same thing may be said for the mechanical engineers, the civil engineers, and the other professional societies.

It is noteworthy, however, that the professional societies, interested primarily in advancement of technical progress in their respective fields, are, in the main, dominated by employer groups. The reason for this is quite obvious. Large corporations engaged in building or manufacturing engineered products are naturally interested in improving the quality of the goods they produce. Thus, they are interested in seeing the particular branch of engineering with which they are concerned advance to the highest possible level. It is common practice in many industrial plants for engineers in the higher-salary levels, particularly, to be given time off with pay to attend the conventions and meetings of the professional societies. Some companies pay the dues and expenses of their society members. Engineers serving as officers in the local branches of the societies oftentimes have secretarial and mailing facilities of their employers placed at their disposal, so that actually many employers are, in fact, closely identified with the societies themselves—if not officially, at least in practice. In addition, such activities, of course, furnish good and legitimate advertising for the products the companies manufacture and sell.

When it comes to representing engineers on an economic basis, I believe we should draw the line. I do not believe that any group which is so closely supervised by employers and employer engineers, should be given much credence when it comes to determining what kind of working conditions should be enforced for those engineers who are employees.

As I pointed out earlier, I am a member of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers. The AIEE has endorsed a statement made to this committee relative to proposed legislation affecting electrical engineers. I would like the committee to know, for the benefit of the record, that I, as a member, have not been asked for an opinion as to how I think the labor legislation should be amended or repealed and I do not know of any other member who has been asked for an opinion. The same condition prevailed 2 years ago when the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 was under consideration by the Congress. The president of the AIEE at that time, J. Elmer Housley, was also an executive of the Aluminum Corp. of America. Under his direction a similar statement was made before the committees of Congress, placing AIEE on record favoring discrimination between professional and nonprofessional engineers in relation to collective-bargaining rights. Approximately 1 month after the testimony had been presented to Congress, Mr. Housley sent out a questionnaire to all members to find out what they thought should be recommended for testimony. At that time I sent a letter of protest to President Housley but, of course, it was too late. The damage had already been done.

So that there may be no question as to whom Mr. Chandler was speaking for in his testimony before this committee several days ago, I am including herewith the names and business connections of recent presidents of a number of the various professional societies which have presumed to come here and tell the committee what the employee engineer should have in the way of protection:

American Institute of Electrical Engineers: 1947–48, Blake D. Hull, retired chief engineer, Southwestern Bell Telephone Co.; 1946–47, J. Elmer Housley, district power manager, Aluminum Corp. of America; 1944–45, C. A. Powel, assistant to vice president in charge of engineering, Westinghouse Electric Corp.; 1943–44, Nevin E. Funk, executive vice president, Philadelphia Electric Co.; 1941–42, David C. Prince, vice president, General Electric Co.

American Society of Civil Engineers: 1948, Richard E. Dougherty, vice president and assistant to president, New York Central Railroad; 1947, Edgar M. Hastings, chief engineer, Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad; 1946, Wesley W. Horner, consulting engineer, Horner & Shifrin, St. Louis, Mo.; 1945, John C. Stevens, consulting engineer, Stevens & Koon, Portland, Oreg; 1943, Ezra B. Whitman, Whitman, Requardt & Associates; 1942, Ernest B. Black, consulting engineer, Black & Veatch, New York City.

Obviously, the continued attempts of employer groups to weaken and divide engineers into separate units is intended to result in their effective elimination from coverage under the act through weakened bargaining power and consequent company domination. There is always an attempt by these management groups to speak in behalf of engineers employed in industrial establishments. It has been charged by them that the duties of technical engineering employees engaged in the development of industrial processes or the design of equipment or products may be such as to make necessary continuous and prolonged application of their individual services. It has been stated by management groups that the very nature of those services is such that the employee must be granted "prerogatives" such as access to various portions of the plant at all hours, the right to work with continuing shifts, as cases may demand, latitude as to hours and location of employment, and freedom of judgment as to the best method of carrying out special assignments. I want to say here and now that such arguments are pure nonsense and are based on nothing more solid than folklore. In most cases in industry where technical engineers are employed, their hours of work are easily adjusted to meet occasional abnormal conditions, just as easily as are the hours and conditions of employment of production employees who are building the equipment designed by the engineers. Whenever any employee, whether he is an engineer or a craftsman, cannot complete his work regularly during the normal scheduled hours of work, then it is reasonable to assume that another employee is required to give him some assistance. If it is necessary to work longer hours as an occasional thing, then an engineering employee should be entitled to all of the usual provisions accorded other employees in order to prevent exploitation by management.

There is also a serious effect upon the morale of any group of employees who are given separate treatment as to wages and hours of work from other employees located in the same plant or general area, e. g. in many plants there are technical, professional and subprofessional employees who work adjacent to skilled artisans under almost identical working conditions. It is common practice of employers to place the technical and professional employees on weekly, monthly or annual salaries where, allegedly they have the advantage of a steady income (so long as they are employed). There is little advantage in salaried employment, however, if it serves merely as a cloak for longer hours of work or lower rates of pay. Another practice is to confer fancy titles on mediocre jobs which infer executive or administrative functions. The proposal of the professional societies which has been made before this committee is that the language of Public Law 101 be retained, which not only seeks to divide the treatment of technical engineering employees from that accorded other employees in the plant; but seeks to divide them among themselves. We are opposed to any such consideration. We are opposed to the deliberate division of technical engineering employees as suggested by the employers.

In closing, let me sum up by stating that we endorse the principle of repealing Public Law 101; we endorse the reenactment of the Wagner Act.

I wish to thank the committee for affording me an opportunity to appear before it.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Mitchell, president of the National Farm Labor Union.

TESTIMONY OF H. L. MITCHELL, PRESIDENT, NATIONAL FARM LABOR UNION, A. F. OF L.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like just to make a very brief statement, submit my full statement to the committee for the record, and show the members of the committee this motion picture that we have prepared to show you.

We are prepared to show you a 15-minute motion picture involving the Di Giorgio strike and the conditions under which agricultural workers live throughout the country. I think it is appropriate to the purposes of this hearing, inasmuch as these members have been victimized by the Taft-Hartley Act. I would like just to read two paragraphs of my statement, if I may.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well. Proceed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want to bring to your attention the use of the Taft-Hartley Act in an attempt to break the longest strike of agricultural workers in American labor history. On Independence Day, 1948, the 1,100 men and women employees of the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp., in Kern County, Calif., were notified that an injunction under the Taft-Hartley law had been secured by the National Labor Relations Board in behalf of their employer.

The Taft-Hartley Act specifically excludes any agricultural worker from its provisions. Because these members of the National Farm Union are agricultural workers, they were excluded by the Taft-Hartley Act from using the National Labor Relations Board. But while the Di Giorgio strikers cannot by law enjoy any of the Taft-Hartley benefits, they have had a temporary injunction hanging over their heads for the past 8 months.

Thus the great majesty of the law which a wise man once observed "lets poor men and rich men alike sleep under bridges," has found its parallel in this application of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The committee has heard one side of this strike involving the use of the injunction in agricultural disputes from a former witness, the Secretary-Treasurer of the Associated Farmers of California, Inc., who is known among California farm workers as "Pick Handle Hank" because of his strike-breaking activities in the past.

If you will bear with me, I would like the operator to show you this film.

(Whereupon, a film, entitled "Poverty in the Valley of Plenty," was presented.)

Mr. MITCHELL. There is just a little bit more that I would like you to see in connection with the Taft-Hartley Act, in other instances.

Mr. KELLEY. How long will it last?

Mr. MITCHELL. Just a minute.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well.

(Whereupon, a film was presented.)

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey, do you have any questions?

Mr. BAILEY. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving? You were not here. Do you have any questions to ask Mr. Mitchell?

Mr. IRVING. I have no questions. I want to say that I have not receded from my position on including the agricultural workers in the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. KELLEY. I agree with you.

How about you, Mr. Jacobs? Have you any questions?

Mr. JACOBS. No, I believe not.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. I think we were considering this very problem in the wages-and-hours bill. It became a problem then as to whether we were going to include this kind of institution. Well, we have this bill off our hands, and now we come to this one.

I heard Congressman Smith say one day in the course of our discussions on the wages-and-hours bill that he had visited this situation out on the Di Giorgio Farm because it came in the argument. I never did hear any report. Did he ever make a report, Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. What was that, Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. During the discussions of the wages-and-hours bill, we had this farm situation up, when this farm came into the picture a couple of times, and Congressman Smith made some statement one day that he had visited this farm as a representative of the Labor Committee.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I do not recall. I know that Bakersfield, mentioned here, is the home town of Mr. Werdel. I thought he was the one who was most interested in it.

Mr. WIER. No. Mr. Smith, I think, was delegated to go out there during the heat of the controversy.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know if Mr. Smith was there, Mr. Wier. If any congressional committee came, none of our people was contacted by them, to the best of our knowledge.

Mr. WIER. Then I take it for granted, Mr. Mitchell, that you feel that you have been unjustly treated in being eliminated from the provisions of the Labor Act, and your management has been eliminated from it, and you feel that this kind of worker ought to be given the protection of the law?

Mr. MITCHELL. I think so sir. It seems to me that the people who work on these farms—I would like to say that it is in the statement there are 17,742 large-scale farms in the State of California alone, and they produce 66.4 percent of all agricultural production in that State. The size of those farms averages 1,248 acres, whereas the 100,000 or so other farms in the State average about 12 acres. Now, that is the situation you are up against. Throughout the United States, there are 102,136 class I farms, so classified by the Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census.

On those farms, 53 percent of the hired labor, or about 1,250,000 workers, are employed.

Mr. WIER. When you leave this Di Giorgia Farm on its tremendous scale, where else have you got a problem of the kind? This is a pretty good illustration. Is this the only place where you have a problem with industrial relations? Maybe you do not have them, but there are contracts out there between management and labor covering farms of this type.

Mr. MITCHELL. No, sir. To the best of my knowledge, there is not but one contract in the United States that covers agricultural labor, and that is up in south New Jersey.

Mr. WIER. How about Salinas, Calif.?

Mr. MITCHELL. There are no contracts that cover agricultural workers as such. They do cover men who pack the fruit and vegetables.

Mr. WIER. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. MITCHELL. There are some contracts of that type. I think they are held by the CIO, or the teamsters union.

Mr. WIER. There are contracts overing these types of workers?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, with the exception that they are not with the ones that do the work on the farms. They are with the ones who are in the packaging and processing period.

Mr. WIER. I see.

Well, I wish you luck.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you yield?

Mr. WIER. Yes. I am through.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you happen to have a copy of the decision of the Board in this case?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes; I do.

Mr. JACOBS. Or was there a decision preceding the injunction?

Mr. MITCHELL. No. The Board applied for an injunction in the Federal court which was granted, and then there were hearings held by the Board, the regional representatives of the Labor Board.

Mr. JACOBS. What was it? An unfair labor practice charge?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, that these workers whom you saw in the pictures there—they brought in the Mexican workers, or strikebreakers, and produced a crop. Well, our pickets followed the trucks loaded with produce, and rode carloads of wine to their destination. And they persuaded the other unions not to handle those products. It was on that basis that they issued the injunction.

Mr. WIER. That was a secondary boycott.

Mr. MITCHELL. Claiming it was a secondary boycott. There were several other unions who cooperated.

Mr. JACOBS. It was under section 8 (b) (4) (A), I imagine.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. WIER. That is all I wanted to ask, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you have a copy of the court decision? Can you cite it to me? I can find it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I can get that for you. I do not have it.

Mr. JACOBS. If you would, I would appreciate it. I would like to read it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. I would be glad to furnish you with that.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well, Mr. Mitchell. Thank you very much.

Mr. MITCHELL. Thank you very much for letting me make this presentation.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well.

(The balance of the prepared statement of Mr. Mitchell is as follows:)

I would like to tell you a few of the facts in this case since it involves members of the National Farm Labor Union, A. F. of L.

Early in 1947 a group of workers employed by the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp. began organizing on a ranch which covers 18 square miles. They made application to the National Farm Labor Union, an affiliate of the American Federation of Labor, for a charter as a local union.

After the local union had 858 paid members who were employed by the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp., they appointed a committee to meet with officials of the corporation to discuss their grievances. The corporation employment figures which were published later showed that there were 1,345 employees on the ranch. The local union therefore represented a clear majority of employees of the big farm.

The grievances of the workers were similar to those that normally arise in an unorganized factory. Indeed, the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp. is a typical example of the factory in the field type of farm operation. It is one of 17,742 such farm factories in California that produce 66.4 percent of the total farm production in that State. According to the Bureau of Census reports for 1945, there are 102,136 such class I farm units in the United States and they produce 24.2 percent of all food and fiber products grown in the United States. I cite these figures to show that Di Giorgio is first of all not a small farmer, nor is he alone in being one of the largest. It just happened that his workers were among the first in California to respond to an organizing campaign supported by the American Federation of Labor.

The grievances the workers wanted to discuss with their employer largely concerned working conditions on the large ranch. Among their grievances was a practice in use whereby a foreman had the sole right to hire and fire, and a worker was subject to discharge regardless of the number of years he had been employed on the ranch. Skilled irrigators complained that they were employed on 12-hour shifts without relief and were only paid for 11 hours. Other workers objected to overcrowding on company trucks which transported them to and from the fields, and to the lack of drinking water or toilet facilities in the fields and packing shed. The most serious grievance was a practice of calling in workers and holding them at the ranch headquarters often for as long as 4 hours, and then telling the workers there was no work for them that day but to return the next. Other men complained that they worked 14 hours and sometimes 24-hour shifts. While the workers wanted an increase in wages, the rates of 85 cents an hour, except for certain classifications, were about on a par with those paid other farm workers nearby.

The corporation officials refused to meet with a committee of their employees. The Kern County Central Labor Union with headquarters in Bakersfield, which represented all A. F. of L. unions in the county, intervened but the council too was rebuffed. The local union sent an appeal to Mr. Joseph Di Giorgio, the owner, who has homes in San Francisco, Florida, and on Park Avenue in New York. Mr. Di Giorgio never replied to the registered letter, although his receipt was returned.

On September 31, 1947, over 700 of the employees of the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp. met in the Grange Hall in the community of Weedpatch. The sheriff of the county, Mr. John Lonsalot, was present. A strike vote was taken. The workers voted unanimously to walk out the following day.

On October 1, 1947, over 1,100 employees stopped work. No one remained at work except the foremen, supervisors, and a few company stooges. There were less than 300 workers on the job when I arrived there the second day. A group of Mexican nationals working under Government contract were forced by local officials of the United States Department of Agriculture to return to work on the threat of being deported to old Mexico. These foreign nationals were removed only after a series of protests by officers of the American Federation of Labor addressed to our State Department.

The first day of the strike the pickets observed a blue Cadillac stopping at the ranch headquarters. They saw the president of the Associated Farmers, Mr. Robert Schmeiser, alight and go in to a conference with the corporation officials. Soon afterward there began a barrage of publicity, directed by an under cover publicity man known to be an agent of the Associated Farmers. The strikers were accused of being strangers and not employees of the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp. The strikers on and off the picket line began wearing their brass buttons bearing the name "Di Giorgio Fruit Corporation" and adopted a greeting to each other of "hello stranger." The local union offered to submit its records to any impartial agency to determine whether or not it represented the majority of Di Giorgio workers. The strikers were regular employees of the corporation. The average length of service on the ranch was over 4 years and many of them had been with the corporation for 10 years or more. The leader of the strike, James B. Price, president of the local, had been with the corporation for 9 years and was foreman of the packing shed at the time of the walk-out.

Following this the Associated Farmers prepared a brochure printed on slick paper and costing hundreds of dollars. This pamphlet entitled "A Community Aroused," purported to be a report of a committee of citizens. It was immediately noted that the representative citizens were mostly members of the Associated Farmers, big-farm operators, ginners, businessmen, newspaper owners. The brochure reprinted in full a copyrighted newspaper column by Harold Ickes, former Secretary of the Interior, reporting the strike. This reprint was made without M. Ickes' permission and an attack was centered on statements made therein. Homes of supervisors were pictured as homes of contented workers. A small swimming pool was featured as one of the recreational facilities provided by the benevolent corporation for its 1,345 employees, when in reality the pool was kept locked for the use of corporation officials only.

After attempts to start a back-to-work movement, the Di Giorgio Corp. assisted by the Associated Farmers began recruiting strikebreakers, bringing them in under cover of darkness. Many of the Mexicans were imported from El Paso, Tex. The union, in cooperation with the Texas Federation of Labor, secured warrants for the recruiters of Mexican strikebreakers but the recruiters promptly skipped the country. The slums of nearby towns and cities were searched for strikebreakers. Winos and men with cauliflower ears were noticed on the trucks going through the picket lines. There were many Mexicans, whereas 90 percent of the strikers were Anglo-Americans. The labor turn-over behind the picket lines was very high, for the strikebreakers were inefficient farm workers. Decent men and women quit work when they found they had been hired as strikebreakers.

The United States Immigration Service made a number of raids on the ranch and rounded up illegal alien Mexicans known as wetbacks. Forty-six were apprehended in 1 day.

On March 22, 1948, Congressman Elliott of the Tenth District of California inserted in the Congressional Record a list of about 1,200 names, purporting to be the regular employees of the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp., who had prepared and addressed a letter to county sheriff, John Lousalot, stating that they were all satisfied with conditions on the Di Giorgio Ranch. It is significant that the list is headed by one of the company officials, Walt Paladino, who was busy recruiting strike breakers for the company at the time the letter was dated. It is also significant that the letter with this list of names did not appear publicly until March 22, 1948, whereas it is dated December 19, 1947. For the convenience of the committee I am submitting a copy of the list of names of strikebreakers, alphabetized and classified in accordance with names of Anglo-Americans and Mexicans. There are over 400 Mexican names listed. We suspect that if a thorough check were made it would be found that the vast majority of these Mexicans came directly from Old Mexico and never heard of the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp. prior to the strike.

In spite of many provocations there was little violence. The members of the union were taught that they would lose the strike if they resorted to violence. Following the arrival of a caravan of cars and trucks loaded with food sent to the strikers by A. F. of L. union members from all parts of California, there was an attack on the picket line at the ranch headquarters. A mob of 40 strikebreakers led by the personnel director of the corporation beat up 5 men. Warrants were secured for one or two of them identified as wielding the clubs. The sheriff's deputies, normally on duty, were nowhere to be found when the mob attack occurred.

Four strikers were arrested for cutting down some fruit trees which were located very near the heavily guarded ranch headquarters. They were held in jail on a $15,000 bail each for several days. Bail was reduced and later the cases were dismissed. According to the strikers who know all about the particular orchard, the trees that were cut were diseased, and since they were located so near headquarters, no one except persons employed by the corporation could possibly have done the cutting.

On May 17, 1948, when the strike was over 7 months old, there was an attempt to assassinate the entire leadership of the local union. Unknown gunmen fired into a private home in Arvin, Calif., a community located near the Di Giorgio Ranch. James Price, the local's president, was shot while presiding over a meeting of the strike committee. While Price lay bleeding profusely, a telephone call was made to the corporation's doctor, the only one available at the time, asking him to come and render first aid. The doctor refused. Price was badly injured and has not yet fully recovered. Governor Warren denounced this as attempted assassination and offered a reward for information leading to the arrest of the gunmen. The would-be assassins were never discovered. At that time I made a statement that although we had no idea who did the shooting, we suspected the Associated Farmers, the Di Giorgio Corp., or the Communists. The latter, we knew, had attempted to muscle in on the strike, without success.

Meanwhile, the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp. with the use of strikebreakers, many of them Mexican "wetbacks" recruited from Mexico, had produced a crop and began shipping it to market. The union pickets followed the trucks and also tank cars of wine to their destination and there persuaded other A. F. of L. union members to refuse to handle the products. On July 4, the Di Giorgio strikers were notified that the National Labor Relations Board, acting on behalf of the corporation, had been granted an injunction in the Federal district court on the basis of a secondary boycott. I understand the injunction was not formally docketed until July 15, but the news was received on the picket line on Independence Day 1948. This application of the penalties of the Taft-Hartley Act against agricultural workers without granting to them any of its alleged benefits, justifies its immediate repeal.

MAN TO MAN

(By Harold L. Ickes)

[From the New York Post, New York, N. Y., Monday, March 7, 1949]

As Members of the Fair Deal Congress have been doing figure skating on that patch of thin ice known as the Taft-Hartley Act, I have been expecting every day to see some soul, hardier than the rest, do an exhibit labeled "Di Giorgio." A long-drawn-out strike of farm workers against a corporation operating a fruit ranch covering 14 square miles in Kern County, Calif., throws an extraordinary light on how the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law can be used to protect and maintain a system of industrial feudalism.

Several times I have called attention to this struggle of farm workers to better their condition, and twice have had held over me a threat of legal action. The notorious Associated Farmers of California, with which the Di Giorgio Corp. is affiliated, has even gone so far as to reprint one of my columns in full (despite the fact that it was copyrighted) in an expensive brochure which, by one less tolerant than I, might have been regarded as an attempted smear. As for my involuntary contribution to it, I heartily recommend it as concise statement of the essential facts back of the Di Giorgio strike.

The walk-out occurred on October 1, 1947, when company officials turned down the workers' request for a hearing of their grievances. They had organized in the preceding spring, and had been chartered as a local of the National Farm Labor Union, an affiliate of the American Federation of Labor.

Mediation efforts of the Kern County Central Labor Council having failed, a direct appeal was made to Joseph Di Giorgio, head of the farm corporation. Mr. Di Giorgio had won respect by his amicable dealings with other A. F. of L. unions, and an open-minded hearing by him had been confidently anticipated. But no reply came, and 1,100 of the 1,345 Di Giorgio farmers stopped work. Picket lines were set up around the ranch, and the longest strike of farm workers in American labor history was under way.

At first the company tried to smother the strike with imported labor. The union has charged in hearings before the United States Senate that it even went to the extreme of hiring, in defiance of law, Mexican nationals smuggled across the border in the dead of night. Strong-arm methods failed to choke off a flow of supplies contributed to the strikers. The more bitter the company attack, the more solid became the support of the A. F. of L., whose president, William Green, made personal appeals on behalf of the strikers.

An attempt to smear the striking union as Communist-led was exploded in hearings by State authorities, and the union was given a clean bill of health. During this phase some gunman, whose identity is still unknown, shot through a window in an attempt to murder the president of the striking union, and very nearly did so.

The events leading up to the farm corporation's resort to the use (or misuse, according to the point of view) of the Taft-Hartley law, were summarized in a statement recently made to the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare by President H. L. Mitchell, of the National Farm Labor Union:

"Between raids by the Immigration Service," he said, "which apprehended aliens on the ranch, the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp. managed to produce a crop with scab labor, and began shipping it to market. Union pickets followed the trucks and rode tanks of wine to their destinations, and there appealed to other A. F. of L. union members to refuse to handle the products."

It was at this point, its own efforts to crush the strike having failed, that the Di Giorgio Corp. fell back on the Taft-Hartley Act. Charging a secondary boycott, it appealed to the National Labor Relations Board for an injunction. Its lawyers argued that although farm workers are denied any benefits under the law, its penalties apply to them. Ironically, from the workers' viewpoint, it was on Independence Day of last year that the striking farmers were notified that the Federal court in Fresno, Calif., had issued an injunction forbidding them to secure the help of other union men and women through the refusal of the latter to handle Di Giorgio products.

Since then, the story has been chiefly one of litigation. Meantime, the strike goes on, with the farm worker seemingly at the short end of a grotesquely un-American doctrine "made in California," that while he is subject to the restrictive provisions of a law, he is ineligible when it comes to those which would protect him. At this distance, so far as the striker is concerned, it looks like a case of "Heads you win, tails I lose." A shell game by comparison would seem altruistic.

In view of the great respect for the law so far evidenced by the Associated Farmers of California, I hereby waive the protection of my copyright, and would be glad to have that group of liberty-loving Americans reprint this column in another brochure.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Daggett, of the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers.

Mr. WIER Mr. Chairman, how about making a recommendation that the Labor Subcommittee recommend that this picture be shown on the floor of the Congress just previous to the vote on the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. KELLEY. You do the recommending and see how far you get.

Mr. Daggett, are you going to read your statement or just summarize it? Would you prefer to summarize it a bit and leave it for the record?

TESTIMONY OF R. E. DAGGETT, DIRECTOR, MIDDLE ATLANTIC STATES REGION, INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF PAPER MAKERS, A. F. OF L., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Mr. DAGGETT. Gentlemen of the committee, my statement deals principally with one situation in which the manufacturers testified here last week, giving their side of the situation. I felt it was essential that we have a statement on the record. Now, due to the fact that the company did testify here last week, there might be some questions you would have to ask. And whether I could summarize it any more quickly than I can read it or not, I would not be sure. It is not a long statement.

Mr. KELLEY. I would appreciate it if you would just read the high points of it, Mr. Daggett.

Mr. DAGGETT. To begin with, as you may or may not know, the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers is a comparatively small union, but it is one of the oldest ones, and like the typographical union, a very democratic one. Everything is handled by the referendum vote, both in the writing of their bylaws, their constitution, and any changes in it, and the election of international officers.

It has been a rather conservative organization. It has rarely made the headlines until recently when the National Planning Association picked this organization and the paper industry of the west coast as their first case study in their series Causes of Industrial Peace. You have probably seen or heard of that.

Now, we had not planned an appearance before the committee until we learned of the testimony of the Paterson Parchment Paper Co., as submitted by Mr. Walter Richter, their personnel director, here last week.

As I said before, we then felt it was essential that we bring the facts concerning the strike at the Paterson Parchment Paper Co. to your attention, and correct some of the erroneous statements made by Mr. Richter, and also to show the committee how a company motivated by a desire to destroy a union, may operate, and also to express to you this organization's position on proposed labor legislation.

In 1945, we were certified by the National Labor Relations Board as the bargaining agent for all of the maintenance and production employees at the Paterson Parchment Paper Co. We negotiated a 1-year union-shop contract, and in each of the succeeding years, 1946 and 1947, due notice was given and a new contract negotiated.

Then, in 1948, we gave a 60-day notice as required by the contract and by the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. Mr. Richter in his testimony told you gentlemen that no notice was given. I have included here in my statement a copy of the notice which was given. I will not bother to read it, as long as you are in a hurry. But the notice is there. That notice is our customary notice that we have been using for a number of years, and has been ruled by the National Labor Relations Board as constituting due and sufficient notice of termination.

Following that, you will find the company's reply to that notice, signed by John R. Dufford, assistant general manager of the company.

We started negotiations on that new contract on or about June 15. Those negotiations continued for over 2 months. The expiration date of the contract was August 15. We continued negotiating until the 20th of August, at which time the strike became effective.

Now, Mr. Richter in his testimony had much to say about a secret ballot. The constitution of our organization requires a two-thirds vote on the question of a strike. In this instance, it was obvious to the international officers that the company was not bargaining in good faith, that they were trying to provoke a strike. And the international representatives, due to that and the fact that the company was temporarily on short-time operation, advised against a strike. But in spite of that advice, the vote was taken by secret ballot and was carried by a vote of, I believe it was, 197 to 95. It is in here somewhere. Anyway, it was over the two-thirds point, in spite of our advice against the strike at the time.

Then the company had been warned beforehand. They knew that. But before the final break came, they were sure enough that they were going to have a strike, so that they had covered their machines and prepared for it in the plant. We cooperated in every way possible. We assigned firemen, engineers, filter-house operators, maintenance men, watchmen, in order properly to protect the plant and to keep the pumps operating for fire protection, and to furnish electricity to the office and to a few comany houses which they had.

After the strike became effective, the company made no effort to negotiate to try to reach a settlement. We met on only two occasions at a meeting called by a United States conciliator. The company showed no good faith in the way of bargaining. They consistently refused our offers to arbitrate the wage question and the recommendation of the conciliator to take it to arbitration.

It would have cost the company, to have given them the difference in the wage increase between what they had offered and the 11 cents which we were asking—and 11 cents was the pattern in the paper industry last year—it would have cost them approximately $45,000 for the year covered by the contract which we were negotiating. However, they spent, according to their figures in fixed costs, $336,500 fighting it. They used every means to try to break the strike and the union. These means included letters to the employees and newspaper advertisements which distorted the facts.

There was heckling of the pickets by company supervisors and officers. The company hired an outside agency to circularize the employees, and there was submission of ballots by this agency in an attempt to get them to return to work. The company started an injunction action in equity court, and the damage suit in the Federal court in the amount of $336,500. Even strikebreakers were brought in.

Regardless of the fact that no violence had occurred and there had been no threats or intimidation, and even though the union had cooperated to the extent of furnishing the employees that I enumerated previously, the company used all of these techniques.

It is very important to note that in the opinion of the union the company used and is still attempting to use its legal suits and maneuvers in order to undermine the union. In our opinion, the appearance by the company representatives before your body was for the purpose of trying to strengthen and protect its suit for damages now pending in the United States District Court for the District of Eastern Pennsylvania. As I have stated, the lengthy negotiations and all of the other facts clearly show that the company knew that the union intended to strike after the expiration date of the contract if there was no new contract reached by that time. This is not a case where a union strikes in the middle of a contract.

With regard to that portion of section 15 in the agreement which states—

> However, should there be a delay in negotiating the new agreement, this agreement shall remain in full effect until such time as a new agreement is completed—it should be noted that there was no delay in the negotiations. The negotiations proceeded for over 2 months and even went beyond August 15, 1948. Accordingly, this provision does not apply. It was intended to cover a situation where the parties would be unable to meet before August 15, 1948, or would be unable to meet on a sufficient number of occasions to determine whether any agreement was possible. In our case, there were sufficient meetings before August 15, 1948, to clearly indicate that an impasse had been reached. Under the Taft-Hartley Act the union shop could not automatically be renewed and furthermore could not continue beyond August 15, 1948. Since the union shop is a very material part of the agreement, it is obvious that the agreement could not have automatically renewed itself in full. Furthermore, since the company kept negotiating throughout June, July, and August, it must have felt that the contract did not automatically renew itself because if it had, there would have been no basis for negotiations at all.

Since the settlement of the strike, the company has consistently refused to write or sign a new contract covering the provisions of the settlement. We are, therefore, in effect working with only a verbal agreement. This is obviously for the purpose of bolstering their suit for damages. It is significant to note that the company did not start its suit in the Federal court until on or about October 26, 1948. This was approximately 2 months after the strike began. The company knew that it had no basis for its action and thus delayed using the courts until it was to the company's advantage to make its final push in its effort to break the strike.

Since the date that the company brought its suit in the Federal court, the National Labor Relations Board in the case of "In the matter of Paterson Parchment Paper Co., Employer, and International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America, A. F. of L., petitioner, Case No. 4–RC–199" held that the contention that the contract with this union was a bar to an election was without merit because timely notice by the intervenor (this union) was given on June 1, 1948, effectively forestalled automatic renewal of the contract. Here is a decision of the National Labor Relations Board involving the same plant and the same contract which holds that the notice given by this union was timely.

This union is of the opinion that the suit for damage is punitive and constitutes an attempt to use section 301 of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 as a club to disrupt good labor relations. Certainly this committee does not desire to be used by this company, or any company, as a means to strengthen a pending court case which, in the obvious opinion of the company, is weak and will not hold up under the true facts.

From the foregoing, it can easily be seen how a company or a group of companies, so disposed, can by use of the injunction, trumped up charges and damage suits, destroy a union. It is conceivable that two or three such damage suits as that filed by the Paterson Parchment Paper Co., if successful, could financially break this international union. Therefore, gentlemen, you can readily understand why the position of this organization is definitely and unequivocably for repeal of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947.

Operating under this law, we believe that comparatively few companies, especially in a time of depression or unemployment, could destroy trade-unionism in this country, and should that be true, we believe that the door would be opened to foreign ideology and that our way of life and the free enterprise system would be seriously threatened.

Mr. KELLEY. Are there any questions, Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. I do not have any questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. As I recall, Mr. Richter told me, in answer to questions, that all this litigation had been dismissed. I remember questioning him. I know he said the Labor Board case was dismissed. I cannot find his statement here.

Mr. DAGGETT. I remember in reading the testimony you did question him on that. We agreed to dismiss the charges which we had pending before the Labor Board. However, the company refused absolutely to withdraw either their case in equity court or the case in Federal court. In the case in equity court, a preliminary order had been issued, but a final order had not, and later, after the settlement, that was dropped.

Mr. JACOBS. Just one final question. This language that you quote here on page 8 of your statement—as I recall, it is on page 8—from the Labor Board; is that substantially the language that the Labor Board used—that the contract had been terminated?

Mr. DAGGETT. I believe so. I think I have that order here.

Mr. JACOBS. That is, that it was not a bar to an election because of the timely notice?

Mr. DAGGETT. Yes. It says:

> This contention is without merit because timely notice given by the intervenor on June 1, 1948, of its desire to modify the contract effectively forestalled automatic renewal of that contract.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. What was the amount of the suit that they brought against you, and for what?

Mr. DAGGETT. They claimed that we did not give them notice of termination. Of course, their lawyer is basing that merely upon the wording of the notice given. The notice is the customary notice that we use and has never previously been questioned. So although we had negotiated for over 2 months, and although the company had presented a new contract in its entirety as a counter proposal to the contract which we had introduced, now they claim that the contract was automaticaly renewable, and therefore they are basing their suit on that in the amount of $336,500.

Mr. WIER. That is all.

Mr. JACOBS. Thank you, Mr. Daggett.

Mr. DAGGETT. Thank you, gentlemen, for the privilege of appearing.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you for furnishing us this valuable information. We appreciate your coming here.

(The prepared statement of Mr. Daggett is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF R. E. DAGGETT, DIRECTOR, MIDDLE ATLANTIC STATES REGION, INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF PAPER MAKERS, AFL, PHILADELPHIA, PA.

The International Brotherhood of Paper Makers is a comparatively small union, but one of the oldest. It was founded over 60 years ago and affiliated with the A. F. of L. since the early nineteen hundreds. It has been a rather conservative organization, rarely making the headlines until recently, when the National Planning Association picked this union and the paper industry for the west coast as its first case study in its series Causes of Industrial Peace.

We had not planned an appearance before this committee until after we learned of the testimony of the Paterson Parchment Paper Co., as submitted by Walter Richter, the company's personnel director. We then felt that it was essential that we bring the facts concerning the strike at Paterson Parchment Paper Co. to your attention and correct some of the erroneous statements made by Mr. Richter—to show the committee how a company, motivated by a desire to destroy a union, may operate under the present law. Also to express to you this organization's position on proposed labor legislation.

As related in the Paterson Parchment Paper Co.'s testimony, the National Labor Relations Board in 1945 certified this organization and our Bristol Local, No. 500, as the bargaining agent for all production and maintenance employees at the company's Britsol plant.

Following certification, a 1-year union-shop contract was negotiated between the company and the union. In the succeeding years of 1946 and 1947, due notice (in those years, 30 days' notice) of termination was given by the union, and each year a new contract was negotiated to succeed the expiring one. In 1948, notwithstanding Mr. Richter's testimony to the contrary, the following 60 days' notice as required by the contract and the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 was served on the company:

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF PAPER MAKERS,
Philadelphia 7, Pa., June 1, 1948.

Mr. KING EVANS,
Personnel Manager, Paterson Parchment Paper Co., Bristol, Pa.

DEAR MR. EVANS: This letter is to serve as notification in compliance to the 60 days' notice stipulation in our contract that Bristol Local, No. 500, desires a meeting with the company for the purpose of discussing changes in the contract for the coming year.

Will you kindly let me know as soon as possible the date and the place most convenient for you to meet with the union committee and a representative of the union so that this contract can be concluded by the expiration date?

With best wishes, I am,

Very truly yours,

R. E. DAGGETT,
Regional Director, International Brotherhood of Paper Makers.

You will remember that in the company's testimony, they denied that any notice of termination was given.

Under date of June 7, 1948, the company replied to this notice, as follows:

PATERSON PARCHMENT PAPER CO.,
Bristol, Pa., June 7, 1948.

MR. R. E. DAGGETT,
Regional Director,
International Brotherhood of Paper Makers,
930 City Centre Bldg., Philadelphia 7, Pa.

DEAR MR. DAGGETT: We have your letter of June 1 addressed to Mr. King Evans requesting a meeting with the company for the purpose of discussing changes in the contract for the coming year.

The company will be very glad to meet with you at 10:30 a. m. on June 15, this being the earliest possible date that we can all get together, and I hope this will meet with your approval. If not, please suggest to us another date not earlier than the fifteenth.

Kindest regards.

Very truly yours,

PATERSON PARCHMENT PAPER CO.,
JOHN R. DUFFORD,
Assistant General Manager.

Within 30 days after the June 1 notice—specifically, on June 30, 1948—we notified the Federal and State Conciliation and Mediation Services, as required by the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, that no agreement had been reached.

The notice sent by this union and the reply thereto by the company was in accordance with the practice that had prevailed for the years previous to August 1948. In all those years, the parties negotiated a new entire contract which was typed and signed. Although some of the provisions may have been unchanged from year to year, it was definitely understood that a new contract was being negotiated to succeed the expiring contract.

Negotiations for a new contract with the company were started at the middle of June 1948, and continued thereafter until August 20, 1948. There were seven conferences and during these conferences the company presented a proposed entire agreement as its counterproposal to an entire new agreement presented by the union. At no time during the lengthy negotiations did the company state that the contract had automatically renewed itself and at no time during the negotiations did the company declare that the union would have no right to strike at the expiration date of the contract.

Although the pattern of wage increases in the paper industry last year was 11 cents per hour and although the company's profits for 1947 were the greatest in their history, they consistently maintained up to August 12, 1948, that they could give no wage increase whatsoever. Finally on that date the company offered a 2½-cent increase, stating that that was their final offer.

This offer was taken to a meeting of the local's membership and was rejected. A strike vote was taken. The company was notified of this action and at a meeting with the company on August 20, the company increased their offer to 5 cents per hour. Another meeting of the local was called on August 20, and this offer was submitted to the membership. The offer was rejected and a strike vote was taken by secret ballot.

The constitution of the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers requires a two-thirds vote on the question of a strike. The representatives of the international union advised the membership against striking, inasmuch as it appeared obvious to them that the company was deliberately trying to provoke a strike and further, they, the representatives, did not believe a strike was timely due to temporary short-time operations by the company.

In spite of this advice by the international representatives the strike vote was carried by a vote of 197 to 95.

The company knew of this action. They knew that the vote was by secret ballot, and in spite of the advice of the international representatives, and yet they testified here that they believed "the strike was called and promoted by a very small group, most of whom were on the negotiating committee, and the strike was not the majority of the employees."

The strike became effective on the evening of August 20, 1948. From that date on, the company made absolutely no attempt to negotiate with the union, meeting only at two meetings called by a United States conciliator. They consistently refused our offer and the recommendation of the conciliator to submit the wage question to arbitration. They resorted to every possible means to break the strike and the union. These means included letters to the employees and newspaper advertisements which distorted the facts. There was heckling of pickets by company supervisors and officers; the company hired an outside agency to circularize the employees and there was a submission of ballots by this agency in an attempt to get them to return to work. The company started an injunction action in equity court and a damage suit in Federal court in the amount of $336,500. Even strikebreakers were brought in.

Regardless of the fact that no violence had occurred and there had been no threats or intimidation and even though the union had cooperated to the extent of assigning employees to work in the powerhouse, filter house, maintenance department, and watchmen in order to properly protect the company's property and supply steam to operate the pumps and furnish electricity, the company used all of the above tactics.

It is very important to note that in the opinion of the union the company used and is still attempting to use its legal suits and maneuvers in order to undermine the union. In our opinion, the appearance by the company representative before your body was for the purpose of trying to strengthen and protect its suit for damages now pending in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. As I have stated, the lengthy negotiations and all of the other facts clearly show that the company knew that the union intended to strike after the expiration date of the contract if there were no new contract reached by that time. This is not a case where a union strikes in the middle of the contract.

With regard to that portion of section 15 of the agreement which states, "However, should there be a delay in negotiating the new agreement, this agreement shall remain in full effect until such time as a new agreement is completed," it should be noted that there was no delay in the negotiations. The negotiations proceeded for over 2 months and even went beyond August 15, 1948. Accordingly, this provision does not apply. It was intended to cover a situation where the parties would be unable to meet before August 15, 1948, or would be unable to meet on a sufficient number of occasions to determine whether any agreement was possible. In our case, there were sufficient meetings before August 15, 1948, to indicate clearly that an impasse had been reached. Under the Taft-Hartley Act the union shop could not automatically be renewed and furthermore could not continue beyond August 15, 1948. Since the union shop is a very material part of the agreement, it is obvious that the agreement could not have renewed itself in full automatically. Furthermore, since the company kept negotiating throughout June, July, and August, it must have felt that the contract did not automatically renew itself, because if it had, there would have been no basis for negotiations at all.

Since the settlement of the strike, the company has consistently refused to write or sign a new contract covering the provisions of the settlement. We are therefore, in effect, working with only a verbal agreement. This is obviously for the purpose of bolstering their suit for damages.

It is significant to note that the company did not start its suit in the Federal court until on or about October 26, 1948. This was approximately 2 months after the strike began. The company knew that it had no basis for its action and thus delayed using the courts until it was to the company's advantage to make its final push in its effort to break the strike.

Since the date that the company brought its suit in the Federal court, the National Labor Relations Board in the case of In the matter of Paterson Parchment Paper Company, Employer, and International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America, A. F. of L., Petitioner (case No. 4–RC–199) held that the contention that the contract with this union was a bar to an election was without merit because timely notice by the intervenor (this union) which was given on June 1, 1948, effectively forestalled automatic renewal of the contract. Here is a decision of the National Labor Relations Board involving the same plant and the same contract which holds that the notice given by this union was timely.

This union is of the opinion that the suit for damages is punitive and constitutes an attempt to use section 301 of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 as a club to disrupt good labor relations. Certainly this committee does not desire to be used by this company, or any company, as a means to strengthen a pending court case which, in the obvious opinion of the company, is weak and will not hold up under the true facts.

From the foregoing, it can easily be seen how a company or a group of companies, so disposed, can by use of the injunction, trumped-up charges, and damage suits destroy a union. It is conceivable that two or three such damage suits as that filed by the Paterson Parchment Paper Co., if successful, could financially break this international union. Therefore, gentlemen, you can readily understand why the position of this organization is definitely and unequivocably for repeal of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947.

Operating under this law, we believe that a comparatively few companies, especially in a time of depression or unemployment, could destroy trade-unionism in this country and should that be done, we believe that the door would be open to foreign ideology and that our way of life and the free-enterprise system would be seriously threatened.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Theodore Brown, of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, AFL.

Mr. Brown, before you proceed, without objection, I wish to insert in the record the statement from Mr. Pokras, from the newsboys' division, International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America. Mr. Pokras was here and said that the Taft-Hartley Act had destroyed their union completely.

(The statement referred to is as follows:)[1]

STATEMENT OF HYMIE POKRAS ON BEHALF OF THE NEWSBOYS' DIVISION, INTERNATIONAL PRINTING PRESSMEN'S UNION

My name is Hymie Pokras, and I am a representative of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America, in charge of its newsboys' division, and have occupied this position for the past 8 years. Prior to this, I was a news vendor, operating a stand in the city of Philadelphia, Pa. In my present position it is my duty to assist various local unions consisting of newsboys and newscarriers affiliated with the international union, in matters pertaining to their union, employment, and collective-bargaining contracts. I am familiar with the development of these local unions, and was personally responsible for the establishment of local union No. 473 (Newsboys', Philadelphia), local union No. 504 (Newscarriers', Philadelphia), and local No. 471, the New York Newsboys' Union.

The international union has for many years organized groups of newsboys and newscarriers, recognizing the economic importance of this group of the industry and the inescapable fact that the distribution in the newspaper industry is equally as important to the industry as other divisions.

Many of such local unions were formed prior to the passage of the original National Labor Relations Act, and with the advent of the act, much stimulus was given to the organizational movement in the newsboys, news vendors, and newscarriers' field of employment. This movement encountered much resistance from the daily newspapers of America, who found it to their advantage to term those persons distributing or offering for sale their newspapers "independent contractors," or "merchants." Their motive, of course, was to prevent this grouping from securing the protection of the National Labor Relations Act. Reliance was placed upon antiquated common-law tests of the master-servant relationship, which tests, if applied, would have operated as a bar to the purpose and intention of the Federal legislation, which was to extend the processes of collective bargaining as widely as possible for the purpose of minimizing labor disputes which burdened or tended to burden interstate commerce, and to that end to assist in establishing stable industrial relations. Inevitably, this issue was thoroughly litigated, and was passed upon by the United States Supreme Court in Hearst Consolidated Publications v. National Labor Relations Board (322 U. S. 111), which held that common-law tests were irrelevent to the determination of the relationship, and that the relationship should be determined by underlying economic facts, considered in the light of the policies and purposes of the Federal legislation. Accordingly, the Court held newsboys of the character represented by the international pressmen's union to be employees for the purposes of the National Labor Relations Act.

[1] See also Mr. Pokras' supplemental statement on p. 1643.

This represented the law until the Taft amendments contained in the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947. Among these amendments was one attempting to define the term "employees" to exclude individuals having the status of "independent contractors." Its legislative history reflects an intention on the part of Congress to specifically remove from the coverage of the statute newsboys and newscarriers, and to overrule the Hearst cases, which were mentioned by name.

It is, of course, true that the language of the amendment taken literally, which denies coverage to "individuals having the status of independent contractors" would not have changed the rule at all. The National Labor Relations Board itself had frequently determined that the attributes of certain groups required that they be held independent contractors, and accordingly denied the protection of the act: Matter of Philadelphia Record Company (69 N.L.R.B. 1232). It has been the express intention of Congress to override the Hearst doctrine, which has created the industrial unrest necessitating remedial legislation. Under the Hearst cases many local unions of newsboys and newspaper publishers entered into wide collective-bargaining agreements, which contracts assured industrial stability. In accord with the purposes of the act, contracts were entered into prior to the Taft-Hartley Act in Philadelphia, St. Louis, San Francisco, Cincinnati, and in other cities. Since the amendments to the act, which I have described, the publishers have again reverted to their original view that they are under no duty to deal or bargain with duly selected representatives of the newsboys or newscarriers.

An outstanding example of the unrest and injustice occasioned by the Taft amendment is found in the case of the St. Louis newspapers. In that case the St. Louis Newscarriers' Union, affiliated with the international union I represent, was certified by the Board as the exclusive representative for the purpose of collective bargaining for the newscarriers of St. Louis who, of course, were held to be employees within the meaning of the act, Pulitzer Publishing Company (62 N. L. R. B. 229). Thereafter negotiations ensued for and resulted in a collective-bargaining contract, which was periodically extended or renewed until its last expiration date, which was subsequent to the effective date of the amended definition of the term "employee," inserted in the act in 1947. In lieu of negotiating, the publishers of St. Louis claimed that they were relieved of this obligation, and failed and refused to deal or bargain with the St. Louis carriers, basing their refusal upon the amended definition of the term "employee," and claiming that the prior certification of the Board was vitiated by such amendment. As a consequence, considerable unrest has resulted, where before industrial peace prevailed. The situation in St. Louis is still in a state of suspense, but the important point is that in lieu of preserving industrial peace, the amended term "employee" has resulted in discord to such an extent that the union there, absent the protection of the act, has only its economic pressure which it can bring to bear to secure the representation rights it has heretofore enjoyed and undoubtedly believes it should continue to enjoy. This is but one example.

In the city of Philadelphia the Philadelphia Bulletin (daily and Sunday newspaper), after the Hearst decision, entered into a collective-bargaining contract with the Philadelphia Newsboys' Union there. The contracts were renewed as they expired, and relations were maintained without any sort of industrial strife or threat of strife until the Taft amendments. Thereafter the Philadelphia publishers assumed the position that they had no longer an obligation to deal with the union involved as the representative for collective-bargaining purposes of its newsboys, and accordingly refused to negotiate for a new contract to succeed the one just expired. This situation has resulted in discord, occasioned by the fact that this newspaper itself imposed unilateral terms and conditions of employment, and will not deal with the union on any matters pertaining to the conditions under which its members must work.

A still further example is found in Cincinnati, Ohio, where the newspaper there refused to bargain with the newsboys' union for a contract, although concededly such union represents a majority of the newsboys, and is entitled to be recognized and bargained with. Similarly, this refusal to bargain is likewise based on the amended definition of the term "employee." The result is the same there.

What I have said merely demonstrates the fact that this amendment has created discord, where prior thereto harmony prevailed, which result is in the teeth of the purposes of the act. It does not take into account the injustice worked upon thousands of newsboys all over the country; the resentment among these workers, occasioned by unilaterally imposed terms and conditions of employment where heretofore collective bargaining has prevailed. It does not take into account the injustice occasioned by the denial of this large segment of the industry of the right to have a voice in matters affecting their economic welfare. It does not reveal the possibilities of exploitation presented to the publishers when they are placed in the position of being able to drive the best bargain they can with the individual newsboys, where heretofore collective bargaining was required. This denial of the equality of bargaining power is similarly inconsistent with the basic purpose of the statute.

We respectively urge that the term "employee" be redefined to the end that it may be sufficient in scope to restore to this underprivileged and deserving group, representation rights under the statute, which they have heretofore enjoyed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Brown, you may proceed.

STATEMENT OF A. PHILIP RANDOLPH, INTERNATIONAL PRESIDENT OF THE BROTHERHOOD OF SLEEPING CAR PORTERS, PRESENTED BY THEODORE E. BROWN, RESEARCH DIRECTOR

Mr. BROWN. The International Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters strongly urges that the Eighty-first Congress take immediate action to repeal the Labor-Management Act of 1947, generally known as the Taft-Hartley law. We sincerely believe that sound labor-management relations can best be served by reenacting the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, with subsequent amendments deemed necessary in the light of past labor management relations and for the best interest of the national welfare.

Real independent and strong unions are vital to the developing of a democratic society. Too long have some proclaimed to the world the great and enduring democratic institutions in these United States without seriously analyzing the industrial role of the masses of American citizens who daily toil for an economic existence. Until such time as we have attained full and inseparable industrial and political rights for the workers in the United States without regard to race, religion, color, national origin, or ancestry, our pronouncements about democracy are illusions and our fight against totalitarian communism and fascism is a bigoted farce.

I urge that this present Congress take immediate steps to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act, since it has failed to promote the general welfare; it has failed to bring stability and industrial peace into labor-management relations.

The Taft-Hartley Act has sought to justify its existence on such charges as labor monopoly, widespread and disruptive strikes, jurisdictional disputes, and secondary boycotts, the closed shop, democracy in trade unions, political expenditures by unions, featherbedding, non-Communist affidavit, and health and welfare funds.

Although these are subjects of serious import the Taft-Hartley Act has not met the issues, in failing to restore equality between labor and management and permitting free collective bargaining. It has failed to contribute to the stability in labor-management relations so essential to the development of sound collective bargaining. The act has not increased democracy in trade unions. It does not provide a basic policy for a sound democratic and constructive Federal policy for the promotion of the national public welfare.

The Taft-Hartley law has failed, as did the Wagner Act, to protect American citizens of minority status from discrimination because of race, color, religion, nationality, and ancestry, resulting from collective bargaining provision.

I do not argue that the public interest should not be recognized and receive prior consideration in settling disputes involving national health and safety, but I do contend that American labor is a part of the public and should therefore receive equal consideration with management in determination of mutually related problems.

Whereas the Wagner Act prohibited discriminatory discharges, espionages, threats, and other forms of employer interference, the law has impaired their effectiveness by technicalities and the development of "splinter groups" in unions.

The right to withhold or condition one's services as a worker is of equal validity as the right of a manufacturer to withhold or condition the sale of his product. This is basic if collective bargaining is to be meaningful. Unions must be free to decide when disagreement is more expensive than concession.

With the power of the big employers the need by unions for greater union security as expressed by the closed and union shop has increased. Effective union security is the life line of responsible trade unions, if such unions are to reach a parity with industrial management in its ever increasing tendency toward greater monopoly power.

However, I earnestly believe that strong and effective unions which receive their power by virtue of the closed shop have a grave responsibility. No longer should the Congress ignore the tendency of some unions to use the closed shop as a means of discriminating against American workers because of their race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry. Both the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley Act failed to guarantee against minority discrimination along these lines. I urge this Congress to pass legislation which will legalize and encourage union security developed and processed in a manner that will not exclude any American citizen of minority status because of his race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry.

I also urge that the provision of the act and the services of the Board, established or continued as a result of the act, be denied to any union and/or company which discriminates against a worker or an applicant for employment because of race, color, religion, national origin and/or ancestry.

The fact that American workers do regard the Taft-Hartley law as a slave act completely nullifies it as an effective instrument for industrial peace. An atmosphere saturated with suspicion and mistrust on the part of the American worker is only conducive to further industrial strife.

Finally, the Tart-Hartley Act should be repealed because:

(1) Evidence is lacking that it has decreased the number of strikes.

(2) It has seriously impaired the collective-bargaining strength of labor.

(3) It has reduced the effectiveness of union security and resulted in greater tension between management and labor.

Reenacting the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 with amendments along the lines herein expressed, by the Congress, would be a start toward sound labor-management relations. The Congress has a mandate from the people by virtue of the results of the last election; it has a challenge from the times by virtue of the efforts of this Nation to lead the world in realizing a dynamic industrial democracy—a necessary foundation of our political democracy.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Irving, do you have any questions?

Mr. IRVING. I do not have any questions, Mr. Bailey.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Just one question.

Mr. Brown, I observe that you mention on page 1 of your statement the fact that democracy in trade unions is used as one of the excuses for a passage of such laws as the Taft-Hartley law. I think you are correct.

Do you think that possibly the requirement of democracy in labor unions might do away with some of the ammunition that the Taft-Hartley advocates would have?

Mr. BROWN. Specifically what are you referring to?

Mr. JACOBS. I am referring specifically to those instances where unions have been denied the right to elect their own officers, for example, do you not think if the law provided they had the right to elect their own officers, and those abuses were legislated, that that might do away with some of the demands to pass the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. BROWN. I do not advocate, Congressman, that the Congress pass it, or that there is a need for the Congress to step in and attempt to legislate it.

Mr. JACOBS. I am talking about simple law that says there must be elections according to the constitution and laws of the union.

Mr. BROWN. We are not advocating that.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think that might clean up some of the situations that the Taft-Hartley advocates point to as an excuse?

Mr. BROWN. I do not think so.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. I just want to ask one question. In your organization I presume you represent the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Conductors?

Mr. BROWN. Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters.

Mr. WIER. You are covered by the Railway Act?

Mr. BROWN. We are covered by the Railway Act: that is right.

Mr. WIER. You are enjoying a little freedom there?

Mr. BROWN. Were are not enjoying too much.

Mr. WIER. We would like to have what you got back.

That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. I have no questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you for your appearance. You read your entire statement into the record, did you?

Mr. WIER. Yes: he read it completely.

Mr. BROWN. Yes. Thank you.

Mr. BAILEY. Apparently that concludes the appearances for the day.

The subcommittee will stand recessed until 10 o'clock on Friday next.

(Whereupon, at 6: 30 p. m. the subcommittee adjourned until Friday, March 18, 1949, at 10 a. m.)

APPENDIX

STATEMENT AND TESTIMONY OF WOODRUFF RANDOLPH, PRESIDENT, INTERNATIONAL TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION, BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE ON THE PROPOSED NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949, FEBRUARY 10, 1949

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Randolph, for the record, will you state your name, your position, address, and so on, and anything else you want to have appear about you?

Mr. RANDOLPH. My name is Woodruff Randolph. I am president of the International Typographical Union, residing in Indianapolis, Ind.

Chairman Thomas and Senators, I will read a short summary of the written statement that has been presented.

The written statement which we have submitted to your committee consists of three documents. The first is a statement of the views of the International Typographical Union on S. 249 as amended by the chairman. The second is a booklet entitled "Taft-Hartley and the I. T. U." which sets forth briefly the agonizing experience of the I. T. U. under the Taft-Hartley Act. And the third is a summary of a contempt case in which we were involved under the Taft-Hartley Act, stating the background and the implications of that case. I express the hope that the members of the committee may find time to peruse these documents, particularly the second, which demonstrates exactly how the Taft-Hartley Act is a continuing threat to the existence of any craft union.

To summarize these documents is not easy, for each of them is itself a summary of a mass of experience and a body of litigation without parallel in the labor history of the United States, which will, we trust, never be repeated. But, in brief, they demonstrate that since it was founded in 1852 the I. T. U. has consistently adhered to four principles upon which voluntary trade-unionism is necessarily based. These are (1) an insistence upon respect for the rules laid down by our members concerning the conditions upon which they will sell their services, in order that each union member may democratically and directly participate in determining those conditions, (2) the refusal to work with competing nonunion men whose willingness to work at lower wages and under substandard conditions threatens each member of our union, (3) an insistence upon respect for our jurisdiction in order that craft standards may not be undermined by the assignment of work to lower paid and inferior craftsmen, and (4) the refusal to work on struck or substandard goods produced under sweatshop conditions.

We demonstrate that without being guided by these principles, a union cannot live. We show that the Taft-Hartley Act makes impossible the attainment of these objectives and thereby makes free trade-unionism impossible.

Section 8 (b) (3) requiring unions to bargain collectively has been used to attack the very concept of union rules; our duty to enforce those rules has been attacked as "restraint and coercion" under section 8 (b) (1). The legality of over 30 of our internal laws has been challenged. The right of our members not to work with nonunion men has been limited by denying our right to a closed-shop agreement, and the right itself has been questioned and is doubtful.

A form of involuntary servitude, we are told, is set up by which our members can be required to work with nonunion men against their will. Our right to strike to defend ourselves against the assignment of work to nonunion men is denied by section 8 (b) (4) (D). Our members are made slaves by the provisions of section 8 (b) (4) (A) which compel them, under the whip of an injunction, to act as strikebreakers and to process goods made by men working in opposition to us.

In each of these instances—and each is vital to the preservation of our union—our right to strike in self-defense against efforts to destroy us is denied.

The Taft-Hartley Act may be summed up by saying that it denies the right to strike whenever an object of a strike is to preserve the union—and that right is, of course, more fundamental even than the right to strike for better wages or hours.

We demonstrate in our statement that we decided, shortly after the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, to go down fighting, if we had to, rather than submit to slow decay.

We formulated certain policies which, in our judgment, would protect us, within the law, against the worst ravages of that act.

In pursuit of those goals, and in an effort to preserve an organization which has a century of tradition behind it, which has enjoyed amicable relations with the employers in the industry, which has contributed more than any other single factor to stabilize this industry and the conduct of the men and women employed by it, we have suffered the following:

1. We have been compelled to spend over $11,000,000 of members' hard-earned dues in support of strikes and other defense activities to preserve the union against the Taft-Hartley Act.

2. We have been subjected to the issuance of eight complaints, containing substantially identical allegations and relying on the same evidence, by General Counsel Denham of the NLRB.

We have been forced to engage in five long drawn-out NLRB proceedings, covering substantially the entire country, at great expense to ourselves and our members, without having obtained a single decision from the NLRB in the course of 16 months of litigation.

3. We have been forced to submit to a sweeping injunction and to a contempt action under that injunction, brought by NLRB attorneys for the chief purpose of breaking a strike of our members at Chicago, Ill., which has continued since November 24, 1947. The only redeeming feature of our experience under the Taft-Hartley Act has been that, despite the best efforts of a coalition of newspaper publishers, General Counsel Denham, the NLRB, and the Federal courts, that strike has not been broken. Nor will it be ended until we have the employers' assurances that they will concede us the same right to live that we so freely concede to them.

4. Collective bargaining in our industry has been carried on, not with our employers, but with General Counsel Denham and the Federal courts.

We demonstrate that this interference with the processes of collective bargaining has gone so far that we were held in contempt of court for, among other things, failing to include a provision for a neutral "tie-breaker" in a proposed contract clause setting up a joint employer-union committee for the training of apprentices.

We believe that this is the first time in American history where either a union or an employer was held guilty of violating the law for failing to place some language in a proposal made in the course of collective bargaining which the employers were free to reject, and frequently did.

I should emphasize that, during this entire course of litigation, when NLRB attorneys cooperating with employers watched the behavior of every member of the ITU, it has never been alleged that the officers or members of the ITU:

1. Have engaged in violence, fraud, misrepresentation, threats, or any other conduct which could properly be called improper.

2. Have discriminated in employment, or caused employers to discriminate in employment, against any individual. No person has even filed a charge that he has been discriminated against by any action of our organization.

3. Have unjustly or improperly suspended or expelled any member from our organization, or improperly or unjustly refused to admit any person to membership.

4. Have been guilty of any financial impropriety, or have denied any member the democratic rights which he has as a member of our union, or have done other than enforce the union rules, democratically adopted by the members themselves.

As Trial Examiner Leff found in the case brought by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association:

"Respondents (the ITU) urge in justification of their conduct that their motive and intent was to preserve the union and promote its economic interests. I have no doubt that this was true."

But, under Taft-Hartley, "preserving the union and promoting its economic interests" is illegal. It is for that reason that it should be repealed.

Our statement further shows that the injunctive power under Taft-Hartley is far worse than anything that preceded the Norris-LaGuardia Act; that General Counsel Denham, certainly not with the disapproval of the National Labor Relations Board, has administered the Taft-Hartley Act in a biased and hostile manner; that the so-called watchdog committee has been used to interfere with the affairs of the executive branch of the Government; that injunctive actions under Taft-Hartley are speedy, but clarification of the law by the NLRB is delayed for weary months running into years; and that the law is so unjust, confused, and contradictory that amending it is impossible.

This experience, plus our analysis of S. 249 as amended, convince us that the Taft-Hartley law should be immediately replaced by S. 249, with certain reservations noted in our analysis of the measure.

We do not welcome all of the amendments to the Wagner Act which are proposed. We foresee the gravest dangers if, through a process of further amendment, more restrictions are placed on free management-union relations. But, recognizing that there are problems with which S. 249 has attempted to deal, we are prepared to accept it on an experimental basis in the interest of speedy repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. If, in practice, S. 249 as amended operates to interfere unduly with the carrying on of the normal and legitimate business of our organization, we shall of course bring such matters to the attention of the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Randolph, before we start with the questioning, are you a party to any litigation now that is in the courts?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We are under an injunction by the Federal court of the Seventh circuit, and under a citation for contempt for having violated that injunction.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you personally part of that litigation, or is your union?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am personally, and as officer of the union, under those court restrictions.

The CHAIRMAN. I deem it a duty as chairman of this committee to point out that we do not want to, and I do not want to, allow any question that may in any way prejudice that case or that may have influence upon the feeling of the public in regard to it, and I do not want to proceed if in any way our actions here may in any way hurt the case one way or the other, hurt you as an individual one way or another, or hurt your union one way or another.

I realize that this is not a matter of rights, and am not going to get into conflict on any law, but I do know how things in our Government work and function, and I do not want to be unfair to anyone.

I think we ought to have that understanding among ourselves, and with you, in case some question or type of question that you should not answer or you do not wish to answer, please let us know.

We surely do not want to mix up the litigation any worse than it is.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

(The statement submitted by Mr. Randolph in his appearance before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF WOODRUFF RANDOLPH, PRESIDENT OF THE INTERNATIONAL TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION, REGARDING THE THOMAS BILL, S. 249

The International Typographical Union had, by June 22, 1947, attained an enviable position in the trade-union movement. With about 90,000 members in 850 local unions, all of them skilled craftsmen in the printing industry and all experienced trade-unionists, with a tradition of almost a century of democratic and progressive trade-unionism, and with a loyal and active membership, it had kept its place since it took the lead in organizing the American trade-union movement. For that very reason—since its practices represented the best in trade-unionism—it has suffered (under the outrageous provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act) more than any other union. No other union has been compelled to spend over $11,000,000 in protecting its existence since June 22, 1947; no other union has been the target of so many complex, arduous, and expensive legal actions in the course of a year; and we venture the opinion that few other unions could have survived this trying ordeal. For that reason, I have a special interest as president of the ITU in making this statement to your committee. In accord with the rules adopted by the committee, I shall not dwell upon our Taft-Hartley experience and shall limit myself to commenting on the pending proposals, but with the observation that our bitter experience of the past year and a half give a special emphasis to our views.

Certainly the wisest provision in the proposed bill is section 101 of title I which repeals the Taft-Hartley Act. I am confident that the ITU could not have long withstood the united attacks, under that act, of the employers in the industry, the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, the National Labor Relations Board, and the Federal courts for an extended additional period. No craft trade-union could survive indefinitely the pressures which our members have borne since the Taft-Hartley Act became the law, and the continuance of that act on the statute books would spell the doom of the free American trade-union movement. We likewise welcome the restoration of the Wagner Act; for 12 years that act was on the books without harming employers, without undue industrial strife, and without altering our free institutions.

The elimination of any liabilities accrued under the Taft-Hartley Act—as provided in section 105—is a matter of simple justice. Repeal of that act will certainly not be accomplished if actions instituted under it must drag their weary way through the NLRB and the courts for a period of years to come, wasting working man's money and time.

One of the principal changes from the Wagner Act proposed by the bill is the new section 8 (b). Candor compels me to state that I do not relish the principle of introducing into Federal labor legislation unfair labor practices against unions. Our long experience has shown that language in the hands of hostile courts and boards can be twisted into something far different than was intended. When the Wagner Act was being debated, Senator Norris pointed out that "No one thought there was a labor question involved in it (the Sherman Act). * * * But, as it developed, the Sherman antitrust law became a weapon by which labor was almost crushed out of existence because of the construction placed upon the law by the courts. We passed the Clayton antitrust law amendatory to the Sherman antitrust law. * * * The constructions which were put on that law by the courts from time to time practically took away all its force and effect. * * * The courts are going to construe this measure, if it shall become a law, and when we get through we may not know our own child. One man, sitting as a district judge, can nullify, by a stroke of the pen, the acts of the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, even though their action be unanimous." The history of labor legislation in this country, from the Clayton Act through the Norris-LaGuardia Act up to the present measure—excluding, of course, the Taft-Hartley Act—is the history of the effort to free labor from the pressure of hostile and ill-informed judges. I think we can be confident that any slightest opening in our Federal law will be pried wide open by the judiciary. While my own strong preference is that no unfair labor practices against unions be included in this measure, the limited and restricted provisions of this bill could, I believe, be tolerated in the interests of early repeal of the Taft-Hartley law.

But if they are to be included, it should be made crystal clear, in presenting the bill, that injunctive relief is not to be available as a method of enforcement. Unfair labor practices by employers were never enforced through injunctions under the Wagner Act, and it should be stressed in every possible way that there is to be an equality of procedural treatment under the new bill. Under Taft-Hartley, unions alone were the targets of injunctions, except in two cases. In the Boeing case, a district judge refused relief against the employer, and in the General Motors case the company was enjoined from paying out benefits under a pension plan to its employees—hardly the kind of restraint about which the company could be expected to complain bitterly. Taft-Hartley was a one-way injunction street against unions; and unless great caution is exercised a new bill containing unfair labor practices against unions may suffer the same fate. For these reasons we should welcome a clear statement that injunctive relief will not be available in connection with section 8 (b) except that the Norris-LaGuardia Act shall not apply, as now stated in section 401 of title IV, to the enforcement of Board orders. And we feel that this should also be made quite explicit in the committee's report on the bill.

Section 8 (b) (2), which is to be read in conjunction with the proposed new section 9 (d), arouses considerable misgivings. The jurisdiction of a union is the area in which it solicits its membership. That area is determined by underlying economic factors; it is our necessary objective to protect the jobs and the working standards of our members by assuring, so far as we can, that union standards are met on all printing processes or substitutes therefor. We have never resisted the introduction of new processes which were advancements in the art, but we have studiously attempted to see to it that new processes were not made economically advantageous by wage-cutting at the expense of our members. With its long tradition, the ITU cannot be enthusiastic about a law which states that the Government will perform the function for the labor movement of determining which union shall perform particular work tasks. The problem of jurisdictional strikes is not serious—they constitute only a trivial percentage of all strikes—but the right of a union to fight for its jurisdiction is important. If a weak or conniving union were to enter the printing field and seek to extend itself by agreeing to conditions below those which are standard in the trade, our members would rightly insist that we seek to meet that kind of competition by every means at our command. The jurisdictional strike is not merely or solely a question of union membership; it may and does involve basic economic issues in maintaining or extending the standards of a craft.

Happily, we have in the past had few jurisdictional disputes with other unions, for our craft is well-established and our position generally respected. But, if in the future, it becomes necessary for us to maintain the standards of our craft against raiding by another organization which seeks to undermine our standards, we feel that we should retain the elemental right of self-defense. For these reasons, we view with grave concern a grant to the Federal Government of the power to shape the growth of the trade-union movement—and that is the power conferred by these sections. It is a continuing intrusion upon the right of self-help, which is the basic premise of trade-unionism.

Even though we hold such misgivings the provisions of section 9 (d) do provide a guiding procedure for the Board to follow, which is a vast improvement over the devastating provisions of the Taft-Hartley law on the same subject. Because of the urgent need for quick repeal of the Taft-Hartley law so that normal contractual relations between employers and our local unions may be resumed, we will not oppose these provisions of the bill, but accept them on an experimental basis.

The language of this bill seems quite clear in outlawing the secondary boycott only where used in an effort to secure recognition against a Board order or certification of an existing agreement, or in furtherance of a jurisdictional dispute. To go beyond this in dealing with secondary boycotts means the destruction of the trade union movement. The blanket prohibitions of the Taft-Hartley Act had the result that our members were compelled to act as strikebreakers against one another against their will. The theory of the common law was quite clear in allowing either employers or unions to seek allies in an economic dispute by proper means. Under Taft-Hartley unions not only could not seek allies, but were forced to work against their direct interests, while empolyers remained scot-free of any restraints whatsoever in seeking assistance in a war against unions. And while, as I have already indicated, we do not welcome the restraints retained by this bill, we feel we would not be destroyed by them as we could be by the Taft-Hartley provisions.

I offer enthusiastic approval of section 107. We have in recent years come to recognize that the laws applicable to industries engaged in interstate commerce should be uniform, for where competition runs across State lines, industry will inevitably gravitate to that State with the worst laws. Certainly one of the most outrageous provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act was that which encouraged States to adopt the most progressive laws dealing with union security by giving them Federal recognition. This section of the bill effectively eliminates that injustice, while performing a service for the economy of the country as a whole.

It seems clear from an examination of the bill that no sanctions are intended for the obviously desirable objectives stated in sections 204 and 205, dealing with the settlement of disputes arising during the life of an agreement. The ITU has been a pioneer in this field, and our techniques are, we feel, among the best that can be devised. But Government compulsion is another matter; to require that these things be done is to substitute compulsory arbitration for free collective bargaining. We hope that here, as in the case of sanctions for the unfair labor practices against unions, no slightest room for uncertainty concerning the intention of the Congress should remain, and that both the bill and the reports on the bill should make it clear that these sections are not enforceable through any methods other than those set forth in the bill itself. And the same observation is to be made of sections 301 through 303; the unavailability of injunctive relief should be spelled out.

We attest the wisdom of title II of the bill transferring the United States Conciliation Service to the Department of Labor, where it was for many years from its inception, and where we believe it belongs. There was no evidence of its having functioned in a partisan spirit or improperly during all those years and both labor and management respected it and made use of it whenever it suited their purposes. It was truly impartial because of that fact; not because of any law to that effect.

The administration bill does provide that "the Director and the Service shall be impartial." That provision obviously directs their course of conduct as does succeeding language of the section. There is no other definition of impartiality in the law and since our courts with great powers to make decisions need no such injunction, a mere conciliation service having no power can at least bear such an injunction in mind until it learns that in order to be of any service at all both employers and unions will have to be satisfied with the acts and functions of the person seeking to mediate or conciliate.

One great fault of Mr. Ching's testimony is that he "protests too much." Whether he is "impartial" does not depend on testimonials to that effect nor on whether he has been appointed by an impartial Republican or Democrat, if such there be. According to Mr. Ching, impartiality is important but difficult to find, especially in the Department of Labor. The assumption that any other department such as his is more competent to find and trap that illusory quality for appointment to the Conciliation Service seems quite unwarranted. This is more especially true since nearly all the present personnel (now acceptable to employers) was inherited by him from the Labor Department.

Thus Mr. Ching's impartial personnel was also impartial when working under the Department of Labor.

As a practical labor executive I have followed the Biblical advice, "By their works ye shall know them," not by whom they were appointed nor by their titles; neither by their politics nor background.

The emphasis by Mr. Ching on the employer's acceptance or nonacceptance of the personnel of the Service somewhat tarnishes his impartial brilliance. He expressed no worries as to the attitude of the unions. As a matter of fact, acceptance by unions of the personnel of the Service is far more important to the accomplishment of any practical results.

The conciliators are ambassadors of good will and cooperation, ready to help either side on procedural chores and do more than one good turn a day. To magnify their importance does not help them in their work.

As a labor union executive for over 20 years I am glad to say I have never had cause to complain about the Conciliation Service unless its desire to be helpful expressed so often and in so many places could be objected to. As a matter of fact, the well-established collective-bargaining procedures of the ITU hardly left any room for use of the service.

Mr. Ching testifies that employers are less "suspect" of the service since it has not been under the Department of Labor. I testify that so far as our organization is concerned, I am more suspicious than before. The reason is not because of the personnel, but because the personnel was placed under a new head through the Taft-Hartley law. The historic impartial activity was then subject to a different direction by one serving the purposes of what I regard as a labor-destroying law. That is no reflection on Mr. Ching personally.

Mr. Ching stated he wanted no phony statistics from his regional commissioners. I recently received a questionnaire which is being mailed to unions filing 30-day notices under the Taft-Hartley law. That form represents a correspondence method of conducting the service. It is easy to see where the follow-up form requesting information as to the final results attained can be used to show cases settled at a cost of only two postage stamps and the forms.

It would be inappropriate not to praise this bill for what it omits. As compared with the Taft-Hartley Act, it gives collective bargaining a shot in the arm by restoring the freedom to negotiate concerning such matters as union security, the check-off, health and welfare funds, struck and substandard work, union jurisdiction, and all other matters. Even without the clarifications we have suggested its provisions represent a notable improvement in draftsmanship over the vague, confused, and conflicting provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. We have been proud of the fact that access to courts and governmental agencies in our country has not been limited by race or color or political beliefs, and the elimination of the insulting anti-Communist affidavit requirement marks a return to a healthy tradition. The restoration of the full vigor of the Norris-LaGuardia Act—passed by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President—revives another cherished labor freedom.

If Senate bill 249 with amendments in the nature of a substitute as proposed by Senator Thomas becomes law:

1. It will restore the opportunity to bargain for the closed shop which has been essential to the maintenance of the International Typographical Union as a craft union. It is obvious from the experience of the past year and a half that employers have attempted to destroy the union by the use of the Taft-Hartley

Act. The adoption of the Thomas bill will largely halt that destructive effort. A craft or trade is made up of many kinds of tasks, jurisdiction over which is necessary if the trade is to be maintained as such and if a trade or a craft union is to live.

The closed shop in no way limits the democratic freedom of our members. Under our constitution and bylaws they have a complete and untrammeled right to vote on any issues affecting their interests. The ITU is the members' union and it is the members who determine how the union shall operate and what duties its officers shall perform. No member may be expelled or suspended except in accordance with the rules which the members themselves have adopted, and these rules include the right to a fair hearing, an appeal to the executive council of the union, and, finally, an appeal to the convention of the union itself. It is unthinkable that we would not follow the rules we have laid down for our own government, but if we did there would be a further right of appeal to the courts against arbitrary or unfair action.

The closed shop in nowise limits the democratic rights of nonunion printers. By his own choice, the nonunionist denies himself democratic rights, for only by coming into the union does he have a voice in determining the rules which will govern his relations with his employers. So long as he remains nonunion, he is, by his own choice, outside the process by which the rules that govern most workers is made. Any individual who is qualified at the trade may demonstrate his competency and become a member of our union. We are constantly admitting new members and we want all qualified printers in our union.

2. Adoption of the Thomas bill will restore the opportunity for the International Typographical Union to continue to bargain unhampered for the training of apprentices in the trade and maintain unhampered the unimpeachable system of apprentice training so long carried on by the International Typographical Union and used as a model by those attempting to further apprentice training through Government help.

The closed shop does not unduly limit employment in the industry. It is true that over the years we have, in cooperation with employers, taken over a large share of the task of training new apprentices at the trade; frequently, because of the lack of interest of the employers, we must take over the whole job. Our collective agreements establish apprentice ratios; that is to say, a certain number of apprentices only may be hired in relation to the number of journeymen. This is done largely on the employer's insistence, for he understandably does not wish his working journeymen to spend all their time instructing apprentices and none turning out his work. In many enterprises throughout the country employers have refused to take on the quota of apprentices to which they are entitled and thereby participate in the training of new men in the field.

We say without apology that the apprentice quotas perform another valuable service to the industry by limiting the number, though not designating the individuals, who learn the trade. Until 1940 there was always unemployment among printers despite the operation of these ratios, so that it cannot be said that they have been fixed to cause a scarcity of printers. The peculiar conditions of World War II, when almost no apprentices entered the field, did cause a temporary scarcity since that time which has now all but disappeared. Through upgrading apprentices and by cooperating to place veterans, we have cooperated with the industry to overcome this temporary shortage. But the unlimited acceptance of apprentices would (a) be unacceptable to employers who were asked to supply facilities for training them, (b) flood the market, in less prosperous times, with trained craftsmen for whom there were no jobs, (c) depress the wage standards in the industry. Our objective is to raise wages and working conditions, not to depress them, and it will hardly be expected that we will cooperate in a program either of unlimited access to the industry or unlimited access to our union with the sole objective of reducing the employers' wage bills. Our members have an interest in how this industry is run, and it is our job to protect that interest.

3. Adoption of the Thomas bill will make it possible for unions to support the members who refuse to handle struck work or nonunion work produced by nonunion competing employees. This right, so long enjoyed, has made it possible for those employers who are willing to pay fair wages and grant fair working conditions to continue in business, to compete among themselves and to compete with those who choose to run nonunion shops and operate under substandard conditions. Experience of the past has indicated that fair employers can compete with unfair employers under the stabilizing influence exerted by the better trained craftsmen supplied by the historically fair practices of the International Typographical Union. The nonunion shops have followed union wages and practices to the degree necessary to hold their help. The ability to produce under fair conditions has made up for the unfair advantage the nonunion employer had by virtue of lower wages and longer hours. It is only through the successful closed shop in the printing industry that this stability has been maintained. Otherwise cutthroat competition will become the rule and the industry composed of over 30,000 units will lose its opportunity to pay fair wages and operate under fair working conditions.

4. The union has been flexible enough to supply trained craftsmen to man shops in the less favorable areas and by maintaining a high degree of organization cut off the supply of poorly trained craftsmen who may be available for competitive and strikebreaking purposes. The International Typographical Union issues charters to competent craftsmen in cities were eight or more desire to form a union. Obviously, such small unions must have assistance from an international organization if they are to maintain high standards and be a credit to the industry. There are over 400 unions in the International Typographical Union having less than 25 members each.

5. Adoption of the Thomas bill will make it possible for the International Typographical Union to pursue, unhampered by bureaucratic interference, its historic policy of collective bargaining based on the very cornerstone of stability arrived at through democratic methods. For over a hundred years the fundamental basis of a union shop has been the acceptance by employers, as a prerequisite to all other conditions of the laws of the union. Such laws as were of an economic character and which established a minimum basis for union shop operation all over the country provided a floor upon which collective bargaining was erected. Most important of these laws were those requiring a closed shop, a system of priority, a system of apprentice training, and the regulation of the number of apprentices to be employed at a given time, laws governing the method of determining the fairness of discharges and methods of handling grievances and procedure for the arbitration of disputes arising as to interpretation and enforcement of agreements. No variation has been permitted in the application of the basic fundamentals constituting the floor of collective bargaining and their interpretation has rested with the union which has adopted them. Their universal application and interpretation has provided a desired stabilizing influence in the industry.

6. The adoption of the Thomas bill will make it possible for the union to continue to maintain the Union Printers Home at Colorado Springs, Colo., and make it possible to continue to pay pensions of $15 per week to more than 7,000 aged and incapacitated members as well as to pay mortuary benefits of up to $500 on the death of a member. Obviously, these features cannot be maintained if the closed shop is permanently abolished and nonunion men work in shops as free riders on the efforts of union men. Such nonunion men refuse to bear their fair share of the laudable and necessary efforts of union men. Obviously no strike for better wages or conditions can be successful if an employer can dilute the personnel of a shop with enough nonunion men selected by him and perhaps paid more than the union scale so that they will supply a strikebreaking nucleus for continued operation during a strike. Without question such a strikebreaking nucleus of nonunion men would destroy the morale of the union and while preventing the possibility of a strike would also prevent reasonable progress of working people obtained through bona fide collective bargaining.

7. The rights of an individual as regards securing a job have been overstressed to a point of being ridiculous and fantastic. The rights of an individual are important, but the rights of 10 individuals or a thousand individuals are 10 times or 1,000 times more important. It is a sound premise that individuals may do collectively what they have a legal right to do individually. If 1 individual has the right to contract for a job, there is no reason why 1,000 individuals or any number may not contract with an employer for jobs. Neither one individual nor a thousand may walk into a plant and declare themselves in.

The closed shop as it exists in our industry has denied no one the "right to work." In the first place, there is no "right to work"; if there were, our members could go into court during a depression and enforce that right instead of remaining idle.

To say that a man must know his trade in order to work in this business is true of every other line of endeavor, and if he knows his trade, is of good character, and is willing to pay his dues, he can come freely into our organization. Under the Taft-Hartley Act, a man can be forced into a union at the end of 30 days; we do not want and have never accepted the principle of compulsory unionism and accept into membership only those who freely apply for such membership. We deny no one the right to work at this trade; we do impose certain conditions upon working in certain shops. Thos conditions are not onerous, are democratically fixed by the action of the vast majority of the men employed in the craft, and are designed solely to protect the interests of those working at the craft and the competency of persons employed in it. If there are only 500 jobs available and there are 1,000 persons seeking employment in a plant where there is no union at all, 500 are going to be unemployed and the rights of the individuals to a job are wholly nonexistent. If, on the other hand, the employer and the union maintain stable conditions for 500 men in the plant and such replacements as are needed, it is a laudable effort and one which will result in not attracting greater numbers hoping for work and tending to force down labor standards. Since labor unions are recognized by law as necessary to protect workers against the greed and oppression of employing corporations, the law should not, directly contrary thereto, also provide laws under which organizations of labor can be destroyed by the very forces the law seeks to check.

The existence of a substantial number of closed shops means that there is a pool of jobs available to our members. Under our seniority system, which we call "priority," a union member who has established his seniority in an enterprise receives a preference in hire over those junior to him, and thus skill and experience are recognized and rewarded. Out of their long experience, our members have developed an antipathy for working with nonunion men; not because they dislike them personally except in some cases, because they recognize in the nonunion man one who is unwilling to be bound by the rules by which our members govern their conduct and who is, therefore, a threat to the stability, solidarity, and bargaining power of the union. The closed shop agreement avoids any difficulties which might arise from the hiring of nonunion men. Our employers recognize this tradition, and only a neophyte in the business would undertake to introduce a nonunion man into a union shop.

I have indicated some doubts about some provisions of this bill. But on balance, it represents so marked an improvement over present legislation that the ITU is prepared to give its support. If the reservations which I have expressed raise difficulties, in the event this bill becomes law, we shall of course call them to the attention of the Congress. If they do not materialize, so much the better. But I am confident that this bill represents the maximum of regulation which should be inflicted upon unions and that no amendments of it should be countenanced. To go any further than does this bill can only entail a repetition of the Taft-Hartley experience. That experience should by now have indicated that the labor movement of this country is prepared to fight hard to retain those essentials of free trade-unionism which are also the essentials of our political and economic democracy.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I suppose you have noticed that I am buttressed by a couple of good lawyers, and I shall rely on them to at least nudge me to keep me from answering a question that might get me in trouble.

Senator TAFT. They can answer for you, perhaps, without being subject——

Mr. RANDOLPH. On the contrary, they are enjoined likewise.

Senator TAFT. Are they? [laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. I cannot help but repeat, and I think everybody agrees here—I hope they do, at any rate—that our first duty should be to protect the witnesses.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Neely.

Senator NEELY. Mr. Randolph, you have been an officer of this union for many years, have you not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, sir; for some 20 years.

Senator NEELY. You are at present the president and have been since 1944, I believe?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes.

Senator NEELY. Would you please describe the procedure of the union, in general, so that the committee may know that you have actually been proceeding along democratic lines?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, Senator Neely: I think that such a statement will help materially, and I believe in convincing Senator Taft that the ITU is a very fine organization.

Senator TAFT. I have always thought so. I have not been much in touch with them, but I have always heard that.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The history of our organization is one that I believe is really the best evidence of the trade-union movement of the country.

It existed in typographical societies almost from the beginning of our country, and some of those societies have had a continuous existence for a great many years.

For instance, this local union in Washington, D. C., has a continuous existence since 1815; and in 1850, a group of those societies held a convention looking toward the formation of a national body. They had another convention in 1851 for the same purpose, and at the third convention in 1852 arrived at the basis for the National Typographical Union.

It persisted under that name until 1869 when, upon receiving into the union a group of Canadian societies, Canadian unions, the name was changed to the International Typographical Union.

Basically it has been completely democratic from the beginning. In our offices in Indianapolis you can find the printed proceedngs of the conventions beginning with the convention of journeymen printers of 1850 and every action taken by the international union since then, in convention, is found printed and preserved along with the laws of each year since 1850.

With the exception of very few times, the international union has met every year. I recall noting in the proceedings that the president of the international union severly criticized the secretary-treasurer for calling off a convention during the Civil War. I think we only missed two during that time.

The union has always functioned through a constitution, bylaws and general laws and convention laws since that time.

The constitution has always been reserved to the members. In other words, any amendment which is to be made to the constitution embodying our basic policies must be referred to a referendum vote. Every question concerning the rates of dues, and the raising of money, has to be voted on in a referendum vote, and it has always been so.

The bylaws have contained the regulations for the internal affairs of the union, the procedure to be followed by the international and local unions, the duties of the officers and so on, and the bylaws have been subject to change by convention action or by referendum vote if desired by the members.

We have more democracy in the typographical union than you have in the Government of the Untied States or any State, because we can change our laws through the initiative and referendum——

Senator TAFT. When you speak of bylaws, does that cover the so-called international laws ? Is that the same, or how are they differentiated?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The international laws is a book composed of the constitution, the bylaws, the general laws, convention laws, the Union Printers' Home laws, resolutions.

Senator TAFT. I mean, how are the international laws passed? What is the procedure?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Convention.

Senator TAFT. If you want a new international law, how do you go about it?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am just trying to get to that, and if I do not cover it, you remind me, please.

The constitution is only made and amended by referendum vote of the members. The bylaws may be made in a convention or there may be also an amendment to the bylaws by referendum vote through an initiative petition, whereby 150 unions at this time may petition for an election to change any law in the book, any law in the book can be changed by referendum vote of the members on the petition of 150 out of 850 unions.

The general laws contain a series of laws adopted by the members, either in convention or by referendum vote, and from the beginning the officers of the International Typographical Union and of local unions were democratically elected. Until approximately 1898 officers of the international union were elected in conventions.

Since that time they have been elected by referendum vote of all of the members of the union each 2 years.

The local unions elect their officers through a referendum vote of their local members. Local unions may not change their constitution or bylaws until they have first proposed the changes at union meeting, laid them over for 30 days, informed the members of the changes, and then voted on them at a succeeding meeting.

The international conventions are made up of delegates elected by referendum vote of each local union and, therefore, the finest type of democracy is exhibited through the members in referendum vote in electing delegates to a convention, and these delegates do the work of amending the bylaws and general laws or proposing amendments to the constitution for referendum vote.

They may change the convention laws with a majority of two-thirds. So that the orderly procedure, and the absolute guaranty of protection for every individual member of the organization, is evident, and has been from the beginning.

No member may be expelled or suspended by a local union until after due trial in accordance with a very well developed set of rules, and until after the member has had an opportunity to appeal to the executive council of the International Typographical Union.

No verdict of a local union providing for either reprimand, suspension, or expulsion may be enforced until after the man charged with the crime or convicted of it has had the opportunity to get a review by the executive council of the International Typographical Union.

Now, the democratic character of our organization, I say, even exceeds the democracy of the country itself.

There is a very close parallel, however, on the relationship of local unions to the international, and the relationship of States to the Nation.

For instance, from the beginning, a local union has had the right to adopt any law it saw fit so long as it did not conflict with the laws of the International Typographical Union; and the laws of the international were made by the delegation of powers from local unions to the international union in convention or by referendum vote, so that when the international union speaks it is speaking as a voice of all of the members of the International Typographical Union.

The international gets its power from the members of the union, as the governments of the States and the United States get their powers from the people.

That is a parallel condition, and local unions have put upon themselves, through their own delegates, the laws that are found in the international lawbook, so that the international lawbook is not something that is enforced upon people, but it is a restriction that people lay upon themselves for the purposes of international coordination of unionism.

Now, we have in the general laws, and from the beginning, a series of laws that have to do with the economic conditions of the industry.

As the union developed, and until some time between 1880 to 1886, there was no such thing as collective bargaining. The local unions simply met, and formulated their scales of prices, and the conditions under which the members would work.

Any employer that would pay the scale and comply with those conditions could get union printers. Those who did not, did not get union printers. That is all there was to it.

There was no collective bargaining, and employers generally, as of years gone by, especially back in those days, did not even think about bargaining with unions in any way near the sense they think of it today.

The simply complied with their scales of prices, and rules, if they hired union people. With the development of the linotype machine around 1885 to 1890, a great deal more printing could be produced. Industry got a spurt of development.

It became desirable to employers, to employers, if you please, to have collective bargaining with the International Typographical Union, and it was to their interest to have a scale of prices stable for a period of time, rather than depend upon the scale of prices which may have been adopted at any time by the local unions in each city.

So, obviously, at their request and obviously also for the benefit of the union, the development of collective bargaining began. But there was no change whatever in the fact that the union rules of conduct in shops, the union conditions that had been laid down in the international lawbook, persisted as a basis of collective bargaining, and has persisted to this day.

I shall deal with that, perhaps, a little bit more later on, but suffice it to say at this moment, to this very day, even though the American Newspaper Publishers' Association has since 1916 made several attempts to change that basis, it has not been done. It could not be done without destroying the union because in these general laws we tie down the economic progress that has been made over the years.

The first move for an 11-hour day was made by order of the union that thereafter no union should make a contract or could make one or have a scale of prices, as it was in those days, for a work-day exceeding 11 hours, nor at a later time when the union ordered the same action with regard to the 10-hour day, and the 9-hour day, and the 8-hour day.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you date those 10-hour, 9-hour days, Mr. Randolph?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, I cannot. The 8-hour day was 1906, and beyond that I cannot give you the exact date, but I could get it out of our records.

In other words, the union—and it was necessary to strike to obtain it—simply stated that on or after a certain day 11 hours or 10 hours would be the workday, and any employer that did not pay for it, for the work under those conditions, got no union printers, the equivalent of a strike, but that action had to be taken each successive step on up to the 8-hour day of 1905 and 1906.

It required a strike in every reduction of hours since the organization was founded. So that the general laws adopted by the members——

Senator NEELY. May I interrupt you there? If you had been prohibited by law from striking against the 11-hour day, for instance, do you think you would have gotten rid of it?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No. In fact, we could not have gotten rid of any workweek without a strike, as our long history has proven.

Senator NEELY. You think if you had been under the Taft-Hartley Act at that time you could have gotten rid of the 11-hour day?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We would not have lived if we had a Taft-Hartley Act in those days. It took a good quality of pure unionism to exist under circumstances of the days preceding 1880, as perhaps many of you are aware, if you have read the industrial history of this country.

Senator NEELY. I do not believe the members of your union were persecuted or abused as they were in many of the other unions, for instance, in the coal fields.

Of course, it is a matter of common knowledge, and it was in the county in which I lived, that if a union man came to our town to make a speech on the front steps of the courthouse recommending in the most peaceful way that the miners organize, a goon for the coal company would beat him up and put him in jail and keep him there until he left town.

You did not have that kind of violence? That kind of violence was not used against your members, was it?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, Senator; and perhaps the reason why is because our folks from the beginning were skilled in a way that could not be replaced immediately, and if they beat them up, certainly they would have to take time to recuperate during which no paper would be gotten out. [Laughter.]

In fact, I have seen some pictures of some of the old-time printers of 1880 and before, and I noticed they had heavy gold chains across their vests, and there was one with a swallow-tail coat and a plug hat, and all with big mustaches and they looked very dignified. [Laughter.]

But in the development of the industry the skill was a factor, as was also the fact that until recent years a piecework system was the rule.

It has taken 40 years to eliminate the piecework system slowly and without too much strife. In the old days everything was piecework, and a printer would be assigned a set of cases, to set from a case full of type, and his job was to set type out of those cases 7 days a week, and he got paid so much a thousand ems for setting type.

Well, the type had to be thrown into the case again after use, so he came down in the daytime if he was a night worker, and distributed the type so he would have some more to set up at nighttime.

Likewise, in reverse if he were on the day job he, of necessity, had to see that the type was distributed cleanly so that when he set it up he would not have too many typographical errors. In that system, and that system of making the man responsible for his job his feeling of responsibility has persisted on through the years.

If a man does not take care of his job, then he is guilty of what we call "jumping" his job, and he can be discharged for doing that. That has always been the case; and from the beginning the man who was assigned a set of cases had the responsibility—that was called a situation—and if he wanted to be off, he had to employ a substitute to cover his situation, and set type from that set of cases.

That was his obligation, and to this day a union printer has the right to employ a substitute without consultation or approval of the foreman so long as he covers his situation.

Now, I can well understand that someone reading the book of laws, as of now, and without that history, without that knowledge, and without knowing that it is the tradition of the industry, might feel, "Well, what business has an employee go to interfere with management and inject a man in the composing room?" It sounds silly to some of these modern people, but we, of the typographical union, regard that as a right, and a right that we will not give up. That is so firmly entrenched in our organization and in our industry as to provide a certain amount of economic democracy and make it possible for a man not to be unfairly treated by an employer as regards being absent from his job.

We also have, from the beginning, rules concerning the protection of men from discharge, and until recent years the matter of discharge was one wholly handled by the union.

If a man was discharged, his fellow workers in the shop—we called it a chapel—we inherited the word "chapel" from England, in the early days. A shop was a chapel. The members in the chapel passed on the justice of that discharge, and in the early days that finished it. In later days the matter of discharge was appealable to the local union and executive council of the International Typographical Union, and that decision was final until reversed by a convention, if a man wanted to carry it to a convention, and some have.

But the security on the job, and the stability of the service that we have rendered has been one which has been a responsibility of the union, and one which the union has enforced uniformly all of these years.

Now, there are other laws in the general laws, having to do with other working conditions in the shop that have been established over long periods of time. Each reduction in hours has been nailed down in the lawbook so that no subordinate union may make any agreement for a longer workday than 8 hours a day, nor more days per week than five, and all of the time local unions have negotiated through agreements with employers contracts for less number of hours than eight per day. At the present time there is a 37½-hour average or less in the entire industry.

Now, the effect of these laws simply means this, as was the case with piecework: When we have secured a sufficient part of the industry operating under these favorable conditions and elimination of piecework, when there were only, I believe, thirteen remaining piecework scale, the international convention then adopted a law prohibiting local unions from having a contract with the piecework provision in it. These stragglers in the establishment of the favorable conditions are thereby served notice that from now on they cannot make a contract with piecework in it.

Then, the same way with hours, the same with regard to the use of the union label. It has been the same with regard to a minimum wage by employers who use the union label. In other words, whatever the development of the industry has produced through the process of collective bargaining is nailed down in the law book so as to make it uniform throughout the country for members of the union. The union rules as regards economic matters are obviously and, by the very necessity, limited to that degree of what could be established throughout the country without having to strike for them, because if you adopt a rule that you have to have a national strike about, you want to be pretty sure that that rule is one that the overwhelming majority of the members in the organization will strike to enforce, because if they do not, the procedure of making rules for international enforcement absolutely breaks down.

In other words, the trouble that you might be put to is a brake on the type of a rule that you might make. These rules, I say again, are made by the members themselves. The members themselves in local unions, through delegation of their authority to a delegate, democratically elected, make them themselves. The international union is not just a group of officers inflicting anything upon the members. The members are the international union, and the members' rules are the international laws.

Senator NEELEY. It is truly a self-governing body.

Mr. RANDOLPH. A self-governing body completely and absolutely.

When it comes to collective bargaining, that is the business of the local union. It is the authority of the local union and the local union acts under its own restraints through international law.

The international officers are executive officers to see to it that these laws are enforced generally.

Now, the effect of these laws in an industry that has over 30,000 units of manufacturing plants is to stabilize it.

Here are a group of employers, we will say, in, take Chicago, I know more about it, I was president there in 1926-27, before I became international secretary-treasurer.

At one time there were less than a third of our members employed in offices belonging to an association of employers, but we always dealt with an association. We made an agreement with an association, with the understanding that we, as a union, had to enforce these same conditions in all of the other shops in the city. That has been the situation which has obtained ever since, and not only that, but the newspaper publishers in the city have always had a clause in the contract we made with that association whereby the union would see to it that that was done, and if the union granted a different or better condition to any other daily newspaper in the city, upon request of the association the union would also permit the contract to be changed to give them that same favorable condition. Stabilization of the industry through union laws is a recognized principle, and without it, it would be impossible to operate with any degree of stability in an industry which has so many units and so much competition that the industry would cut its own throat by competitive processes.

The union has laid a floor for stability. It has laid a floor for collective bargaining by having the same working conditions operate all over the country.

A man can learn the trade in New York and go to Los Angeles and know what is expected of him and perform. He can go from Seattle to Florida or from Canada to the Gulf, and everywhere he goes he can practice his trade, as we call it, his profession, with the same assurance of knowing what is expected of him; and the employer has the same assurance that he is getting a competent man who knows how to work in the composing room.

It has been of benefit to the employers as well as to the union, and with it has gone over the years an apprenticeship training program whereby it was assured that these craftsmen did learn the trade, and that they did know what they were to do when they went from place to place.

We have not only supplied through democratic procedures and collective bargaining a competent staff of workmen, which have been of benefit to the employer and of benefit to the union, but in the establishment of that force we have provided a mobility that was important: a man going from place to place, as the volume of work might grow, or moving from town to town. We have a mobility as well as an apprenticeship training that guaranteed that workers knew a trade when they went from town to town.

Senator SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that another responsibility of mine calls me away at this moment. I am profoundly interested in the testimony of Mr. Randolph.

I have always had the highest regard for this particular union, having had many friends in it, and I am just raising the question of whether you plan to have Mr. Randolph here after lunch today, because I would like to ask him some questions to clarify my own thinking. I am unable to do that now because I have to go to another appointment.

The CHAIRMAN. That depends entirely on the committee. If I may judge from what has happened in the past, I judge he will be here this afternoon.

Senator SMITH. That is my assumption. I sincerely hope so. I regret that I have to leave, but I want to thank Mr. Randolph for what he has said up to this time, and I hope to talk with him later.

Mr. RANDOLPH. If we do not, Senator, I would be glad to visit your office and spend several hours with you.

Senator SMITH. We will do that if I do not get a chance to talk to your here. Thank you.

Mr. RANDOLPH. A final word about the democracy of the organization. For all of the time that there has been an organization of employers we have had a convention rule that employers' associations may send a representative to our conventions and discuss any matter that is of importance to them.

I would like to read to you section 4 of article I of the Convention Laws on page 127 of the law book—that is the 1948 law book—and it is as follows:

"No person other than duly elected delegates and officers shall be accorded the privilege of the floor during the sessions of the International Union except by unanimous consent of the Convention; but when requested, a representative of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, the United Typothetæ of America, the Printers' League of America or the Printers' National Association shall be heard on important changes in the laws affecting their interests."

They can debate any question before the convention, but they cannot vote on it, and dating back to the time when local unions adopted their own scales of prices, we have had an international law that provided for local unions to permit employers to discuss with them any important changes made in the scales of prices, granting to an employer access to a union meeting to discuss his side of the question. And at no time in the history of the organization is there any record of any such refusal. They are ofttimes welcomed into union meetings to discuss these matters, and any time they have requested it, they have had the opportunity to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. They talked freely during the operation of the National Labor Relations Act without question of what they said? Did they feel that they had free speech with you or did you say, "You cannot say that here?"

Mr. RANDOLPH. Oh, yes; there was no question of free speech in our organization. We have always welcomed it, and if an employer can out-argue the members of the union, he has that opportunity within the union meeting if he requested it.

I recall one publisher requested that privilege not so long ago in Louisville. He was granted the privilege, and the union asked me to come and state the views of the international union on the same subject he was to discuss, and the publisher and I debated the question before the local union.

The CHAIRMAN. Was there ever any restraint during the operation of the old Wagner Act about their talking freely?

Mr. RANDOLPH. None at all; none at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Were you ever accused, your union ever accused, of being a company union at all?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Absolutely not.

The CHAIRMAN. And you had no difficulties now with any of the representatives of these employer organizations that you have mentioned; were they parties to the various petitions asking for modification of the Wagner Act so that they could have freedom of speech? Do you know whether they considered themselves hurt by the way in which the National Labor Relations Board carried on the operation of the law?

Mr. RANDOLPH. So far as I know they had made no such representations.

The CHAIRMAN. There was not any talk about it in your meetings when they came?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Did anybody say, "Well, I have got to be careful now because I might find myself in contempt with the Board if I express my will openly by saying certain things"? They felt free, did they, as free after 1935 and 1936 as they did before?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Oh, they always did, and if you would attend any of our meetings or conventions you would find that there is always somebody that will take the hide off of the officers or anybody he sees fit.

The CHAIRMAN. Do they say now, as they come in, since the operation of the act of 1947, do they say, "Well, now, I feel fine; I can come in and talk to you freely without restraint"? Have you noticed any difference, in other words?

Mr. RANDOLPH. There is no difference except the heat that the Taft-Hartley law has generated. There is more conversation and it is hotter.

The CHAIRMAN. We have sometimes heat in this committee, but we all remain brothers.

Mr. RANDOLPH. So I notice.

Senator TAFT. Brothers, you said?

The CHAIRMAN. Brothers.

Excuse me, Senator Neely, for breaking in there.

Senator NEELY. Are you through with that comment, Mr. Randolph?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think I have indicated that we are a democratic organization along the lines of your questions, and our democracy——

Senator NEELY. I personally had no doubt about it before, but I thought it ought to be in the record.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think it is very important in view of the general situation to understand that the economic provisions that are contained in our book of laws are the minimum basis of the nationally applied union regulation, and that our members make those rules, and the position in the union is that they have a right to stand on that book of laws as a general economic law throughout the whole Nation for any collective bargaining that is done. That is one of our basic and fundamental positions which we will not desert, and which we will defend to the absolute end of the union because it would mean the end of the union if we did not operate under such conditions.

Senator NEELY. Mr. Randolph, would you now please briefly discuss the relationship of your organization or rather its members with the employers, with their employers, from a standpoint of hostility or peacefulness of the relationship, first before the Wagner Act was passed, secondly under the Wagner Act, and thirdly under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The relationship between the subordinate unions and the international union and employers has always been on a very friendly basis, and one of the really best that you can imagine. We have had recognized the idea that there is any such thing as class consciousness about this matter.

The union has never undertaken to do other than to discuss the economic phases of our existence, and to arrange the best deal that we can arrange by collective bargaining.

That persisted under the Wagner Act, and the Wagner Act had practically no effect on our union whatsoever. We made very few efforts to even use the Wagner Act.

As regards the matter of collective bargaining, that is one of our historic purposes, and we never presumed to collective bargain with anybody unless we had a big majority of his employees in our union.

Our organization efforts have been made along the lines that I have set down, so that we did not use the Wagner Act except in a very few instances. To my way of thinking, in our industry, it was of no particular value because in the essence of the situation, it all depends upon either the good will of the parties' bargaining with each other or the economic ability of the union to withdraw sufficient members to stop the production of the plant, so that the employer would be willing to bargain for wages and conditions, and so on.

The Wagner Act, as I say, had very little effect, and we very seldom used it.

Obviously, it was for the purpose of protecting other unions and the formation of other unions against what was adequately proved before the senatorial committee to have been a move on the part of big employers to prevent organization by the use of various illegal methods. The Wagner Act, as I understood it, was simply to take the foot of the employers off the neck of the workers, so that they could organize and could bargain.

We have been doing that for a hundred years, so that it has no effect upon us, and in the final analysis economic strength is the only thing that will determine whether a union wins or loses.

Our relationship was not disturbed at all when the Wagner Act was adopted. It was not bettered at all.

Senator NEELY. Did you live at peace or were you at war constantly with the employers before the Wagner Act?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We were always at peace.

Senator NEELY. Were you at peace with them under the Wagner Act?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes; we were.

Senator NEELY. Have you been at peace or war with them since the Taft-Hartley Act was passed?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, we have been at peace with a large majority of the individual owners of newspapers and commercial establishments. A war has been put upon us by representatives of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, and representatives of the Printing Industry of America, which representatives testified here the other day.

Now, this war is one of representatives, and I venture to say, without knowing their internal affairs, that there is far less democracy in determining the course of policy in that organization than there is in the International Typographical Union.

The CHAIRMAN. How old are their orders?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, the Printing Industry of America is only a few years old. It is sort of a successor of the Printers' League mentioned in our book of laws. We have tried to keep this up to date in giving the various national organizations an opportunity to talk to us, but it is not a very old organization in the commercial field. The very fact that the vast majority of employers in both commercial and newspaper fields are doing the contrary to the advice of their national organizations proves that they do not approve it and that they did not go along with it to begin with except as a general proposition whereby they might weaken the organization through the abolition of the book of laws as a foundation for collective bargaining.

Senator TAFT. Or that they have no choice because your power is so great that they have to sign or go out of business?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Senator, I wish our power was as great as you say. It has cost us millions of dollars each time we tried to exercise any power, and in establishing the 8-hour day it cost the international $5,000,000 in 1906 and local unions some $8,000,000 to get the 8-hour day in 1906. Being inclined to do a statesmanlike job, as they refer to some of these acts of unions, in 1919, at the conclusion of the war, when the shorter workweek could easily have been prescribed and taken, the international officials made an agreement with a group of employers on a national basis to institute a 44-hour week in 1921, giving them 2 years to bring it about. When the 2 years rolled around, the employers said in effect, "There is a depression on. You are going to keep on working 48."

The result was it cost us $16,000,000 to make good on an agreement we made in 1919, and that is not very powerful. It lost us some 6,000 members and hundreds of shops went into the nonunion column.

Senator PEPPER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Senator NEELY. Surely.

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Randolph, you say that was in 1921. State whether or not after World War I there grew up in the country and in the administration then in power an antilabor policy at that time which was reflected in the attitude that you just described, on the part of management?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The attitude against the fundamental policy of the ITU was very well indicated by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association in 1922, when at the expiration of the arbitration agreement in effect between the international union and the ANPA, it refused to renew it because of the provisions of the book of laws. From 1922 on the machinery of arbitration was kept intact for any local union and publisher that wanted to use it, but there was no international commitment on arbitration as a means of settling disputes.

Senator PEPPER. Did you get any help from the Government in that crisis of yours?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, Senator, we have never appealed to the Government and we have always regarded this matter of industry and labor as one for them to settle themselves, if allowed to do it.

Senator NEELY. Well, has the Taft-Hartley law been productive of peace or of strife so far as your union is concerned?

Mr. RANDOLPH. It has been productive of strife in this way, Senator Neely. The Taft-Hartley law provided various alternatives that an employer might use through which he could destroy the craft.

It permitted him to transfer our work, the work upon which we have earned our living for 100 years, to any other trade craft or class of employees, union or nonunion, and it prohibited us from striking to prevent him from doing it. Well, obviously, that is such a simple way of putting the squeeze on the union that whether he does it or not, he has the present opportunity to do it, and if he does not, it is only because he wants to maintain the union strong enough at least to give him the stability that he has always been accustomed to having, but it does give him the opportunity to club the union by saying, "Unless you do this or that, I will do this so it will ruin you."

That was one of the worst things the Taft-Hartley law did, and if I recall the legislative history I once read of the act—and once was enough—that provision was put in during the sessions of the conference committee. It has not been on the floor for debate at all. Somebody brought it to the conference committee and at once it was adopted and we were subjected to the very tool by which the employer could slice up the union and the various tasks that go to make up a trade.

Senator TAFT. Which provision was that? You said "conference."

Mr. RANDOLPH. The provision of the trade craft or class, 8 (b) (4) (D).

Senator TAFT. It is in a House bill. I assume it was debated in the House, but was not debated in the Senate.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, that is, as I recall, a restraint of the Taft-Hartley law, and the powers given to employers to do as they please interfered with all of the stabilizing influences we had built up over a hundred years.

Senator NEELY. What policy of collective bargaining, if any, has your union adopted under the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We were immediately aware of these dangers to our organization, and we consulted an attorney who we thought was one of the best, an ex-judge of the Supreme Court in the State of Indiana. He spent many hours with us working on the problem. He attended our convention in Cleveland and assisted and guided us in preparing a collective-bargaining policy which he thought was within the law and which we thought was within the law and which would not sacrifice unnecessarily any of the rights that we had established.

We conceived that some portions of the law meant what they said and proceeded along that line. We conceived the idea we could proceed to bargain collectively within the whole mandate of the law, as we always had done, but that we would not proceed to the point of signing a contract which would bind us to the employer while he could exercise some legal rights under the Taft-Hartley law to split us up.

The employer has some rights to grant us certain conditions that we cannot strike for but, as I say, the collective-bargaining policy adopted by the Cleveland convention was to continue, as we always had, to bargain with our employers, but that we would not ask for a contract and we would indicate that we did not want one.

The adoption of that proposition plainly stated, and I quote: "There should not be and will not be any attempt on the part of the international or subordinate unions to violate any valid provisions of this law or of any law, Federal or State," and we proceeded under that policy to try to bargain.

Senator NEELY. What was the result?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, the immediate result, shortly after our convention, was at least a newspaper account of a speech made by Mr. Denham, general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board.

Senator NEELY. The man who has been on the witness stand here for 3 days?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, indicating that we were off-side in our attitude, and it was not legal.

Senator TAFT. When was that, what was the date of that?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I did not keep a copy of it. I recall it was not too long after our convention, which was in the latter part of August of 1947.

Senator TAFT. And his speech was a result of the resolution adopted at that convention, I assume? He was commenting on that?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes.

Senator TAFT. That was this resolution:

"It will be our policy to refrain from signing contracts in order that we avoid agreeing, or seeming to agree, or voluntarily accepting the conditions created by such a relationship under the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 * * * our members may accept employment only from employers who are willing to employ them under the 'Conditions of Employment' which the several unions adopt, after approval of the Executive Council of the I. T. U. A 'Conditions of Employment' form, which must be used by all unions and which is uniform except for local scales and practices, has been printed for the convenience and use of all subordinate unions. The form sets out the conditions under which our members offer their services."

He was commenting on this first statement, I assume: "It will be our policy to refrain from signing contracts in order that we avoid agreeing, or seeming to agree, or voluntarily accepting the conditions created by such a relationship under the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947."

That was the occasion of his speech, was it not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think so, yes, and likewise not too long after a speech by Mr.——

Senator NEELY. Pardon me for interrupting. Where did he make that speech?

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is my information or memory that it was before the Bar Association in Cleveland, either the Bar Association or Bankers Association, I do not know.

Senator NEELY. Would it be possible to obtain a copy of that speech?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I would not have a copy of the speech. All I know is what was stated in the paper and I was not concerned too much about it, so I did not keep a copy of it.

It indicated to me a prejudging and a hostility which I just registered in my mind as such and let it go. We had too many other things to think about to try to find the way to handle this thing without taking ex parte judgment on the facts.

Senator NEELY. Were you intimately acquainted with Mr. Denham at that time? Did you know his attitude toward labor unions?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; I did not.

Senator NEELY. Did you know at that time he was opposed to the closed shop, for instance?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; I did not know about Mr. Denham, I say, because we used the Wagner Act almost never, very seldom. I did not keep track of the various governmental personalities or functions that went along in the operations of that——

Senator PEPPER. Will the Senator yield a moment? I think it would be appropriate for this record to contain either a copy of Mr. Denham's speech, if there was one made, and if not, any newspaper account of it that might be had, and I would like to voice the request, if there are any of Mr. Denham's representatives here, that Mr. Denham see if he has a copy of his speech and be kind enough to supply it to the committee.

If not, would he give the date of it and furnish us any newspaper clippings he has on it? If not, our own staff can seek to obtain that.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Johns, will you do that?

Mr. JOHNS. Yes, sir.

Senator PEPPER. As soon as possible.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Secondly, an instance was the fact that Mr. Tom Shroyer appeared before a meeting of commercial printing employers, in French Lick, Ind., where he made similar comments. They were printed in the Indianapolis newspapers.

Senator TAFT. I ask that that speech also be put in the record.

The CHAIRMAN. No objection.

(Committee insert.) [Mr. Denham's speech referred to above; not reproduced herein.]

Senator PEPPER. That is Mr. Shroyer who was at that time general counsel of the Joint Labor-Management Committee of the Senate and House under the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right. The only effect those speeches, or the published accounts of them, had on me was to indicate that the Government agencies were hostile to us, and had accepted vilification or some other reason for that hostility.

Senator PEPPER. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Senator NEELY. Yes.

Senator PEPPER. Would you be kind enough to tell us whether either Mr. Shroyer or Mr. Denham had heard argument from you or your representative or from any legal representative of the International Typographical Union on the merit and the legality of your action before such speeches and comments were made?

Mr. RANDOLPH. He had heard nothing from us.

Senator TAFT. Except your official statement, which could only be interpreted in my mind as a defiance of the law which they were trying to enforce, that is all. I think that is an exception, I should think.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I wish you would read the official statement that indicated defiance of the law, Senator.

Senator TAFT. "It will be our policy to refrain from signing contracts."

Now, the law prescribes that unions shall engage in collective bargaining, collective bargaining shall be the signing of a written contract—"in order that we avoid agreeing or seeming to agree or voluntarily accepting the conditions created by such a relationship under this act."

If that is not a defiance of the law, I would like to know what it is. I cannot interpret it in any other way.

Senator PEPPER. Excuse me. Will the Senator yield? I wonder, Mr. Randolph, if it might not be appropriate to recall the definition of due process of law given by Senator Daniel Webster to the effect that in due process of law one is heard before he is condemned.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I hope that is still the law, although I am commencing to doubt it.

Senator NEELY. In this case you know it was not, do you not? Here is an official blowing off. This witness has been blowing here for the last 3 days, crying out against everything that could not be approved by, I had assumed, the American Manufacturers Association.

Senator TAFT. I object to the Senator's statement, Mr. Chairman, as an imputation and motive of a Government official without any justification whatever. I think it should be withdrawn by the Senator.

Senator NEELY. No; I do not withdraw it. I am not making any implication against you, sir, or any Member of the Senate. I am not violating any rule of the Senate.

I reiterate what I have said about this man. I think his conduct here as a witness is such as to impel and force every labor union in the United States to petition for—he has shown such bitter prejudice that he has no business sitting, being on any Government pay roll that involves relationships between toiling men and those who hire them.

Senator TAFT. Mr. Chairman, the record will show, so I will not argue with Mr. Neely—if the distinguished Senator will excuse me for interrupting—I think the record will show his statement is wholly and completely out of accord with the facts of the testimony of Mr. Denham.

Senator NEELY. Well, I will leave that to the public, and I hope they will read his testimony. It is the most biased, prejudiced testimony I have ever heard given by any Government official or any other self-respecting man at a witness stand in this Senate or in the House, and I have been 26 years sitting in these hearings.

Senator TAFT. Apparently anybody except the Members of the Senate, and perhaps those, who defend the Taft-Hartley law or try to enforce it or interpret it fairly is indicted as a criminal and a generally undesirable person.

Senator NEELY. No, Senator, I want to except to that statement. I think there are a great many people who are in favor of it, who are defending it. I think some of them defended it in a temperate manner. I do not think this witness has. I think he is the most biased man I have ever heard testify in any sort of a legal or semilegal or social or political investigation.

Go ahead, Mr. Randolph.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I want to reiterate that the collective bargaining policy has stated categorically: "There should not be and will not be any attempt on the part of the international or subordinate unions to violate any valid provisions of this law or of any law, Federal or State."

Now whether or not we violated the law, certainly could only be stated after we had been tried and found guilty of violating the law. One of the unfortunate things about the Taft-Hartley law is that it gives to the general counsel the authority to proceed on his interpretation of what the law means, and in that procedure hamstring any local union for a sufficiently long period of time that the union can be completely destroyed.

We do not believe, did not believe at that time, that the general counsel was right in his attitude of hostility without having first heard the facts concerning it, or at least consulted us about the facts, and at least found some opportunity to really see what the other side had to say about it.

Senator PEPPER. I think the quotation I was trying to recall awhile ago was the process is to inquire before condemning and rendering judgment through due process of law.

Senator TAFT. May I not ask whether the Baltimore case had not been already instituted at that time?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Not to my knowledge, Senator.

Senator TAFT. It was not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. As I recall it——

Mr. KAISER. October 6 was the Baltimore case.

Senator TAFT. What was the date of the speech?

Mr. KAISER. The date of Shroyer's speech was before then, I know that. I do not recall the date of Mr. Denham's speech.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Now the unfortunate part about this law is that so many people get so many things out of it. I attended a conference of some 75 or 80 lawyers in Washington, D. C., here, labor lawyers who were going to have to represent unions about this law, and I explained our situation and the opinion of that group was that we were absolutely legally right.

That was before our convention and then after discussing this matter with Judge Martin, who was with us at the convention and helped us draw up this policy within the law as he saw it, we found this Government hostility against us, and we then decided that if this thing was going to be a matter that was going to be kicked around in Washington, we wanted some Washington lawyers, so we hired a couple more. We have had three lawyers for all this time when before we never had to have any.

We could pursue our collective bargaining and friendship with honor and arrive at satisfactory conclusions, and have done so for a great many years, but now instead of having some 1,200 contracts, we had less than 100, and the major portion of employers are fully content to go along with a satisfactory increase in wages, while all of these numerous lawyers and trials and what not go on. They are interested in running a printing business or a publishing business, and they are not interested in all the refinements of technical torture that can be applied to us.

The unfortunate part is that here are some representatives of associations of employers taking it upon themselves to refine these tools of torture to be used as they desire for any employers throughout the country.

Naturally the employers are waiting to see if they are going to get any such tools, all the time knowing the character of the International Typographical Union and its members, all the time having not the slightest idea that they can destroy that book of laws by any law whatsoever, and that the members of the organization will remain intact as they have remained intact in Chicago for some 16 months or more on strike against this law, not 16 months, but since November 1947.

Senator TAFT. Strike against the law? I am glad to have you state that frankly, because that is what it is, of course. How can any enforcement officer possibly condone a strike against the law? That is what I would like to know.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Senator, I will be glad to tell you.

Senator TAFT. I mean you said, and you mean, I assume, that it is a strike against the law.

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, no, no.

Senator TAFT. You said so.

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; that is not the purpose of my statement, and if it can be so interpreted I want to correct it.

The strike in Chicago was for a wage rate only, and every day since that strike has been in effect the publishers have known that the members of the union would return to work if they paid a fair rate of wages, and no other condition attached to that rate of wages.

Senator TAFT. That was not according to my information, but I have not checked up. You may be right.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is a fact, Senator, and the reason why we could not get a fair rate of wages was because the Chicago newspaper employers took the position that they would not grant a fair rate of wages until the union signed a contract to their liking which would make it possible to destroy our organization.

Senator TAFT. No, until the union signed a contract in accordance with the law, I think, Mr. Randolph.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That may be your opinion, and it may be the publishers' opinion, if they are honest, but let me call to your attention, Senator, that you are not permitted to be authoritative with regard to interpretations of that law. Neither are the Chicago publishers, and neither are we, and neither was the judge of the Federal court that enjoined us and found us in contempt of that injunction.

Neither was he permitted to determine whether or not we violated the law, and not until the National Labor Relations Board—God knows when they ever will, not until they do—make an interpretation, will any court of authority say that we violated the law.

Senator TAFT. But still you say it was a strike against the law.

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; it was not a strike against the law.

Senator TAFT. You take back what you said then. Is that right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. If what I said can be so interpreted——

Senator TAFT. You said so in so many words, a strike against the law for 16 months. That is what you said, Mr. Randolph.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I correct that statement.

Senator TAFT. I am afraid you meant it. It seems to me perfectly clear that is what it is.

Mr. RANDOLPH. If so, I correct it. The point is that we struck for wages in Chicago, and the point is that every day since that strike the men would have returned to work had they paid that rate of wages.

That is sufficient, I think, to answer your point, and I say further that your interpretation and the Chicago employers' interpretation, or our own, has to proceed along legal lines to the tribunal set up by the law to render a decision, and the Lord knows when they will ever render one, and in the meantime the general counsel's interpretation is accepted by the court because the court only has to decide that he is satisfied that there is a probable violation of it, and thereupon gives the Government an injunction against us in sweeping terms that makes it almost impossible for us to do anything without fear of being found in contempt of court. When we were, the ridiculous basis upon which we were found in contempt of court is self-condemnatory. I do not have to say anything about it.

Senator DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator.

Senator DOUGLAS. May I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Senator DOUGLAS. If I may get behind some of the recent discussion, is it not true that prior to the Taft-Hartley law you had satisfactory collective agreements with the Chicago newspaper publishers?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We did.

Senator DOUGLAS. And is it not true that prior to the Taft-Hartley law there was no objection on the part of the publishers to the so-called closed shop?

Mr. RANDOLPH. There was never any objection to that.

Senator DOUGLAS. Is it not also true that upon the passage of the Taft-Hartley law which forbade employers and employees from agreeing to the closed shop, that the publishers felt that that law tied their hands and that they were unable to continue such an agreement?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Many employers felt——

Senator DOUGLAS. That is, the newspaper publishers.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, and the commercial employers also, and, Senator, we have never, since the Taft-Hartley law was in effect, asked an employer to sign a closed-shop agreement, never.

Senator DOUGLAS. Well, what I am trying to get at is this: Is it not true that the publishers, with the best will in the world on their side, felt that the Taft-Hartley law prevented them from making the contractual arrangement which had prevailed in the past?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is true, Senator.

Senator DOUGLAS. And if it had not been for the passage of the Taft-Hartley law, in all probability you would have been able to renew the contract and to have had peaceful relations.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is undoubtedly so.

Senator DOUGLAS. So that in your case this clause and certain other clauses in the Taft-Hartley law, instead of leading to industrial peace, helped to precipitate this very costly and vexatious strike?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is true.

Senator DOUGLAS. Thank you.

Mr. RANDOLPH. With regard to the closed-shop question, the Chicago publishers themselves are on record at a hearing held in Chicago by a subcommittee of the watch-dog committee, as it is called, for the very purpose of finding out about the Chicago strike.

Now as Senators I call that to your attention. Here was Chairman Hartley appointing a subcommittee to come to Chicago and investigate the Chicago newspaper strike. Well, maybe it was the House committee. I stand corrected.

Senator TAFT. It was the House committee, not the joint committee.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am sorry.

Senator TAFT. I personally would not have approved of it. I fully agree with you.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, if possible Mr. Hartley is a little bit more convinced against the Typographical Union than Senator Taft, so that when he appointed a subcommittee to visit Chicago, calling witnesses, one of which was myself, and examine into the causes and the operation of the Chicago strike, when he did that, and after that committee meeting, nothing happened, you ought to be pretty sure that there was nothing illegal about the Chicago strike.

Senator NEELY. What were the circumstances of that case now? Had there ever been any final determination of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. RANDOLPH. There has not even been a decision by the National Labor Relations Board upon these facts. As regards the closed shop, the secretary of the Chicago Publishers' Association testified in that subcommittee hearing, and it is set out on page 4 of the pamphlet attached to our statement, where he is questioned by Congressman Kersten, a half dozen lines. I would like to read it.

"Congressman KERSTEN. Up until now and for a great many years past you had a closed-shop agreement, didn't you?

"Mr. O'KEEFE. Yes, we did.

"Mr. KERSTEN. How did that feature work out in your previous contracts so far as your closed-shop provision of the contract was concerned?

"Mr. O'KEEFE. We never even discussed it. It had been there for years and it has remained there.

"Mr. KERSTEN. Did you have any real difficulty with it so far as your union, ITU, is concerned?

"Mr. O'KEEFE. We did not. As a matter of fact most of the Chicago publishers, or all of the Chicago publishers I would say, would prefer to continue a closed shop if it were legal.

"Mr. KERSTEN. The reason for that is that this particular union has been a long-term institution that has a certain amount of tradition behind it, a considerable amount, and it is a responsible union, and under those conditions a closed shop has worked out so far as the Chicago publishers are concerned. Is that right?

"Mr. O'KEEFE. Yes, it has."

Senator NEELY. Mr. Randolph, in your direct statement I understood you to say that in effect your union had established a floor under the relationship between the employers and the employees and maintenance of that floor. Did the employers cooperate with your union prior to the enactment of the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Oh, yes, they not only cooperated but they insisted that the union floor be enforced by the union in shops that are not members of the association, both newspaper and commercial, and that is the policy all over the country.

Senator NEELY. As I understand it, that cooperation so far as the persons to whom you have referred has been withdrawn, since the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, has been withdrawn that is, those who are involved in this litigation. I say the continuation so far as the employers are concerned has ceased since the Taft-Hartley law was passed.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, no, in the commercial field——

Senator NEELY. No, I say as between your union and those who are prosecuting this case, does that cooperation still exist?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, we are on strike in Chicago.

Senator NEELY. That is what I thought.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Senator NEELY. Then the cooperation has not continued so far as the litigants are concerned since the Taft-Hartley law was passed?

Mr. RANDOLPH. In the newspaper field, no.

Senator NEELY. That is all.

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Pepper.

Senator TAFT. Is this on Senator Neely's time?

Senator NEELY. I have finished.

Senator PEPPER. Has any time been fixed?

Senator TAFT. No, but I thought——

Senator PEPPER. He had concluded, and I was going to——

Senator TAFT. I am not the next?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Neely took Senator Murray's place. Senator Neely was the first one called. It ought to come over to this side.

Senator Taft.

Senator PEPPER. Very well.

Senator TAFT. Mr. Randolph, first with regard to the question of all this litigation, I do not want to go into litigation, but is it not a correct statement to say that if the union had been willing to sign a contract eliminating the closed shop, all other controversies would have been settled?

I mean was not this strike really brought about by the union's position that they would not sign a contract containing the closed-shop provision, I mean unless it contained the closed-shop provision.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is not true at all. That is just not so.

Senator TAFT. Is not that the substance of it?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, it is not.

Senator TAFT. I do not want to press it, but it seems to me so clear that if you had accepted the terms of the union shop, come to Congress for an amendment of it, there would have been no such strike as you had.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is not so, Senator, because we have on record many contracts without the closed shop in it, and within the law as has been determined by employers' lawyers. Your assumption is entirely wrong. The contracts have proven it.

The contract in New York in the commercial field contained provisions that the lawyers for the Commercial Employers Association drew up. We did not draw them up.

They stated to us that if we were willing to sign a contract within the law, that they would give us all the protection that the law permitted them to give. We asked them to put it down in writing and they did, and what they drew up by way of union protection was accepted by us as the maximum we could get under the Taft-Hartley law, and the local unions signed that contract with our approval. The same was done in the newspaper field in New York City.

After a period of time the same kind of an agreement was worked out with the newspaper publishers in New York City, and neither of those nor any other of the contracts, perhaps numbering 75 to 100 that we have approved, have any reference whatever to the closed shop.

Senator TAFT. But you take the other printing unions, the International Printing Pressmen, the Brotherhood of Bookbinders Union, and three or four others have not had the difficulty you have had. Did not they accept the union shop? Did not they agree to operate under the union-shop agreements of Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I cannot testify on what they have done.

Senator TAFT. Well, is it not the only reason that you have had this peculiar difficulty the fact that you have in fact struck against this provision of the law on closed shop, regardless of its merits? I mean I am not saying you did not have a right to, but I am only trying to bring out the fact, the extent you have had difficulty has been your determination that you would not agree to a contract unless it practically included the closed-shop provision.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is not true at all, and I think if you would read either the contract of the New York commercial printers or the New York publishers or the contract of the Detroit, Chicago, or Philadelphia commercial employers, you would find that that was not so.

Senator TAFT. What did you mean when you said "It will be our policy to refrain from signing contracts in order that we avoid agreeing or seeming to agree or voluntarily accepting conditions created by such relationship under the Labor Management Relations Act"? Did that mean you would not sign a contract?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Senator, there are, as I stated before, opportunities of the employer, if he sees fit to use them, that would destroy the organization if we signed a contract for economic purposes only or with some loose clause whereby they stated "These are the conditions of work, except as may be provided in the Taft-Hartley law." That is a wide-open door to kill us off at their desire.

Senator TAFT. Did you not over and over again refuse to sign contracts and state that you would post conditions of employment, and if the employer wanted you to work, he would agree with those conditions of employment? Was that not done in many shops and newspapers throughout the country?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, that was not so, Senator. You have been listening to propaganda. The fact of the matter is that after our convention and after this exhibition of hostility by the Government to a practice we had followed all of our lives, I say we hired a couple more lawyers and listened to their advice on the matter.

They agreed with our position, but they pointed out some of the various interpretations put on the Wagner Act through the years about the matter of bargaining in good faith and what that all meant. They advised us that we could offer a contract which would give us the maximum protection of the law, and our procedure in litigation would be less hazardous, so we devised a contract, with their help, that we offered to the employers and which was offered to the commercial employers in Baltimore, the first case against us, the first charges brought against us, the first complaint issued and the first hearing held.

We had offered, the local union, the bargaining agent had offered to the Baltimore employers a contract drawn up under advice of the ITU and its attorneys as being a contract which would afford them protection even under the Taft-Hartley law, that is as much protection as could be had, and preserve the union. Therefore from October 1, 1947, the International Typographical Union would have approved and did approve any contract that carried with it all that we considered to be the maximum of protection that we could get under the Taft-Hartley law. The delay in the acceptance of contracts by employers was caused by the knowledge that the Government was helping the employers to hold out against giving us that maximum protection under that law.

Senator TAFT. Mr. Randolph, the court found, I do not know whether you agree with these facts:

"Since August 22, 1947, the executive council has construed, interpreted it and forced this policy"—the general policy declared before it—"by ordering, instructing, directing, and requiring the approximately 850 subordinate local unions of the ITU alternately to refrain from entering into any contract or to refuse to enter into any contract not terminable upon 60 days' notice contrary to the custom and practice theretofore prevailing in the industry which did not contain substantially the provisions of the form P–6–A"—what is P–6–A that is referred to here?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, P–6–A is simply the form number of a form contract that was set out by the officers of the international union as advice to local unions as to what was legal under the Taft-Hartley law, and what they could collectively bargain for.

Senator TAFT. Do you agree that the facts that I read were correct, roughly speaking?

Mr. RANDOLPH. They are not facts and seldom are the full facts obtained from the bulletin of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association from which you are reading.

Senator TAFT. I am reading from the opinion of Judge Swygert, the United States District Court for the Southern District of Indiana.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Whatever Judge Swygert wrote in his opinion, is in his opinion.

Senator TAFT. Well, I know. I asked you whether those facts were agreed to, that far. I am going to come to one I know you will agree to, but I wondered if that far was correct.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Again I do not want to litigate the cases, nor do I want to refer to anything that the worthy judge has found to be a fact.

We have our own opinions about it and if we had had the opportunity, and could have made a practical and effective appeal from his decision, we, of course, would have done so.

Now his interpretation as to whether or not our acts were in violation of the sweeping decision that he rendered in his injunction case, caused him to write up what he considered to be the facts.

Senator TAFT. I read further from this:

"The provisions of this form"—I'-6-A—"including the 60-day termination clause and the statements and the conducts of respondents indicates that its purpose was to give a semblance of good faith to collective bargaining on behalf of subordinate bargaining unions proposing this form to employers while at the same time imposing closed-shop conditions upon those employers who signed such forms or alternately requiring employers to submit to conditions of employment unilaterally imposed by the subordinate local unions in line with the no-contract of the ITU, which conditions of employment unequivocably required the employer to maintain a closed shop."

Would you agree with that statement?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Not in the least, Senator, not in the least. Just let me call your attention to the fact that the collective-bargaining policy itself provides as follows. Bear in mind, Senator, that the unilateral action referred to came after a period of 60 days of bargaining without results, and the local unions had a right, and I still say they have a right, to provide their own wages and conditions if they cannot arrange them through collective bargaining in 60 days. The employers undoubtedly have that right and have been exercising it.

If they cannot agree in 60 days, they put up their own conditions, "You can work or get out," but the collective-bargaining policy stated: "We realize this policy may bring some disappointment to our employers because it provides for unilateral action. It may be possible for those employers—"

Senator TAFT. You mean the collective-bargaining policy?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Let me finish the quotation, Senator. Do not interrupt to destroy it, because it is an important point.

Senator TAFT. Where are you reading from?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Page 102, section 1, the next to the last paragraph of the collective-bargaining policy.

"We realize this policy may bring some disappointment to our employers because it provides for unilateral action. It may be possible for those employers who do not approve the policy to prepare unilaterally a set of conditions of employment that would be satisfactory."

It was not anything but the conclusion of what must be done after 60 days of compulsory collective bargaining under the Taft-Hartley law, and if the employer has the right after complying with the provisions of the law and bargaining for 60 days, to fix the wages and working conditions as he sees fit, I say the union has likewise that authority, and I say we have it without recourse to any law.

We have exercised it for a hundred years, and I say that nothing in the law can take away from a union the right to prescribe the conditions under which its members will work.

Senator TAFT. Well, my only point—I am not questioning that, Mr. Randolph. I am only trying to make the point that except for your refusal to comply with the law, there would have been no strikes as there were no strikes in the other printing industries, the other industries dealing with the same employers.

Mr. RANDOLPH. We have never refused to comply with the law. We have refused to accept your interpretation of the law. We have refused to accept Mr. Denham's interpretation of the law, and we have a perfect right under the procedure of law to go forward under the various steps that lead to a decision.

Senator TAFT. Surely, that is right. You have refused to accept the decision of the United States district court.

Mr. RANDOLPH. We have accepted and complied with it implicitly.

Senator TAFT. Well, but you do not agree with the findings of the court as to what you have done.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Why of course we do not agree with the findings of the court, and you as a lawyer, if you did not agree with the findings of a court, would advise your clients to appeal to the highest court in the land to have that act properly interpreted, whatever it might be.

Senator TAFT. That is right.

Mr. RANDOLPH. This case or any other.

Senator TAFT. You are a lawyer yourself, are you not, Mr. Randolph?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, that is debatable, Senator.

Senator TAFT. The general evidence put in here by the Secretary of Labor as to the number of strikes shows that the number of strikes in 16 months, the number of workers engaged or affected, the number of man-days lost in 16 months before the Taft-Hartley law was 7½ million man-days. In the 18 months after, 2½ million man-days; in other words, a reduction of about one-third the previous condition. That is just the opposite, I take it, from the experience of the International Typographical Union, is it not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, I am always at a loss when you start to read figures, Senator.

Senator TAFT. Well, I mean that in general the number of people involved is about one-third in the 18 months' period after as in the 16 months' period before, and I am asking you whether the opposite was not the fact in the case of the International Typographical Union.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is hard for me to follow, but I will say this: That we have had more people on the street because of strikes under the Taft-Hartley law than we had for many a year before, running back clear to 1921.

Senator TAFT. And is not that because you were striking against the law and other unions throughout the country did not strike against the law?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, Senator, that is not a fact, and I will give you a fact that will disprove your idea on that if you are open to a fact. I will point out to you our experience with the New York employing printers in the commercial field.

The local union had bargained for months on trying to arrive at a settlement and was unable to, and under our laws when a local union requests authority to strike they have to request that authority from the international executive council, and the president has to in person or by proxy investigate the cause of the dispute and report to the executive council before any strike sanction is given. In that capacity I went to New York and discussed with the New York commercial employing printers the basis of a contract.

I spent 1 week at that, at the conclusion of which we had arrived at a point where the international union would approve a contract for the operation of this commercial printing industry in that city.

Everything was settled except the matter of hours and wages. Mind you, all of these so-called Taft-Hartley difficulties were resolved at the conclusion of a week's negotiation, except wages and hours.

The union adopted that group of contract provisions with the exception of wages and hours as their proposal in collective bargaining. On the same day the employers association adopted the same as their proposal for a contract except for wages and hours, and during that week the employers in that city had unilaterally posted notices that the workweek would be increased 3¾ hours, and our men were being paid on that unilaterally determined amount of hours per week, so that when the union adopted the proposal approved by the international union except wages and hours it was doing it under the handicap of having maintained themselves at work under a unilateral increase in hours by the employers.

The result was that the international union approved strike sanction in the city of New York on that very same day and a strike for hour and wages ensued for a period of 2 weeks and 2 days, when the employers agreed that they would revert to the proper workweek and they would continue to negotiate on the matter of wages and hours, which in a few weeks was settled to the satisfaction of both sides.

That is a complete disproval of the idea that there was any strike for the simple matter of striking against the act. That is a comple disproval of it as all the other strikes we have engaged in are similar proof of that particular fact.

Senator TAFT. Well, it seems to me your own testimony, your own statements, the findings of the court all support the general statement that this was a strike against the law and brought on by yourself, but you have a perfect right to do it. I am only trying to answer this charge that the officials of the Government who try to enforce the law are subject to some criticism for trying to do so. That is my principal interest in that.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, I am afraid, Senator, you are looking at it through a jaundiced eye.

Senator TAFT. Mr. Randolph, coming to the question of whether the closed shop provision should be in the contracts——

Mr. RANDOLPH. Sir?

Senator TAFT. Coming to the question whether the closed-shop provision should be in the law, that is really the question which this committee is primarily concerned with, and your testimony in general is in favor of that closed-shop provision. Do you think it should be permitted?

Mr. RANDOLPH. By all means, Senator.

Senator TAFT. And you are not satisfied with the union-shop provision?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; I am not at all satisfied with the so-called union-shop provision.

Senator TAFT. You heard the testimony last night that 17 States have adopted a similar law outlawing closed shops. You think they are wrong. You think that is the wrong policy.

Mr. RANDOLPH. There is not any question about it.

Senator TAFT. Have you had a contest in any of those States on those clauses?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not recall that we have engaged in any litigation in the States; no. There may have been some. Some local unions may have done it, but if it has come to my attention I do not remember it.

Senator TAFT. The printers' trade, Mr. Dunnagan testified here—Mr. Henry, I guess, is the testimony that I was referring to:

Some of the unions still reserve the right to impose working conditions unilaterally.

"For example, the general laws of the International Typographical Union fix the ratio of apprentices to journeymen, set overtime rates, lay down rigid rules for hiring, discharging, provide for a closed shop, define standards with respect to seniority, and establish rules of conduct. The foremen must be members of the union. Although all of these matters are of vital importance to us—that is, the employers—none of them are bargainable or even subject to arbitration. In other words, such union laws have been constantly narrowing the area of bargaining by preventing employers and locals in their negotiations from arriving at any agreement unless the employer is willing to agree to all the miscellaneous rules of the international."

Is that a fair charge against the international or the ITU?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I doubt that it is a fair charge, as you say, in view of my earlier testimony as to the content of our book of laws, and the fact that we have established the general laws of the ITU affecting economic conditions as a floor for collective bargaining.

It is true that they are not subject to arbitration nor will we concede any one of the provisions mentioned in that book of laws, in the general laws affecting the Nation-wide conduct of our members.

Mr. Henry has not been operating a union shop long enough to absorb much of that tradition.

Senator TAFT. I am trying to get this question of what we should do. I mean, I am quite prepared to consider a modification of the rule about the union shop if we can get the same protection that I think is necessary for people who want to go to work, but it is true that these laws provide, section 2, article III:

"No local union shall sign a contract guaranteeing its members to work for any proprietor, firm, or corporation unless such contract is in accordance with international law and policy and approved as such by the international president."

Is that correct?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right, that means approved as in compliance with the international law.

Senator TAFT. Yes. I mean you have the job of interpreting the international law.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Senator TAFT. You do not assume further power to just arbitrarily disapprove a contract?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Not at all. The international executive council interprets the law of the union. I suppose in examining the contracts that come in, that duty is performed by myself or someone to whom I delegate the work, and if the contract or the proposal for a contract is in accord with the law, we can only approve it as being in compliance with the law, not as to the sufficiency.

Senator TAFT. What happens to the local union if it signs a contract anyway and it is not in accord with the international law?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, nothing so far has happened to any union. The book of laws has always provided that the executive council might take up the charter for any violation of the law on the part of the local union, but so far as I know the matter of discipline has not yet been exercised. We do have authority to exercise it if we find it necessary.

Senator TAFT. Now if the employer just will not agree to one of these laws incorporated by reference in the contract, then what happens?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, he does not get a contract.

Senator TAFT. Does that mean a strike then?

Mr. RANDOLPH. It might or might not. The condition may be satisfactory as to operation, but he may not want to agree to it in the contract.

Senaor TAFT. Supposing he will not agree to it in substance at all, supposing he will not agree to it informally, formally, or any other way?

Mr. RANDOLPH. If it is operative in the composing room and there is no violation of that, we do not strike.

Senator TAFT. Well, I know, but suppose there is a violation, suppose he says, "Here is one of those rules I think is unreasonable. I will not agree to it. I will not carry it out." Then what happens?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, the question of what the local union wants to do about it is discussed by the local union. If they want to strike about it, they have got to get a three-fourths vote and they have to get sanction of the executive council of the ITU on whether or not they can strike.

Senator TAFT. Well, if they do not strike or if they submit to the employer's refusal to do this, then they are subject to ejection from the international, I suppose?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, if they are too far offside, but printers do not get too far offside. They will test things a little bit, you know, strain your patience, but they do not get too far offside.

Senator TAFT. How many union printers are there altogether, how many members in your union?

Mr. RANDOLPH. About 89,000.

Senator TAFT. And how many nonunion printers would you say there were?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not know, Senator.

Senator TAFT. Can you guess? I just want to get a general idea.

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; I really do not know.

Senator TAFT. I mean, what proportion of printers are organized?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That I do not know.

Senator TAFT. You have no means of telling?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, sir.

Senator TAFT. In some cities it is practicalyy complete? Practically all of the printers belong to the union?

Mr. RANDOLPH. A few.

Senator TAFT. That was the testimony here that in some cities they were highly organized and in others they were not.

Mr. RANDOLPH. There may not be over a dozen in a city or in a town and they may be all organized, but in the larger centers there are quite a few nonunion shops.

Senator TAFT. Are you trying to extend the union shop?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Oh, certainly; we are always trying to organize the printers, any employees in our field, but not the union shop as you refer to it; the "union shop" of the Taft-Hartley law.

Senator TAFT. That is, the essence of your interest results in your control over the admission to the union and to the printing trades where you operate over everybody under the rules of the union; is that right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, we admit freely those whom we regard competent enough and of good character. We admit them if they meet those qualifications.

Senator TAFT. Now let me read you some of these laws, because I think it is important to this whole question of the closed shop to know what the practice is. Section 1, article I:

"Apprentices shall not be less than 16 years of age at the time of beginning their apprenticeship. They will be listed by the secretary of the subordinate union and they shall serve an apprenticeship period of 6 years before being admitted to journeyman membership in the union."

That rule, I think, there is some provision for some advancement, perhaps.

"An apprentice may be upgraded when he has shown he has applied himself sufficiently to his studies to warrant advancement."

That requires, ordinarily, however, 6 years' apprenticeship, is that it, before any man can ever become a member of the union?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes; for membership in the union, except for apprentices who are proficient enough in their work and in their grades, in their course of lessons in printing, to be upgraded, and they may be so upgraded and obtain journeyman status earlier.

Senator TAFT. I notice under section 9:

"Apprentice members shall not have the privilege of voting."

So for 6 years these men are in the printing trade controlled by the union without any privilege of voting. Is that right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, for the first year after they are hired by the employer they have no union status at all.

The beginning of the second year they may be accepted into apprentice membership. If it were not for the Taft-Hartley law, they would have to be accepted into apprenticeship membership, and then they only——

Senator TAFT. Apprentice members shall not have the privilege of voting. That is the privilege of the——

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes; but neither do they pay all dues. They only pay a per capita tax. It takes care of the record-keeping, Union Printers' Home dues, and so on.

Senator TAFT. So in this democratic set-up still there are thousands of men who are not entitled to vote.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Oh, it is not a matter of depriving people of the right to vote who are entitled to it. Apprentices never have been accorded the rights of journeymen. They are learning the trade, and it is the same thing as people under 21 who do not vote in this country.

You are depriving millions of young fellows of the same age as our apprentices from voting in civil elections.

Senator TAFT. Your apprentices may be a good deal over 21.

Mr. RANDOLPH. They may be.

Senator TAFT. Practically all the veterans are over 21, I assume.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is a regulation that has stood the test of many, many years.

Senator TAFT. You limit by section 21:

"Local unions are required to fix the ratio of apprentices to the number of journeymen regularly employed in any and all offices, but it must be provided that at least two members of the subordinate union, aside from the proprietor, shall be regularly employed before an office is entitled to an apprentice.

"For each additional 5 journeymen regularly employed, an additional apprentice may be permitted: Provided, when four apprentices are employed, an additional apprentice for each 10 additional journeymen may be employed: Provided, further, nothing in this section shall be construed as prohibiting any subordinate union from inserting in the contract a provision that the total number of apprentices of any office shall be less than 4."

They cannot make it more than four, can they? They cannot change the limitations that you have imposed on the number of apprentices?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, as I stated before, the provisions here are the floor of bargaining, and the limitations on the number of apprentices as compared with journeymen up until the war were ample so as to provide a sufficient number of journeymen for the trade. Our records indicate there was something like 8 percent of our members constantly working at less than full time, so that these regulations as to a floor for bargaining on apprentices have been proven over the years to be more than fair. It is simply for the purpose of not flooding the industry with more people than the industry can absorb.

Senator TAFT. Well, other industries are not limited that way. If every industry did that, we would have millions of people unemployed, would we not, Mr. Randolph?

Mr. RANDOLPH. You have them anyway. If the industry does not supply jobs, you have them anyway.

Senator TAFT. I am suggesting that this same thing, however it may have worked in the printing industry, if applied to every industry in the United States, would hold down the number of people and limit the right of people to go into the particular occupation they want to go into, to such an extent that it might seriously, it might force a large amount of unemployment, might it not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; I cannot see that effect, because the unemployment will create a lack of jobs anyway or a lack of jobs creates unemployment anyway, no matter whether they are union, open shop, closed shop, or any other shop. If there are no jobs, the men are unemployed.

Senator TAFT. Let me read you this. I daresay it comes from a prejudiced side. I think it is from Editor and Publisher.

"PRINTER SHORTAGE

"A survey by the Pennsylvania Newspaper Publishers' Association reveals an appalling shortage of manpower in the composing rooms of that State. It is probably duplicated in other States.

"One hundred and twenty-nine dailies reported a need of 180 additional journeymen printers to man their composing rooms adequately and without overtime payments. The weekly newspapers reported a need for another 100 printers.

"This shortage of printers would be bad enough if publishers could see an end to it sometime in the future. But according to the PNPA survey, there will never be sufficient manpower under the present apprenticeship program.

"There are about 250 aprentices in the daily shops. Under the 6-year training program about 40 become journeymen every year. The survey reveals an average age of 47 among journeymen and actuarial death rates show more than 40 leaving employment every year. In other words, the supply of printers is not keeping up to the demand."

Is that a fact or do you dispute that?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, without agreeing that it is a fact, I would say that the figures themselves defeat the accusation that is made. Here they describe 129 shops and they need 180 men. That is less than a man and half per shop, and the requirement sought is enough men to work without overtime, and that is something that is entirely unreasonable when business is brisk and overtime is worked throughout the country generally. We have never undertaken to supply sufficient men so that there would be a journeyman available at any time the employer wanted him for a day's work. That would be wholly unreasonable and supply a surplus of printers that would be a drag on the market.

Senator TAFT. So the union assumes to say how many printers are needed and how many printers are not needed under this policy, do they not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; it does no such thing.

Senator TAFT. You are not saying for various reasons you think there should not be any more printers?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; not at all.

Senator TAFT. Is not that right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Not at all, Senator. This deals only with the matter of apprentices and has nothing to do with the number of men admitted to the union every year who have not been apprentices in the Typographical Union, men who have learned the trade in nonunion offices. There are many of those added to our rolls, but the information published in Editor and Publisher is always warped and if it is not warped when they get it, they will warp it before they publish it.

Senator TAFT. Mr. Randolph, you said that your time now on the average through the country as a whole was 37½ hours. That is straight time, is it not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, sir.

Senator TAFT. Would you tell us how many hours have actually been worked on an average by printers in the United States in 1948?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I cannot tell you the details of that kind, but I can point out that we collect a percentage of wages that goes to our pension and mortuary funds and that total amount of money that we collect, figured on a percentage basis as compared with how much the money would be if everybody was working full time at the scales of the various unions, indicates that they have been in the past few years working as much as 5 percent over full-time wage rates.

This is not too excessive. Now some places obviously with an excess of work will work more overtime than that.

Senator TAFT. While you exclude people who want to be apprentices from entering the industry, the man in the industry on the average works, we will say, 2½, something like 2 hours overtime on an average throughout the United States. Is that right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, I would not say how many hours. I am giving you the only source of information we have, and it is on a dollars-and-cents basis. We do not presume to keep track of all of the internal affairs of the shops. We cannot do that, you know.

Senator TAFT. Are not these restrictions really imposed in order to keep people out of the trade so that those who are in get better pay? Is not that correct?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; that is a very unfair way of looking at it. We have always supplied a sufficient number of journeymen to man the industry through our apprentice training and through our organizational efforts, but we have not assumed to supply enough to give a man adequate supply of printers that would prevent the working of overtime.

That would be wholly unreasonable. Now it is our hope that the industry can operate profitably and on a balanced basis without too much unemployment, and that is the purpose of the ratio of apprentices to journeymen.

Over a great many years we have found out what that ratio is. We have provided for it as a floor to bargaining in our laws, and if we make a contract with any employer, it must be on that basis, and I say again that we have a perfect legal right to do so.

Senator TAFT. The effect of the closed shop is to give you the power—you may have the right, but the effect of the closed shop is to give you the power—to keep people out of the printing trades if you think, in your opinion, without review by anybody, that there are enough people in the trade.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not think that is a fair——

Senator TAFT. Is not that a necessary conclusion?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not think so, Senator.

Senator TAFT. Section 4:

"All persons before entering the trade as apprentices shall first be approved by the local union."

Now a young fellow thinks printing is a good thing. He wants to go into printing and he goes around and applies to the local union. How long a waiting list is there? What is the basis of deciding if A can be taken as an apprentice and B cannot be taken as an apprentice?

Mr. RANDOLPH. He does not apply to the local union, Senator.

Senator TAFT. "Shall first be approved." To whom does he apply?

Mr. RANDOLPH. He applies to the foreman of the composing room for a job the same as he would if there were no unions at all. The employer hires the apprentice in the first place, but he is subject to this point regulation, that is, it is almost a joint effort and not by the union, because if you read those laws you will find that the laws provide for a joint committee of employers and members of the local union to operate the apprentice regulations. Wherever the employers will do that, that is done. Where they will not, the union committee does it.

Senator TAFT. The international law which you say is binding and must be incorporated by reference says:

"All persons before entering the trade as apprentices shall first be approved by the local union. They must pass a technical examination given by the union's apprentice committee. A physical examination must also be made by a qualified medical examiner, approved by the local union. The medical and other examinations must show fitness and adaptability to the trade. The physical examination shall be entered on the medical certificate, printed on the reverse side of the application for apprentice membership which shall be filed and used as such at the beginning of the second year of apprenticeship as provided in section 7."

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is after the apprentice has worked for a year, and he has been hired by the employer. That regulates whether or no after a year's probation he is mentally and physically fit to continue in the printing business and learn the trade, bearing in mind, Senator, that it is the union that takes care of the people when they become incapacitated from age or disability and not the employers, who do nothing whatsoever to take care of the wreckage of the industry.

Senator TAFT. I am only trying to show that the actual conditions as are evidenced here, I notice that: "Every person admitted as an apprentice member of the local union at the beginning of the second year of apprenticeship shall subscribe to the following obligation: 'That I will at all times support the laws, regulations, and decisions of the International Typographical Union.'"

He cannot, apparently, question the decision of the International Typographical Union as you question the decisions of the United States district court. He has got to accept those provisions.

Mr. RANDOLPH. He certainly can. He can appeal to the duly constituted authorities in the union with regard to any decision that may be made affecting his interests.

Senator TAFT. The foremen in your industry are members of the union, are they not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right, and have been since time immemorial.

Senator, it may be interesting to you to know that we had the closed shop long before anybody ever talked about a closed shop, or a union shop, simply by the fact that the foreman employed union people and union people worked only for union foremen and you had a closed shop. Now that is the human right they have regardless of all the legislation you can imagine.

Senator PEPPER. Will the Senator yield?

Are the foremen members of the union or not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. They are and they always have been.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, has there been any change since the Taft-Hartley law on that?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, I do not know of any, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. In your union organization?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Of course under the Taft-Hartley law the employer can employ a nonunion man for any purpose. The requirement that he be a member of the union is the only requirement as regards the foreman. The employer can hire any member to be his foreman and he can fire him at any time he wants to without any contest on our part.

The CHAIRMAN. Has that become general or has anything like that been done very much?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not know of a single instance where an employer attempted to put in a nonunion foreman except shortly after Taft-Hartley was adopted a small plant out in Michigan somewhere, I believe, or Wisconsin, the employer hired a nonunion foreman. I think there were some eight or nine men involved in the shop, and the minute he did that eight or nine men left not only the shop but the city and went to work elsewhere, with no argument at all. They just packed up and left.

Now that is the only incident I recall where any nonunion foreman was employed.

Senator TAFT. Have you any idea about the waiting list? You say that the foreman decides whether Mr. A is taken as an apprentice or Mr. B who applies for the job.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The foreman makes that decision in the first instance.

Senator TAFT. And he is a member of the union?

Mr. RANDOLPH. And he is a member of the union.

Senator TAFT. Have you any idea how long this waiting list is?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I never heard of a waiting list.

Senator TAFT. You think if more people could get jobs, there would not be any?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, Senator——

Senator TAFT. There would not be any applications?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, Senator, here is a well-established union that has a good reputation, that has established better wages and conditions than most. Why would not a favorable position like that attract the attention of those who are trying to make a living?

Senator TAFT. I am assuming it would.

Mr. RANDOLPH. You are assuming it would. Well, now, how would that same question apply to some big institution that was not running under any union conditions at all? Is there a waiting list in those places? Are you concerned about whether those people get jobs or whether they do not in nonunion places, and when they do not, what do you do about it?

Senator TAFT. They take just as many people as they can employ. The publishers are prohibited from taking as many people as they want to employ and can employ. They are limited in their number very clearly.

I mean I am only trying to show the fact. They are limited in the number of apprentices they can take, wether they want more or do not want more, and they say they want more—the people who have testified here. That is all I know about it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, Senator, the fact of the matter is that the employers generally, in the contracts that they make with local unions, do not take advantage of training as many apprentices as our minimum conditions, or maximum conditions, in the law prescribe. They do not care to have that many apprentices around because it means the training of them, and it means that journeymen have to spend some of their time training apprentices and a lot of employers do not care to do that, and when you asked Mr. Dunnagan what the situation in Chicago was as regards apprentices, he was silent, and the emphasis on the employers in St. Louis agreeing to only two apprentices as a maximum in any shop indicates that they did not want any more than two in each shop rather than that the union was trying to restrict them unfairly to a small number of apprentices, and let me say to you that the situation in Chicago where Mr. Dunnagan operates a shop and where he should know how many apprentices he employs or can employ is simply that by contract they have agreed for a maximum of six in a shop except for two more that they can have by way of one as a machinist apprentice and one as a monotype apprentice, so he can have eight in his shop in the city of Chicago and have by agreement so arranged, while in St. Louis they have arranged for two. But why did Mr. Dunnagan or Mr. Henry mention a couple of instances where there was a very small number? Obviously to prejudice the situation.

Senator TAFT. Well, this Editor and Publisher, I agree, may be prejudiced, but I do suppose that they represent the position of the employing printers in Pennsylvania. That is a reasonable conclusion; even if it is wrong, even if they are wrong, still they must not have just made that on their own.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, when I have accused publishers of having their positions represented by Editor and Publisher—and I have done it a number of times—I have had the specific denial, especially in New York and Chicago, that Editor and Publisher represents their position; that they have no connection with it and they do not authorize it to print anything on their part, so they just volunteer to do this, perhaps for their own purposes.

Senator TAFT. I would like to have inserted here all of the general laws of the ITU as they appear in your 1949 laws. Just as an example of other laws which are, as I understand it, frozen, which nobody can get a contract with unless they agree to—section 11 of article III says, and these are only examples. I have just gone through them:

"Local unions must incorporate in contracts a provision that all composing room work appertaining to printing and the preparations therefor, shall be done by journeymen or apprentices, and must further provide for the elimination of all so-called miscellaneous or composing room helpers by agreement that as vacancies occur they shall be filled (if needed) by journeymen or apprentices."

That is section 11.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes.

Senator TAFT. Section 12 says:

"It is the unalterable policy of the International Typographical Union that all composing room work or any machinery or process appertaining to printing and the preparations therefor belongs to, and is under the jurisdiction of the International Typographical Union. Subordinate unions are hereby directed to reclaim jurisdiction over and control of all composing room work or any machinery or process appertaining to printing and the preparations thereof now being performed by nonmembers."

The employer must agree to that rule if he signs a contract at all; is that right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Senator TAFT. Has that produced any jurisdictional strikes with other unions?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Almost none. The fact of the matter is laws of that kind are adopted as presented to a convention after some local union has not been holding up its end in maintaining the trade or the craft, and has allowed some of our work to slip off to other so-called miscellaneous or partially trained people not members of the union, and that was simply to have a law on the books whereby if they do not do what they ought to do the ordinary disciplinary measures might be applied.

I know of none that has been applied to any such union, but there is no other way for any union to preserve itself than to prescribe the area over which its members will seek employment and maintain employment.

There is no other way of satisfactorily determining how a union will live unless it itself determines that area.

Senator TAFT. I do not object to the "unalterable policy." What I suggest is that to make every employer sign a contract that he agrees to every International law and, therefore agrees to this, necessarily may get him into serious trouble before he gets through with somebody else.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, it has not, Senator, and in the printing trades these lines of jurisdictions have been thoroughly well understood and, as a matter of fact, up until 1892, all of the printing trades workers were in the International Typographical Union.

At that time, the pressmen desired to have an international union of their own. They thought they had grown up to the point where they could function better as a union, and the International Typographical Union permitted them to withdraw and form an international organization. The relations have been friendly.

In 1894 the bookbinders did likewise. In 1903 the stereotypers did the same, and in 1906 the photoengravers did that so that the five internationals printing trade unions were once a part of the International Typographical Union, and there has not been over all of these years any cause for worry about the jurisdiction of the several unions in the printing trades.

Senator TAFT. Section 13 says:

"Subordinate unions shall incorporate in proposed contracts a clause providing for holiday with pay; annual vacations with pay; severance pay of not less than 2 weeks' pay for each year of priority in the office for all members affected by suspension or mergers; hospitalization and pay allowances for sickness or accident; and severance pay of 2 weeks' pay for each year of continuous priority for situation holders laid off to reduce the force."

Those features are practically removed from collective bargaining. They must be in every contract or the employer cannot get a contract; is that right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is absolutely not so, as the wording of the section you have just read indicates. It has been considered a matter of international policy that those are good things to bargain for, and the section refers to the inclusion in "proposed contracts" and local unions are directed to bargain for those things.

Senator TAFT. Those things are still open to bargaining?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Absolutely, and it so states in the law, to be in proposed contracts.

Senator TAFT. Section 14 states:

"Subordinate unions shall provide in proposed contracts that night work shall be paid for at not less than 10 percent over the day scale."

That is a different statute.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is another proposed contract provision that they should propose, propose these things, and try to accomplish them by collective bargaining.

Senator TAFT. But they can waive them? You think they have power?

Mr. RANDOLPH. All that means is that they must try to get them.

Senator TAFT. "Subordinate unions must include in contracts or commitments a provision that members may absent themselves from the shop during voting hours on primary and general election days without being subject to discipline."

Is that a general all-day holiday, or what is that?

Mr. RANDOLPH. What section is that?

Senator TAFT. Section 23. It is not very important. Section 23 provides that they may absent themselves from a shop during voting hours on primary and general election days.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, in some States it is compulsory.

Senator TAFT. That must be included in the contract.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes; in some States it is compulsory by law to have it.

Senator TAFT. I move, Mr. Chairman, that we recess until 2:30.

Senator PEPPER (presiding). So ordered.

(Whereupon, at 12:05 p. m., the committee adjourned, to reconvene at 2:30 p. m., of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION—2:35 P. M.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Taft will ask questions.

Senator TAFT. I have only a few more questions. Mr. Randloph, I just wanted to follow the examples of these rules and have your comments on them.

STATEMENT OF WOODRUFF RANDOLPH—Resumed

Mr. RANDOLPH. May I just, before you start, Chairman Thomas, say that during the noon recess I checked with my office to see if the newspaper accounts were available in my files with regard to Mr. Denham's speech and Mr. Shroyer's speech.

I find they are not there, but I do find that the bulletin of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association of September 23 or 26, 1947, page 933, does give Mr. Denham's speech, and editorializes with reference thereto, to the effect that his speech was definitely contrary to the policy of the ITU. That is the only documentary statement I am able to find in my files. But my opinion as to the attitude of both Mr. Shroyer and Mr. Denham was made up because of these two newspaper quotations which, of course, may not have been exact, and the bulletin of the ANPA in reference to Mr. Denham's speech.

I want to make that clear so that it cannot be stated that I misrepresented these gentlemen. I accepted an attitude on their part which I regard as hostile, and which I now believe history has proven to be the case.

Senator TAFT. The speeches will be put in the record in full, I take it. They will be furnished——

Chairman THOMAS. Yes.

Senator TAFT. They will be furnished and put into the record?

Chairman THOMAS. Yes.

Senator TAFT. Going back to the general laws, the international laws which are binding on local unions, Mr. Randolph, turning to article V, Foremen, section 1:

"In union shops the foreman is the only recognized authority. Assistants may be designated to direct the work, but only the foreman may employ and discharge. In filling vacancies the foreman shall be governed by the provisions of article X, general laws."

The foreman is a member of the union; is he not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Senator TAFT. Is this not more like the situation and on this subject that the employer has no voice whatever? He must agree that the foreman shall be the only recognized authority for firing and employing; is that correct?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes; but as the publisher's representative, of course.

Now, our laws, as is the case with civil laws, most of them were adopted because of some reason for their being adopted, and the idea of people getting their jobs, as we say, "through the pipe," is repugnant to history and the tradition of the International Typographical Union.

In other words, pressure of outside people, advertisers or various others through the office on the hiring of members of the union in a discriminatory manner no doubt brought about the adoption of this law.

Senator TAFT. I do not know about the adoption, but I want to point out that as far as I know there is no such provision in any union that I know of which tells the employer who can fire and who can employ.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, Senator Taft, there is no other union just like the International Typographical Union.

Senator TAFT. I agree. That is what I am trying to show.

Mr. RANDOLPH. We have gone through the whole alphabet of collective bargaining, whereas at least 12 out of 15,000,000 organized employees have only gone through the ABC's.

Senator TAFT. As far as you are concerned, you would be almost better off to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act and the Wagner Act and go back to the previous conditions, so far as the welfare of your union is concerned.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Senator Taft, if it came to the question of choosing, I would say that rather than tolerate the Taft-Hartley law we would rather have no labor law whatever.

Senator TAFT. I think that is a possibly reasonable solution, although I do not think it is practical, I am afraid.

The CHAIRMAN. I wonder if I may break in there, Senator Taft. I think in relation to the uniqueness in which your foremen work, the right to hire and fire, the right to fire is with the foreman also?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, then, who hires the foreman?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The employer.

The CHAIRMAN. The employer has that authority all by himself; is that right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the union try to influence the employer?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Not in the least.

The CHAIRMAN. The foreman has gained his job, then, both in the union and with his employer because of his ability to be a foreman; is that right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. And there has never been—are there any cases where foremen have been supplanted by unions or where there has been dissatisfaction showing that the dictation is from below, from the employer's standpoint, instead of from above?

Mr. RANDOLPH. In none at all, and the union never takes any part in the matter of selection of the foreman or anything else. The employer hires him and fires him at will. The union never protests a change of foremen.

The CHAIRMAN. How have you brought about that kind of discipline in the management of your labor organization?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The main thing we insist on, of course, is in having the foreman be a member of the union, to avoid the natural discrimination that will come from one who does not believe in your union or your objectives or your purposes, and the fact that we do require a member to know what he is doing in regard to the hiring or firing or judging of competency.

The CHAIRMAN. Also, you want a man to know what he is doing and the work he is doing as a result of the competence of the foreman.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Exactly so.

The CHAIRMAN. And the employer is the only judge of the competence of the foreman?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, it has been results that the employer is looking for, and if the employer is not getting results he can get another foreman, and that is of no concern to the union.

Senator TAFT. The foreman before the Taft-Hartley law had to be a member of the union, did he not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Senator TAFT. A part of the union-shop agreement. If he did have a hand in choosing the foreman he had to choose a union foreman?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes.

Senator TAFT. Do you know of any condition where the man who runs a shop is so tied that he himself cannot fire a man if he thinks that man is incompetent no matter what his foreman thinks?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The employer has to act through his agent, the foreman, and the foreman is the judge.

Senator TAFT. Because the international law says that that is so, but that is the only reason, is it not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, if you owned a print shop, and you told your foreman, a member of the union, and who by contract you have agreed shall have this authority to do something, such as firing a man, you would be violating your contract, as well.

Senator TAFT. I understand. I am not questioning the fact. I am only pointing out that it is an extraordinary thing for a union to assign that and an employer deprive himself of the power to fire a man for incompetence, but he must do it through a foreman who is a union member.

Mr. RANDOLPH. And yet for a hundred years it has been found very successful, and if it had not it would not have lasted 10 years, much less a hundred.

Senator TAFT. Of course, whether a thing is successful or not, it may have to be done.

Section 2 states:

"The foreman may discharge (1) for incompetency; (2) for neglect of duty; (3) for violation of office rules which shall be kept conspicuously posted, and which shall in no way abridge the civil rights of employees or their rights under accepted International Typographical Union laws. A discharged member shall have the right to appeal in accordance with the laws of the international union as provided in the contract."

To whom does he appeal under those laws? I have not followed it through.

Mr. RANDOLPH. There are two procedures for the handling of discharge cases: One is where the union, by contract, makes a provision that discharge cases will be handled by a joint arbitration agency, or if the union does not provide in its contract for such a method, then the matter is handled as it has historically been handled; namely, that the chapel will first pass on the justness or legality of his discharge, after which the foreman may appeal to the union and the man——

Senator TAFT. Who may appeal to the union?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The foreman.

Senator TAFT. The foreman.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The foreman who discharged him, and the man remains discharged until the union acts.

If the union orders him reinstated the foreman will have to reinstate him, pending an appeal to the executive council or perhaps to the convention. That is the historical method of handling discharges.

Senator TAFT. So, the union determines whether a man has been discharged or not in the last analysis, whether he can be properly discharged or not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Except at this time the big majority of the discharge cases are handled through the arbitration procedure set up in the contract.

Senator TAFT. That is a joint proceeding if that is undertaken?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right. It is a joint proceeding by arbitrators selected by whatever means they want to select them.

While I am on that point, I want to say that because you say these laws are being put in the record, I want to make it crystal clear that the contracts we have signed and the proposals that we have made since the Taft-Hartley Act has been in existence provide that these laws shall be applicable only to the extent they are not in violation of the Taft-Hartley law.

Senator TAFT. Mr. Randolph, I am not really questioning, at least at the present time, the validity of the laws. I am only trying to show that the closed shop has given the union a complete power over the matters which are ordinarily, even under collective bargaining agreements left to the discretion of the employer, and that this question of collective bargaining has practically disappeared; that there is very little that the employer can bargain about any more.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Oh, yes; there is.

Senator TAFT. Because the international union has imposed these rules upon him, and he must accept them or quit.

Mr. RANDOLPH. There is plenty to bargain about, Senator, and the fact that this is a skilled trade, and the fact that the laws are the result of an evolution of bargaining indicates that it has been successful.

It has not been onerous on the employers, and they have been satisfied to operate under them.

As we go along, and associations have secretaries seeking to make a record, and as the whole success of their enterprise depends on how much they get the union to change or give in, we find a lot more trouble than we had when we dealt with the employers directly, especially those who were practical men.

Now, we do not have unreasonable conditions, and our history shows that they have worked well. The degree of protection to our members that we have attained, and the justness of ouru decisions are matters historical in themselves.

Senator TAFT. Nevertheless, Mr. Randolph, it seems to me that the power, your power, may be exercised to the best and the most benevolent dictatorship, but it seems to me to be very clearly a dictatorship. That is the only point I want to make.

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, Senator Taft; the employer himself is a complete dictator unless he, by agreement, lets us share in the idea of who shall be hired and who shall be fired. Now, otherwise he is a complete dictator.

Senator TAFT. But you will not sign a contract with him unless he agrees to these international laws. If he wants a union shop, he cannot possibly—he cannot, and in some places that means perhaps he cannot run at all; he has to agree to this power of the union.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The fact of the matter is that if he does not want to operate under those laws and operate under union conditions as they have been in the past, history shows he has been able to operate nonunion.

We have never been able to stop anybody from operating, so it is not a question of a dictatorship at all. It is a question of the employer himself realizing the superior advantage of having union people, trained people, stable employment, and competent employees working for him rather than what he can hire on the open market, who do not belong to a union, and have not the social outlook that would convince them that they ought to belong to a union in order to further their interests as craftsmen.

Senator TAFT. This rule 7, section 7, article V, is what you just referred to:

"A member who believes he has been illegally or unjustly discharged shall have the right to appeal to the subordinate union in the manner provided by the laws of such subordinate union. If the subordinate union orders reinstatement the decision must be complied with until reversed. Either party may appeal to the executive council as provided herein."

In all that rule there is no mention of the employer, as far as I can see, having anything to say and you would hardly know, reading these rules, that there was an employer, as I read them.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, the employer has his representation through the foreman, and he has complete authority to hire the foreman, and bearing in mind the history of the organization, as I explained it to you this morning, the mere fact of the union's rendering a complete service so that the employer himself has nothing to worry about, as far as his composing room is concerned, is the background of these things.

The union is certainly interested in seeing that the members are not discharged unfairly; that so long as they do their work they are not subject to the whims of the employer through his foreman, who may discriminate on matters of religion, race, creed, politics, or anything else, if he has a free hand.

The union has most distinctly said to that employer, "You do not have a free hand in discharging our members. You shall discharge them for reasonable cause and for no other reason, and if you"——

Senator TAFT. That, Mr. Randolph, I do not object to, but the union reserves then to itself the power of saying whether he is discharged for reasonable cause or not.

The employer has nothing to say about it. As I read the rules, that is what that means.

Mr. RANDOLPH. With all due respect, Senator, the union is in better shape to exercise their judgment than the employer, who knows nothing about the trade.

Senator TAFT. I know that. That is the point I am trying to make. Section 8:

"A foreman shall not designate any particular day, nor how many days a member shall work in any one week: Provided, That the member must engage a substitute when absent. Any member covering a situation is entitled to and may employ in his stead whenever so disposed any competent member of the International Typographical Union without consultation or approval of the foreman."

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Senator TAFT. To say nothing of the employer.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, I explained that this morning, and that has been the case ever since the union has been in existence, and in typographical societies before, because, as I explained, the union has accepted a responsibility as regards the situation, and in the production of the daily newspaper this is very important.

If a man is not there or if enough men are not there, the paper cannot come out on time. He is obliged to supply the service that is expected of him, and if he does not and is unable to, he is obligated to put a substitute to carry on in his stead; and since time immemorial he has that right when he wants to lay off, and he hires a substitue to do his work, and it is of no consequence to the employer who does the work, whether it is John or Jim, but it does get done, and in the way it should be done, by a union member trained to know what to do.

Senator TAFT. There are three other things here that I suggested that bear out the charge that you have removed a good many things from collective bargaining. You have removed them by making these law absolute and not open to question.

Section 3 of article VII states:

"Subordinate unions are prohibited from establishing piece or bonus scales."

That is a definite rule that no local union can even bargain with the employer on such a subject.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right, and I referred to that this morning as having been adopted after years and years of negotiation and collective bargaining on that point; and in the year 1938 the convention adopted that rule when there were only 13 unions left out of 850 that had piecework provisions in their scales.

Senator TAFT. Another one is section 8, article XI:

"Not less than time and one-half shall be paid for any shift worked in excess of five within a financial week. When a member is required to work on a regular off-day or off-night, not less than the overtime rate shall be paid for such work performed."

I do not question the justice of that rule, but it is one that is definitely removed from the power of a union to bargain collectively; is it not? They could not vary that to any extent.

Mr. RANDOLPH. They can get a better condition than that but no worse, and that is one of the conditions that the members all over the country are governed by in the making of agreements.

In other words, as I explained, the collective bargaining of a century is nailed down, the gains of the century are nailed down in this book of laws, and the unions do not desert that position, and they will not surrender those gains that have been established generally throughout the country, and nailed down in the book of laws.

Senator TAFT. There is one other I just read, and I will ask you about that, because I do not know—it is article XIII, section 1.

"A subordinate union cannot alter or amend the standard of type adopted by the International Typographical Union. The following is to be the alphabetical scale for the measurement of type cast on the point system," and so forth, with a good many technical requirements.

Is that subject also removed from collective bargaining or can you in special cases do something, some special kind of type?

Mr. RANDOLPH. By a matter of evolution that is almost as dead as the dodo. That type standard was put in there while there was piecework and where, by the use of a thin face of type, a compositor was compelled to set more units of type than he would on the standard face.

He had to use his hands many more times to produce a thousand ems that he would on a standard face of type.

If he was using a wide face of type, he had less motion of his hands in picking up pieces of type to set a thousand ems upon which he was paid; so that this standard here was one that described what constituted a standard face of type, which was the basis of measurement of type for hand composition.

It has little effect at this time, except as to the possible application to a standard of competency if the employer undertook to substitute a very thin face of type on his linotype machine rather than a standard one, because it would still mean more movements of the fingers on a thin face than it would on a standard face, but it has never been brought up, to my knowledge, in any controversy in the 36 years I have been a member of the International Typographical Union, and in the some 25 years that I have been an official.

Senator TAFT. Now, I suggest, Mr. Randolph, that these laws bear out the statement made by Mr. Henry that these various things are prescribed by general laws of the International Typographical Union; that although all of these matters are of vital importance to them, as employers, none of them are bargainable or even subject to arbitration.

"In other words, such union laws have been constantly narrowing the area of bargaining by preventing the employers and locals in their negotiations from arriving at any agreement unless the employer is willing to agree to all the 'must' rules of the international."

Do you not think that is a fair statement on Mr. Henry's part?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, it is not. In the first place, Mr. Henry does not know enough about it, and in the second place, when he says that we are constantly narrowing, that is not true because very few changes are made from year to year in general law provisions, and then only in cases where we have already made gains and try to get the stragglers in the industry to try to come up, bearing in mind that the greater portion, at least, of the numbers of employers in this industry, are not members of associations, and where once an agreement is made with an association or a group of employers, it is up to the union to see that that is enforced in other places, and there has to be a standard, and there has to be a way of approaching a standard.

This international law book, and general laws provided in this book having to do with economic matters, are the minimum of union conditions that we insist upon.

Now, an employer who does not want any provisions restricting him, no matter who happens to the union, that type of a man would say, "These restrictions are tremendous; they are too much for anybody; we do not want them."

We say: "If you do not want them, you go ahead and run an nonunion shop. There are lots of employers who want to run union shops, and run them under these restrictions."

Senator TAFT. Can any newspaper of any size get enough men to run a nonunion shop?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Oh, yes; quite a few.

Senator TAFT. In small towns, but I mean in any large towns?

Mr. RANDOLPH. There are some metropolitan papers operating nonunion.

Senator TAFT. Are there? Which ones?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, the Philadelphia Bulletin; there is one in Hartford, and there is a Los Angles paper, the Los Angeles Times, and, oh, there are quite a few of them.

Senator TAFT. It can be done. Let me only ask one more question, Mr. Randolph. Supposing that we repeal the union-shop provision. What do you think of giving the power to the Board or somewhat to regulate the question or at least to pass on the reasonableness of the action relating to the admission of apprentices, admission to unions, and expulsions from unions?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, Senator Taft, we are unalterably opposed to the interference by Government in the details of operating, either industry or unions.

We do not think the Government is competent through any bureaucracy you can think of to make even fair regulations along that line.

Senator TAFT. Well, you insist that the only condition then you think it should exist under is that a union should be able to absolutely govern the admission of people into the union by its rules, and the method of expulsion, without appeal to anybody. Government or employer or anybody else.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Why, of course. It is the only fair way; it is the only successful way.

Senator TAFT. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

EVENING SESSION

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Randolph, I believe when I was questioning you today I was about to ask something about the closed shop. You heard the discussion between Mr. McCabe and me about what was the theory of the closed shop, that it indicated a preference or determination of men not to work with others who didn't share their point of view and adhere to the principles to which they adhered about what was in the interest of and for the benefit of the workers.

Is there anything you would like to say on that that would justify what is the theory of those who advocate it?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, Senator, I think I can add something to that, but before I do may I refer to the last question or two that Senator Taft asked me? There was a point left rather up in the air about the matter of discharges.

I pointed out that there were two methods: One by which discharges were handled within the union and one where they are handled according to a contract provision to arbitrate the discharge cases.

He started to read the section of law having to do with that, but did not read that portion having to do with the arbitration of discharge cases, and I wanted that cleared up because the law specifically says:

"When a subordinate union has made specific provision in its contract for reference of controversy over discharge to a joint agency the dispute shall be decided as provided in the contract."

At this time I would say there are practically 95 percent of our members working under circumstances where the discharges are arbitrated instead of going through the union procedure. I am afraid that point was not clear and I am happy to clear it up before going ahead with your question on the closed shop, Senator.

As I testified this morning, the closed shop has been something that has been with us from our very birth, over 100 years ago. It came about through the simple fact that union men would not work in a shop unless all were union, including the foreman, of course. Foremen didn't think about hiring anybody but a union man, and the closed shop was automatic, unquestionable, and never even considered.

It was so when we started to make collective agreements and became a part of the union rules and the union rules have always, from the time of the beginning of labor agreements, been accepted as the floor upon which other matters were collectively bargained.

Now the theory of the closed shop as it was originally conceived and the practical working out of the closed shop provisions of collective agreements, of course, remains the same, but there had been something added to it. The added thought about it is that the employer himself benefits from the closed-shop agreement.

We have a skilled trade. We have always arranged to train additional skilled people in the trade and organized other skilled tradesmen and kept the union intact and a supply of competent people available for hiring by employers.

That service in an industry where the time element is very important has been of considerable value to the employer, and he has been able to maintain what might be regarded as a minimum force, using extra help as needed instead of having to maintain a maximum force to take care of the amount of business that would come in on his largest days.

The closed shop, so far as the union benefit is concerned, rests in having a pool of jobs where our members may be employed; our members being a mobile force, they may then work in one or another of the shops, maybe two or three shops in a week, taking up the extra work that may appear in those shops and working steadily while doing so.

It couldn't be done that way if we didn't have the closed-shop agreement. Those are economic benefits from the closed shop that accrue to both parties, both the employer and the employee.

Aside from that, the union regards it as necessary for its continued existence. If an employer is permitted to dilute the force with nonunion people, with people who do not believe in unionism, he can in a period of time replace a union force with so many nonbelievers that the union has no stability because it has no opportunity to strike and win a strike. The nonunion people can be of such number as to make a strike ineffective, so that after a period of time under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law, if it remained in effect for any particular period of time and union men remained at work in a shop where nonunion people were employed, they would lose their bargaining power.

In addition to that, there is as much feeling for the union and for the principle of unionism among our people as you will find a feeling for a particular religious sect among people who may choose one. It is a matter of principle. It is a matter of faith, that unionism is something that is necessary if we are going to retain our freedom under our economic system.

Senator MORSE. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to ask a question along the line of the hypothetical which I was discussing with Mr. Denham previously?

Senator PEPPER. Yes.

Senator MORSE. You heard my question to Mr. Denham with regard to whether or not counsel from his office sought to interfere with the application of some 30 rules of your union which you and other officers of the union by union rules are required to enforce on your members under their own democratic votes? You heard those questions?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, sir.

Senator MORSE. Is it true, Mr. Randolph, that Mr. Denham's counsel have, on the allegation that your union rules or those they have attacked constitute a coercion of the employees, brought legal actions against you that tended to be very frustrating and annoying and involve you in unnecessary litigation?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, Senator Morse. The question of the union rules and their probable or possible effect was discussed at great length in the various cases brought against us and in the injunction case in the Federal court.

Senator MORSE. What have been some of these rules?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The general laws of the union having to do with economic conditions and the rules providing for the closed shop right in our book of laws.

Senator MORSE. Have you found in your discussions and negotiations with the general counsel's office that once that office exercises its discretion to proceed against you in respect to these rules, there is no appeal that you can take within the organization to the National Labor Relations Board?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We are fully aware of the fact that we have no appeal from his decision.

Senator MORSE. That is your answer?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No appeal, that is true.

Senator MORSE. Prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley law did you have relationship with the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I don't recall any. There were one or two cases that went up through the regular process.

Senator MORSE. In those cases did you have a right under the Wagner Act, if you felt that the general counsel was proceeding unfairly or arbitrarily, to have the matter brought to the attention of the full Board for determination?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, we didn't run into any of those circumstances. My conception of the Wagner Act was that the matter of the trial examiner's report was appealable to the Board and if the Board rendered a decision that we didn't see fit to comply with, they could get an enforcement order in court through their general counsel's activity. That is about all I know about it. I had very little use of the Wagner Act.

Senator MORSE. Is it your testimony, Mr. Randolph, that your experiences with the general counsel's office have caused you to conclude that he is empowered to exercise broad, sweeping, and unreviewable discretion as far as the filing of complaints and the seeking of injunctions are concerned?

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is not only brought to our attention that he can, but it has very painfully been brought to our attention that he did, as against the International Typographical Union.

Senator MORSE. Is it your view, Mr. Randolph, that the giving of such discretionary power by law to any governmental official operating in the field of labor relations puts him in a position where he can by the exercise of that discretion do great damage to a union or to an employer?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Most emphatically so, and I believe not only great damage; I think he has the power to destroy unions.

Senator MORSE. Is it your view that any law in the field of labor relations, in respect to provisions covering employers and covering unions, should have within it adequate safeguards whereby review of discretionary action of officials operating under the law will be subject to review?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think there should be such procedures.

Senator MORSE. And then subject to review before damage from their exercise can be committed?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think that is sound; yes.

Senator MORSE. One other question and, as far as I know, I will be through with this witness unless something develops later in the examination.

The other day, Mr. Randolph, I had a very able witness representing employers from the San Francisco Bay area who testified in effect that although there has been a literal compliance with the closed-shop provisions of the Taft-Hartley law in the San Francisco Bay area, in practice the hiring policies have continued as they existed prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley law because we are in a period of full employment where jobs are plentiful and the employers are not in a position where they have a handy labor market available to them.

Has that been your observation generally speaking across the country as to the continuation of the practice of hiring men as they were hired prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley law with a few exceptions with which you are painfully aware?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I will try to be as exact as possible in my own language in order to avoid the inevitable consequences of a slip on that point, bearing in mind that I am under an injunction and everything I say that is a matter of record finds its way into the general counsel's office and usually before the judge.

Senator MORSE. Answer it your own way.

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Chairman, I never have made any constitutional study of the question, but just as Members of Congress are given an immunity under the Constitution for what they say in Congress, it seems to me the same principle ought to apply to witnesses who appear before the Congress in response to the questions of Senators, so if anybody ever gets after you for anything you say up here, you will have a lot of fellows fighting on your side.

The CHAIRMAN. It probably will not do him any good.

Senator MORSE. I was going to add I think the law goes the other way.

Senator PEPPER. You know Congress has the power of impeachment over Federal judges. I want that in the record.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I didn't intend to either intentionally or otherwise say anything that would be any different from what I have said before in court, but I am trying to say it in the same way and not say yes or no to your language because it isn't on review in front of me.

Senator MORSE. Answer it your own way.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The fact is that with few exceptions the newspaper and commercial employers over the country, if they haven't been willing to make a contract giving our local unions the benefit of all the protections that can be had under the Taft-Hartley law, have simply followed along without making any changes in their hiring practices and have made increases in wages, commensurate with the inflationary trends.

The practice of hiring, as I say, has not been changed to my notice except in two cases that I testified to in court. One I mentioned here this morning, wherein a small plant in Wisconsin a nonunion foreman was hired, and all the rest of the printers disappeared. The other case was in San Antonio, where the president of the union called me, stating that an employer in a commercial office hired a nonunion man and he was seeking advice on what his rights were. I told him under the law he had no right to do anything about that circumstance, but that my advice to him was to look into the man's qualifications and his attitude toward the union; and if he felt that he met with that test, to invite him to join the union. My understanding is that it was done and the man now is a member of the union.

With those two exceptions, I know of no place where the employers have made a deliberate change in their attitude of hiring.

Senator MORSE. May I make a comment—and you check me as to whether or not it is reasonably accurate as an interpretation of the practice that has prevailed in your industry since the passage of the Taft-Hartley law.

One, in many cities and towns contracts with your unions since the passage of the Taft-Hartley law have expired; right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Right.

Senator MORSE. Two, in most of those cities and towns satisfactory working arrangements have been entered into between your unions and the employers without any stoppage of work; right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Right.

Senator MORSE. Three, the practice of employing the workers since the passage of the Taft-Hartley law has continued to be the same in most cities and towns covered by my first two points as the practices were prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley law; right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Senator MORSE. Conclusion: A great many employers, then, have proceeded to continue what amounts in practice to a closed-shop relationship with the employees in their plants.

Mr. RANDOLPH. My conclusion is——

Senator MORSE. I am saying mine.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That they have made no changes in their own practices since before the Taft-Hartley law was passed.

Senator MORSE. No comment on this, Mr. Randolph, but I have been taken to task by some people for talking about the Taft-Hartley law as one of the causes for subterfuge in many employer-employee labor relationships in this country, and therefore conducive not to the building up of sound ethics in labor relations because some employers have seen that in just such a situation as this the type of restrictions that it seeks to impose are not fair, and, tested in light of their many years' experience with unions where they have had amicable relations, which relations have been disturbed, or would have been disturbed had they attempted to carry out the letter of the law—and, understand, I am not passing judgment; I am simply saying now that I think your situation demonstrates very clearly when you deal with an industry that has had the amicable relationships that that industry has had with the closed-shop principle over many, many years, an industry that has had, I think, the best record of voluntary arbitration of any industry in the country over many years, and on the part of most of the employers they appear satisfied with the principle of the closed shop in that industry—the Congress of the United States ought to consider for a long time before it decides to continue a provision of the law which, in my judgment, has been productive of so much subterfuge and bootlegging in the field of labor relations.

I think you know exactly what I mean and I think your testimony has been very helpful if this committee really wants to look on how the law operates in fact, and we have heard a lot of nonsense, in my judgment, over the past few months to the effect that the Taft-Hartley law has done no harm. If the people will take the time to study the effects of its various provisions on labor relations in this country, they will see just the type of harm that your testimony in my judgment points up here tonight and that the testimony of the San Francisco witness pointed up when he said, "Why, yes, in practice we are continuing to hire our employees as we did before the Taft-Hartley law was passed," and then was frank enough, because he is a very frank and honest man, to point out, "We are confronted, however, really with an era of short labor supply," raising for this committee in my judgment the warning, "Look out as to what the effects of the law will be when unemployment starts walking the streets of America." Then you will see the real costly nature of the Taft-Hartley law with all of its legalistic provisions which permit of the type of prolonged litigation which the General Counsel, I think, has amply testified to in his testimony thus far, legalistic procedures which that law will permit of when unemployment walks the streets and thus I say to my critics again tonight: I know of no way of putting on the books a law that has in it more potential danger of labor strife in the country than the Taft-Hartley law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to add just to that statement what he has said so many times. Whenever the Congress of the United States passes a law which is in reality an open and continuous invitation for people in the country to break the law, we do something which ultimately ends in bad government. Excuse me, Senator Morse.

Senator MORSE. I completely concur, Mr. Chairman. You said it in one sentence and it took me three paragraphs to say it.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Pepper?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I didn't quite finish.

The CHAIRMAN. Excuse me.

Senator MORSE. Excuse me.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I just wanted to add one more point on the closed-shop question and that is that we have always had the belief that we had a constitutional right to work or not work collectively as well as individually, and for the Taft-Hartley law continuing a paragraph of the Wagner Act to the effect that organization is absolutely necessary for the purposes of protecting our economy, for the Government to take the position that organization is necessary and then to single out only the individual for constitutional rights is a ridiculous retreat from the obvious necessity of a labor union having the right to do collectively what individuals have the right to do on their own.

Senator PEPPER. Well, Mr. Randolph, reference has been made to some States which have passed constitutional amendments or legislation barring the so-called closed shop. Would you say that any of those States or any large number of them are what we call industrial States, where there is a large percentage of industry and a large number of industrial workers?

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is my impression that there are few industrial States that have passed such laws. I am not aware of all of them because we have had so many laws, Senator Pepper, this past year to give attention to and so many lawyers from the general counsel's office to worry with that I just lost sight of the State laws.

Senator PEPPER. The Taft-Hartley law and the United States Government kept you pretty busy?

Mr. RANDOLPH. It has taken up fully half of my time as an executive of the union during these past 16 months to give attention to the Taft-Hartley matters only and obviously other matters have suffered in like proportion.

Senator PEPPER. I was about to ask you if it were not possible that in the States where such amendments have been passed it has been due to a false way or inaccurate way in which the issue was presented, that the issue was presented in such a way as to appear to raise the issue of individuals' rights to work and the individual freedom for the citizen, with which all are in accord, and it was made to appear that the advocates of the closed shop were opposed to those things, that they were closing the door to a worthy citizen having a right to earn a living, and, of course, everybody is against any such deprivation, and that the larger issue of greater freedoms or as great freedoms, which are involved in the matter, were not fairly presented to the public.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Senator PEPPER. When Mr. Henry testified Saturday night, he stated there were no restrictive rules on production but that he had the feeling that there were some declines in production because of the closed shop. What do you think about that?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, it is obviously wrong just by the statement itself, Senator Pepper. Mr. Henry could have presented figures from many print shops if he had wanted any figures to prove the contention, but the very fact that these shops have always operated as closed shops, mind you, having always so operated, how can he make a comparison even if there was a decrease in production and lay it on to the closed shop?

Obviously, he couldn't. They have always been closed shops. So if there was the drop in production, it was not attributable to the closed shop, but I even say that he had no basis for his charge that in one or more processes he had a feeling that there was a drop in production. You can imagine any print shop employer, and Mr. Henry is one of them, who is interested in production, he has a lot more than just a feeling. He is going to either know whether he has got production or whether he hasn't, and I rather discount a man, a representative of the industry, coming in here with "feelings" about production.

Senator PEPPER. Is it or is it not a fact that during the current newspaper strike in Chicago members of the same local, local No. 16, were compelled under the force of the Taft-Hartley law and the direction of the commercial shop owners to serve as strikebreakers?

Mr. RANDOLPH. They were so required, Senator, and the number of ads that they had to so set ran into the thousands.

Mr. Henry's statement, and I believe Mr. Dunnagan's statement, was that there were a few ads and that it was something that they had always been doing and he mentioned the Marshall Field ad.

Now just by singling out the Marshall Field ad, in my opinion, Mr. Dunnagan disclosed the fact that he knew far more than he was willing to tell because the Marshall Field ad is the only department store ad which over a number of years has been set up in commercial offices and then transferred into the newspaper for publication. He is correct so far as the national advertising is concerned. Much of it is set up in commercial shops, what we call agency shops, where compositors set up this national advertising for all over the country, but he is not correct as regards local department store advertising, which has always been composed in the composing rooms of the employers themselves.

It was that volume of ads numbering into thousands that were set up in commercial shops and used in the newspapers. Whether or not the newspaper said to the advertiser, "You will have to go over to a commercial shop and have your ad set up and then bring it over here and we will print it in the paper," whether that subterfuge was used or not, the fact still remains that our people were compelled to set up advertising which had been set up by our people when they worked on newspapers.

Senator PEPPER. And the workers who did set up advertising in those commercial shops for the advertisers felt that they were required to do so by the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. RANDOLPH. They were so advised by our able attorneys and they continued to do that until they absolutely revolted and said, "We will set no more," and they said it individually and they were discharged individually, and the shops emptied within 2 or 3 days by their firing the men one after the other who refused to handle that advertising. The commerical industry was then shut down for 3 or 4 months on that act.

Now I ask again: What value is it to provide in the Taft-Hartley law that an individual may quit his job if he can't quit in concert with others and protect the standards of his trade? Obviously it is a hollow and useless right to quit individually when in this industrial civilization you can do nothing individually.

Senator PEPPER. So it is really a meaningless benefit relatively, that is conferred upon him in 506 and 502 unless he may under that same section do the same thing in concert with his fellow workers?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, Senator, and if he has a right individually to refuse to do a thing of that kind, why has the employer the right to discharge him for doing what he has a legal right to do? The act doesn't protect him against discharge by an employer for exercising his legal right.

Senator PEPPER. Has it been the intention or decision of the ITU to defy or violate the Taft-Hartley law, as several witnesses here have said or intimated?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, Senator. In our collective bargaining policy adopted by the convention, we made that very plain and our acts have indicated that at no time have we violated that law, nor have we intended to violate it.

We have been very careful in avoiding that and again I will say that the convention adopted collective-bargaining policies and said that there should not be and will not be any attempt on the part of the international or subordinate unions to violate any valid provisions of this law or of any law, Federal or State.

So when it came to the question of accepting the general counsel's interpretation of that law or our own attorneys' interpretation of it, we were willing to put our money on our own interpretation and go through the legal procedures that would bring about a decision. But we haven't got a decision. We haven't come near to a decision and we have been enjoined under a sweeping injunction that I myself find very difficult to understand. I keep asking the attorneys: Just what does it mean? They tell me what they think the injunction means, and after a while it seems as though Judge Swygert didn't believe it meant what our attorneys thought it meant and the National Labor Relations Board, which has the only legal right to determine it, may find that the judge is wrong and that our attorneys are wrong, and that Denham is wrong and everybody is wrong but the Board. They may come out with a decision some time or other in the distant future, but in the meantime we are subject to the injunction and to have the reputation of having been cited for contempt of court.

That is a humiliating thing for us to be suffering over nothing more than a question of whether or not the procedure of a contract might discriminate against some nonunion applicant sometime in the future and whether or not a provision for the training of apprentices and a committee appointed for that purpose has a tie-breaker or not, as to whether or not the committee of two members of the union and two employers, whether they might not agree on whether this apprentice had reached a stage of competency or not, and unless there was an impartial arbitrator to determine that question we might be violating the Taft-Hartley law.

Now that is the substance of our citation for contempt, and I leave it to members of this committee, even including Senator Taft, if that is an intelligent approach to collective bargaining.

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Randolph, isn't that one of the examples of the vice of the law, that it entered like a bull in a china shop into a field where there had been delicate and perfected equilibriums built up over a period of many decades, in your case over a hundred years, and even if eventually it might not be adjudicated to have been worded so as to bring about your detriment, nevertheless, to subject your rights to such jeopardy and litigation and to such attack and assault that it has been the most grievous injury to your employees individually and collectively and has unsettled labor relations in the whole printing field?

Mr. RANDOLPH. It certainly has, Senator.

Senator PEPPER. So that isn't it also a fact that regardless of what the court of last resort might finally hold in a lot of these close cases, that the truth of the business is that aside from what it may eventually be held to do, the Taft-Hartley Act and injunctions that have been issued under it have intimidated the whole labor union movement and their leaders and made them hesitant and timid about asserting their rights, which they have always felt they had, at least since the Wagner Act, for the furtherance of the interests of their workers?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is absolutely true, Senator, and our own local union officials have been constantly consulting their international union as to what they may do and how they may do it to avoid that pressure. They tell me their employers are in the main desirous of getting along with the union and having no fuss about this and doing the thing they have always done and forgetting about all this turmoil that they had no part in.

As a matter of fact, when I asked them, "Well, didn't your newspaper support the Taft-Hartley law," the answer is, "Yes, they did, but they didn't know what was in it." I asked: "Do they know now?" The answer is: "No, they don't know yet, and neither do we."

The CHAIRMAN. Are they still supporting it in spite of all that?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not know about that. I have not had a poll, but the fact is that they are getting along with our members rather than trying to use the weapons of the Taft-Hartley law against us, but their association, the American Newspaper Association and the P. I. A. officials, are attempting by this court action and by this pressure to secure the right to use these Taft-Hartley tools against us.

Then of course the various employers will have something that they can use and keep the members of the union quiet and use it to keep the wages down under the idea that if you get too fresh about this thing "I have got a good handy club here I can hit you with." That is the idea of the employers generally.

They are not foolish. If they can get the advantage over the union, any union, they are going to get that advantage, and so while they are not willing to put up a fight now, they are perfectly willing to have somebody fix up a nice shiny club that they can use any time they want to use it.

Senator PEPPER. Yes. Well, on the point I mentioned about the Taft-Hartley law being a psychological barrier to the assertion of their rights, I recall a good many instances in my State where union members came to me after the Taft-Hartley Act was passed and asked my opinion about whether they could individually make a contribution to a campaign fund or pay for any posters or handbills, even whether they would be permitted to take any part in an election when they were members of a union, and they were in a great dilemma to know what opinion they could get that they could rely upon.

They thought about asking our committee, asking for an opinion from the general counsel and so on. Well, when men are threatened with the punishment of prosecution, so that they are intimidated in the exercise of their rights as citizens, you can imagine about how many times they were intimidated in the assertion of their economic rights under the Taft-Hartley law.

Now one other thing, Mr. Randolph. The Norris-LaGuardia Act forbade employers from perpetuating the vicious practice of appealing to lifetime appointed Federal judges, ofttimes ex parte, for labor injunctions, but if you assume that you vest in one man the power on behalf of the Government of the United States to apply for the same kind of an injunction in rather a broad category of cases, and if that man is not controlled in the exercise of his arbitrary decision or judgment, and if by chance that man should become friendly to the employer or biased on their side, you have practically put the weapon of injunction back into the hands of the employer, have you not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is absolutely so, Senator, and we have felt and we have plenty of reason for feeling that the newspaper publishers of this country, with the access to the millions of the population in their daily papers, have a powerful influence in this country in a lot of places, and we were more than convinced of that when a group of Chicago employers, Mr. John S. Knight, for instance, of the Chicago Daily News where our members are on strike, and who prints the Detroit Free Press where they are not on strike, and who prints a paper in Miami where our papers are now on strike, Mr. Knight in conjunction with representatives of the Chicago Tribune and the Chicago Sun and the Hearst paper of Chicago, visited the office of Senator Taft.

It is referred to in our booklet attached to our written statement. When these dignitaries visited Senator Taft's office and when Senator Taft made the public statement that he did, concerning that case, and concerning that visit, and when Mr. John S. Knight published in his papers the frank statement of what they were there for, we felt most certainly that the publishers had an access to the enforcing agency of the country that we did not have, and that he was listening to their side of the story. When we found the attorneys for the general counsel's office asking a Federal court to force the international union to stop the payment of strike benefits to the Chicago printers, we were thoroughly convinced of it regardless of what anybody else may say.

We are thoroughly convinced that the Chicago newspaper publishers visited Mr. Taft's office and the subsequent actions of the general counsel's office with reference back to the Chicago case—the most important strike in the country in our trade—have a definite connection step by step.

Fortunately the court did not order us to stop the payment of strike benefits, but here is the position that we find ourselves in with regard to these strikes that we have. There are some things under the Taft-Hartley law that are illegal to strike for——

Senator NEELY. Mr. Chairman, before the witness leaves the point he is discussing, may I interrupt you with a question?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, sir.

Senator NEELY. Did it occur to you at that time that you were actually confronted with a combination or an apparent combination of the legislative, the judicial, and the executive branches of the Government who are all cooperating apparently in an effort to serve one side of this controversy, and that you are the victims of their activities?

(REPORTER'S NOTE.—The question preceding is subject to being struck or revised by Senator Neely.)

Senator SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I must protest the implication of the question, in Senator Taft's absence. I do not know what the facts were. Senator Taft has explained it heretofore, and I regret that that question is brought up in Senator Taft's absence, and I want to ask the chairman's permission, of course, if this goes in the record, for Senator Taft to make his own explanation.

Senator NEELY. You should have that, of course. You remember Senator Taft referred to it himself in the examination of this witness.

Senator SMITH. There was a discussion, there is no doubt about that. I do not think the implication that there was a conspiracy between the legislative, judicial, and whatever else you suggest is quite a fair inference to leave in the record here in Senator Taft's absence, and I must protest against it.

Senator NEELY. Senator Smith, I think I will amend that and say, instead of combination, the cooperation; you were up against the cooperation of the legislative, the executive, and the judicial branches of the Government in this controversy.

Senator SMITH. I regret I have to object again, but I think that has the same implication and it reflects on Senator Taft's integrity.

Senator NEELY. I do not mean to do that.

Senator SMITH. Senator Taft is a man of the highest integrity and I protest reflections on his integrity in any way, shape, or manner.

Senator NEELY. I concur in what you say about his being a man of high integrity. That does not mean that I approve, though, of his conduct in doing what he said he did here the other day.

I am not going to criticize him, but I just do not join in approving it.

Senator SMITH. I do not think you have to approve of anything, but I do think we should not reflect on a Member of the United States Senate in his absence, and I protest against it being done without making a clear protest on my part, and the request that Mr. Taft be given the privilege that he should be given to make any statement he wants to make in connection with this for the record, and I am sure Mr. Randolph would agree with that.

I did not think you, Mr. Randolph, were reflecting on Senator Taft in your statement.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am not, and I have not been dealing with any personalities whatsoever.

Senator SMITH. I think we should leave personalities out. Let us have the facts.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think Senator Taft made his own statement here previously in this case. He made it publicly at the time, and some of the publishers made their statements also. They are a matter of record.

What judgment one may form as to what those acts were comes under the head of the right of the American citizen to have his own opinion about what other people's acts indicate.

Senator SMITH. I agree with that.

Mr. RANDOLPH. My testimony here is to the fact——

Senator SMITH. I do not like the idea of a record being made here in the absence of a Senator, the implication being made he did something that was wrong.

Senator HUMPHREY. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Senator SMITH. I think that is a fair position for me to take and I feel we should make the record clear.

Senator NEELY. Mr. Chairman, to expedite matters I will withdraw the question and ask the question when Senator Taft gets back. I will never say in anybody's absence what I will not say to his face.

Senator SMITH. I thought it was thoughtless on your part to do it in Senator Taft's absence.

Senator NEELY. I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw it. I will ask the same question when Senator Taft is here. Let him defend it if he can.

The CHAIRMAN. The statement will be withdrawn from the record.

Senator HUMPHREY. Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Humphrey.

Senator HUMPHREY. I would like to say this. This is not a matter of secrecy, you know, about the so-called legislative interference, whether Senator Taft is here or whether he is not. We talked about this about 3 or 4 days ago, and the distinguished Senator from Ohio made his comment, and I have exactly the same comment here in the press report.

We have listened for quite a little period of time to people that were trying to tell us several other things about the case involving the ITU. We have listened to a good number of comments that there was no talking at all between the general counsel's office, anybody else's office, that everything was just wonderful.

Now, I think that it is perfectly proper to put into the record a leading editorial from the Washington Post on September 16, 1948, entitled "Putting on the Heat." This editorial refers specifically to what we are talking about tonight. This is not what I say. This is what the editor of a newspaper in this city has to say, and I gather that the newspaper in this city is much like others.

I suppose its editorial policy has not exactly supported the opponents of Taft-Hartley. I do not know whether it has taken any editorial position on Taft-Hartley legislation or not, but I recall that it did not support the President of the United States, if my memory serves me right.

Senator MORSE. What paper is that?

Senator HUMPHREY. The Washington Post.

Senator MORSE. It has taken a position in the——

Senator HUMPHREY. For or against?

Senator MORSE. In favor of its passage.

Senator HUMPHREY. All right, here is what it says. Permit me to quote part of it, and I will offer all of it for the record, and it can be reviewed by all Senators.

Mr. Taft himself is living evidence that a Senator is something more than this——

Senator NEELY. Mr. Chairman, I must say that we ought not to think of doing this in Senator Taft's absence. It is a great impropriety, and I want to add, so nobody can distort my action here a moment ago, I want it understood that I am not withdrawing this statement in any sort of an apologetic way or with any degree of humility at all, and I intend to reenact the statement at the earliest possible moment in the Senator's presence. I want it known I believe I was fully justified in the question I asked, and that there was no impropriety in it, but I did not want to delay this hearing by debating the question here in the Senator's absence.

Senator HUMPHREY. I will continue with my quote now. It says:

"Surely he"—meaning Senator Taft—"must recognize that the support of special claimants before a quasi-judicial agency such as the NLRB poses a serious threat to the impartiality and independence which should characterize the agency's judgments. Legislative intervention in issues before executive departments may be, as Senator Taft says, a common practice; but it is a highly dangerous one, threatening to subvert the separation of powers which lies at the heart of the American system of government."

There is exhibit A.

Senator MORSE. Mr. Chairman, would the Senator from Minnesota permit me a statement very briefly?

Senator HUMPHREY. Yes.

Senator MORSE. I think I can recollect what Senator Taft said rather accurately. He can correct it later, but I think it ought to go in at this point.

My recollection is that he said a couple of constituents from Ohio came to him and made inquiry as to the status of the case, and he in turn made inquiry to the general counsel's office as to the status of the case.

Now it is true we are constantly, as Senators, making inquiry as to the status of various matters affecting our constituents before administrative tribunals in this Government, but the point that I wish the Senator from Minnesota would make, I would join with him on this, but not on the propriety of Senator Taft's statement or his action but on the propriety of having in the Taft-Hartley law the setting up of the type of joint committee whereby a member of that committee charged with the statutory responsibility, as we have said, although someone said an unfortunate term—but that is what it amounts to—watchdogging a department of this Government does not thereby put himself in a preferred position whereby inquiry by him will not stand on the same footing as inquiry by other Senators.

Now I want to say that I am satisfied that Senator Taft in that instance did what each of us frequently does, makes inquiries for a constituent as to the status, as to what was happening, but I am so opposed to this provision of the Taft-Hartley law because it is subject to the type of interpretation that has been made in this particular instance that I think we ought to see to it that we eliminate from the statutes the creation of such joint committees that make it possible to put what many people will feel to be undue pressure upon a quasi-judicial body because we must keep separate and distinct the judicial functions of our Government from the legislative functions.

Senator HUMPHREY. If the Senator from Oregon would have permitted me to put all three exhibits in the record, that is exactly what I was going to arrive at.

The second exhibit I would like to offer is from an article by Joseph A. Loftus, special article to the New York Times, under date of August 13, put in the New York Times on the 14th, which brings to our attention the case that has been referred to and all of the details.

Also another editorial from the Washington Post on the 25th of August 1948, and finally the section of the minority report, minority views of the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations, Congress of the United States. The record is of April 1, 1948, which points out exactly what the Senator from Oregon was stating, the very serious danger that rests in a practice where a legislative body exercises a type of watch-dog function over an executive agency and thereby makes itself available for interference in the law enforcement or the law administration.

That is all I would like to say, as we are on it and I do think we ought to offer the Senator from Ohio plenty of chance to retort. He had a fight with the President of the United States over this. I see no reason why we should not have one in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It will all be inserted in the record.

(The documents referred to are as follows:)

PUTTING ON THE HEAT

Despite the pungent aroma of politics emanating from the interchange of accusations between President Truman and Senator Taft, an important issue is entailed. The controversy arose out of a meeting held on July 28 in Senator Taft's office at which officials of the NLRB general counsel's office were called into conference with representatives of Chicago newspaper publishers and were allegedly pressured to bring a charge of contempt of court against the International Typographical Union—a charge actually brought by the agency about a fortnight later. The President termed the Senator's connection with this matter "entirely improper." And the Senator replied yesterday that "the Truman statement is merely an attempt to curry favor with the labor bosses who control the labor publicity to which he is looking for help in the election."

The account of the meeting given to the President by David P. Findling, NLRB associate general counsel, makes it plain, as indeed does Senator Taft's own statement, that the Senator did talk to the Government officials in the presence of the publishers' representatives and did impress upon them that he considered the typographical union case the most important proceeding that had arisen under the Taft-Hartley Act. In the circumstances, this admonition from the principal author of the act and the chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare seems very much like what Mr. Truman aptly if inelegantly called it—an "attempt to put the heat on one of the executive departments."

Senator Taft says, "It is not only the practice but the duty of every Congressman and Senator when his constituents allege that some executive department is not doing its duty in relationship to matters in which they are interested to take up that matter with the executive department concerned." This is to view the Member of Congress as a mere creature of his constituents, a minion obliged to support their claims regardless of merit. Mr. Taft himself is living evidence that a Senator is something much more than this. Surely he must recognize that the support of special claimants before a quasi-judicial agency such as the NLRB poses a serious threat to the impartiality and independence which should characterize the agency's judgments. Legislative intervention in issues before executive departments may be, as Senator Taft says, a common practice; but it is a highly dangerous one, threatening to subvert the separation of powers which lies at the heart of the American system of government.

Taft Would Hold ITU for Contempt

SENATOR CALLS FOR ACTION ON AN INJUNCTION REQUIRING UNION TO CONFORM TO LABOR LAW

(By Joseph A. Loftus, special to the New York Times)

Washington, August 13.—Senator Robert A. Taft, Ohio, at the urging of some newspaper publishers, has called upon Government officials to bring contempt of court action against the International Typographical Union and its officers, it was learned today.

The Senator, it was reliably reported, also expressed himself in favor of a Taft-Hartley law amendment to permit individuals to sue for injunctions in labor disputes if the Government is not successful in getting a contempt citation against the printers.

The ITU and its officers have been under a Federal court injunction since March 27, requiring them to conform to the closed-shop prohibition and other provisions of the Taft-Hartley law.

The general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board obtained the injunction from Judge Luther M. Swygert in the Federal district court at Indianapolis.

PUBLISHERS CHARGE VIOLATIONS

Publishers' representatives have contended the ITU leadership has evaded and violated the injunction. The general counsel assigned investigators to the complaints and a decision whether to prosecute for contempt will be reached soon.

Three weeks ago, it was learned, Senator Taft, who is chairman of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, summoned the appropriate NLRB officials to his office. They are David P. Findling, associate general counsel, and Winthrop Johns, who is in charge of the injunction section under the general counsel. They obtained the injunction in March from Judge Swygert.

Present in Senator Taft's office, among others, were John S. Knight, publisher of the Chicago Daily News; representatives of the Chicago Tribune and of the Hearst newspapers, and Thomas Shroyer, counsel to the Joint Congressional Committee on Labor-Management Relations.

Senator Taft, it was reported, told the NLRB lawyers he believed the ITU and its officers should be cited for contempt of court. Mr. Findling and Mr. Johns were understood to have explained the status of the case. They said if all the facts, when assembled, warranted a contempt citation they would go before Judge Swygert.

AMENDMENT SUGGESTED

Mr. Shroyer reportedly suggested that the solution might be an amendment to the law so that private individuals or organizations could bring injunctive action. Senator Taft added some supporting comment to that view, it was reported.

Senator Taft and Mr. Shroyer were out of the city today. Mr. Findling and Mr. Johns were unwilling to discuss the incident.

The general counsel nearly 2 months ago acknowledged receiving complaints that the ITU was violating the injunction. In a statement on June 18, he said, "those complaints, which are, in effect, charges of contempt of the injunction, are now under investigation.

"This injunction was not idly sought, and if our investigation develops that they are supported by facts, it is certain that an early petition will be filed to cite Mr. Woodruff Randolph (president of the ITU) and his organization for contempt."

Pressure for the contempt action has come mainly from Chicago, where the newspaper printers have been on strike for nearly 9 months. The newspapers are being printed by a substitute process.

Issuance of the injunction in March failed to make any change in the Chicago ITU-publisher relationship. The dispute, ostensibly, at least, is over wages, but publishers contend the union is demanding closed-shop conditions in violation of the law.

The ITU recently approved contracts with New York City newspapers and the Gannett newspapers, but these are the exceptions in the ITU record of newspaper relationships since the injunction was issued. In most instances the printers received wage increases, but new contracts were not signed.

[Washington Post, August 25]

Legislative Pressure

The current controversy over Senator Taft's alleged pressure upon the National Labor Relations Board to cite the International Typographical Union for contempt of court brings into focus a serious problem entailed in the relationship of so-called watchdog committees of Congress to executive agencies. Joseph A. Loftus of the New York Times reported in that newspaper recently that the Senator called to his office two members of the NLRB general counsel's staff and told them in the presence of several publishers and publishers' representatives that he believed contempt charges ought to be brought against the ITU. Last week, the ITU convention at Milwaukee adopted a resolution, based on this story, calling upon President Truman to investigate "unwarranted interference" by Senator Taft with the executive branch of the Government. The President promised immediate investigation of the "shocking charge."

Although no comment on the matter has yet come from Senator Taft, who is absent on vacation, the general counsel of the Joint Congressional Committee on Labor-Management Relations, Thomas E. Shroyer, who was present at the meeting in the Senator's office, has told this newspaper that he himself called the meeting and that the Senator attended for only a few minutes, expressing no direct opinion as to the course which the NLRB should pursue. In addition, the general counsel of the NLRB, Robert N. Denham, has issued a public denial that there is any substance to the ITU charge.

Newspaper publishers are currently engaged in a bitter struggle with the ITU. Since March 27 the union and its officers have been under a Federal court injunction obtained by the NLRB requiring them to conform to the closed-shop prohibition and other provisions of the Taft-Hartley law. Publishers have complained to the NLRB that the union violated this injunction. The general counsel's office of the agency must decide, therefore, whether to prosecute the ITU for contempt. In this context, support of the publishers' complaint by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare would be an obvious impropriety, the more gross if it were committed in the publishers' presence. The very fact that the meeting was held in the Senator's office, which is acknowledged, would appear to be, at the least, an indiscretion. For any intimation of preference on the part of their legislative overseers would make it extremely difficult for the NLRB to function with the independence of judgment requisite to its quasi-judicial status.

The Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations, like the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy or the Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation, exercises a general supervisory role over the administration of legislation in its particular jurisdiction. This role might justify a general admonition as to policy, as well as a report to Congress on the administration of the law. But it would certainly not justify pressure of intervention of any kind in an individual case. Legislative shaping of specific executive decisions would violate the constitutional separation of powers. And the effect of such violation would be to obliterate, or at any rate to obscure, the responsibility which is the essence of sound administration.

(Excerpt from minority views of the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations, Congress of the United States:)

E. Legislative Interference With Executive and Judicial Functions

We have heretofore referred to the duties defined for the joint committee on labor-management relations in sections 401, 402, and 403 of the act. The performance of these duties has involved close relation between the members of the committee and officials of the Government performing executive and judicial functions.

This close relation results from the obligation on the part of the committee to conduct "a thorough study and investigation of the entire field of labor-management relations," and its further obligation to report to the Congress as to the necessity for additional legislation in the field.

We have recognized the necessity for an extended review of labor-management relations. Indeed, during the last session of Congress, we submitted a bill to provide for such a study. However, we feel that the performance of the duties by the joint committee involve the risk that there may be an unwarranted and unconstitutional intrusion in the fields preserved by our Constitution for the executive and judicial power.

Mr. RANDOLPH. May I say a word on that point at this moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Please.

Mr. RANDOLPH. We were discussing our impression of the situation and our convention adopted a rather strong resolution condemning Mr. Taft for his act. That is a matter of record.

I want to say further that upon the protest of the convention of the International Typographical Union to the President of the United States, he stated that he would cause an immediate investigation to be made, and he did so, and received a letter from Mr. Findling which is now a part of the record, giving Mr. Findling's version of the situation, and in which Mr. Findling states, quoting Mr. Findling:

"That he regarded the case as the most important case"—referring to Mr. Taft—in Senator Taft's language as reported by Mr. Findling, "that he regarded the case as the most important case that had come to the Board, and that it stood as a symbol to many Members of the Congress of the effectiveness of the enforcement machinery of the statute and that he was greatly disturbed by reports indicating that there was a serious break-down of the enforcement machinery in the case."

Now this is again a quotation of Senator Taft's statement:

"I did not purport to pass on the facts of the case except to say that the publishers seemed to me to have made out a prima facie case."

That is Senator Taft's language, and if he did not judge the case and find it to be a prima facie case of a break-down of the law-enforcement machinery, what did his language purport? When a man who is not only a Senator but who is the leader of the Republican Party and controlling faction of the Senate, and recognized as the leader of the Republican Party of the Nation, entertains representatives of Chicago publishers against whom our members are on strike, and he issues such a statement to the general counsel's staff, then we must conclude that there is interference between the legislative and the executive branch of the Government, and we must conclude that undue influence has been made.

That was the conclusion of our convention, and after the investigation and after the public statements of the several people involved, we are still of that opinion regardless of whether Mr. Taft engaged in these activities on the assumption that he was not doing anything wrong.

The fact remains that his intentions have nothing to do with his action, so far as we, the injured party, are concerned. We have a habit in our organization of judging people by their acts and not by their intentions, and I rather imagine that if any one of you, especially you lawyers, were conducting a case where a defendant stated after having shot at someone, that he did not intend to kill him, he was just trying to shoot him between the ribs and miss all of the vital organs, I doubt if you would have assumed that he was as innocent in his intentions as Mr. Taft says he is innocent in his intentions in this case.

Regardless of the fact that Mr. Taft is not here, the record is what I am pointing to. We judge people by their acts, not by their intentions, and I say again that we were convinced—and all of this leads from a statement I made before—that there was a logical sequence in the steps that led up to the general counsel making up his mind that the International Typographical Union was at fault, and that through the International Typographical Union defense fund, he could reach in and settle a strike by taking away the strike benefits from the members that were on strike in Chicago.

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Randolph, Senator Taft put in the record today a statement that was referred to as having been made by Mr. Shroyer, general counsel for the Joint Management-Labor Committee of the Senate and House under the Taft-Hartley law.

Before I read a paragraph or two of that statement which appears in the New York Times of Tuesday, September 23, 1947, I would like to ask you what was the date of the injunction application filed against the ITU by the general counsel of the NLRB? Was it before or after September 22, 1947?

Mr. RANDOLPH. After.

Senator PEPPER. It was after that date. This is the article:

"Says ITU will fail in Taft-Hartley fight." That is the headline. The subheadline is "Counsel for Congress group reports labor much more reasonable in bargaining."

"FRENCH LICK, IND., September 22 (AP).—A prediction that the International Typographical Union would be 'unsuccessful in its device to escape responsibility' under the Taft-Hartley law was made tonight by Thomas Shroyer, general counsel of the joint congressional committee to study the operation of the new law.

"Mr. Shroyer made the statement without elaboration in a speech prepared for the annual dinner meeting of the industrial relations section of the Printing Industry of America holding its annual convention here."

Now is that segment of the Printing Industry of America in any way associated with the employers against whom the ITU has been striking?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is a segment of the Printing Industry of America, Inc., who was represented here by its president, Carl Dunnagan.

Senator PEPPER. But does it have the point of view of the interests of the employers in the controversy with the ITU?

Mr. RANDOLPH. They are apparently of them; yes.

Senator PEPPER. They are apparently of the group?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes.

Senator PEPPER. So the general counsel of this committee was speaking before the employer group?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Senator PEPPER (reading). "The union has announced that it will not enter into formal contract with the employers under the Taft-Hartley law. A special committee of the newspaper association is to discuss a working agreement with ITU officials in Indianapolis Thursday and Friday."

Now I am ending the quote for the time being. That indicates that this statement was just before representatives of the employers were about to meet ITU, to see about working out some kind of a contract, some sort of a working arrangement.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The representatives that met were from other fields, the newspaper field.

Senator PEPPER. Oh, I see. [Reading:]

"Mr. Shroyer said it was too early to report what his study committee had determined except that 'the new law is working.'"

It is working all right. It is just a question upon whom it was working. This is a further quote:

"While labor leaders are condemning the Taft-Hartley law to the skies in the press and on the radio, they are bargaining around the conference table with a much more reasonable approach."

Any fellow who faces a man who has a club in his hand will probably walk more lightly and talk more mildly, so the fact that he would say they were talking with a much more reasonable approach indicated that his study had revealed that they felt that they did not have the strength at the conference table which they formerly had on account of the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Senator PEPPER. Was that the effect the Taft-Hartley law actually had upon employees, to weaken the strength of their unions?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I believe that without question the effect of the Taft-Hartley law has been to discourage the normal amount of what you might call the determination on the part of unions to follow the inflationary spiral.

The longer that the Taft-Hartley law is in effect and the more injunctions and citations for contempt that are issued, the weaker it makes the bargaining position of employees.

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Randolph, we are running short on time, and I want to yield to Senator Humphrey. I have got three questions that I want to ask you. Answer them as directly and as briefly as you can, please.

What is your thought about Mr. Henry's statement that "The Wagner Act imposed the duty to bargain only on one side and placed the employers in our industry at a serious disadvantage."

Was there any question about your union ever bargaining with employers?

Mr. RANDOLPH. There was no question about our union ever bargaining with employers.

Senator PEPPER. No complaint was ever made about your failure to bargain prior to the Taft-Hartley law with your employer?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That is right.

Senator PEPPER. Mr. Henry discussed the need for prohibition against jurisdictional disputes and contrary to Mr. Dunnagan he claims this happens very frequently.

Do you know of such happenings as he has described on page 7 of his statement?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No, Senator; we have almost no jurisdictional disputes in the printing industry. The lines are very well drawn and were very well drawn a long time ago and they are very well followed.

Now the jurisdictional dispute, that language is used as a cover-all to, we will say, cover other points that cannot be described actually as a jurisdictional dispute.

For instance, he regards it as a jurisdictional dispute if the union refuses to work on a product coming in from a nonunion plant. He assumes that we are trying to force that employer to have his employees join our union, and that is not so.

Senator PEPPER. If you have any time, if you should have any time after Senator Humphrey's questions or after other Senators' questions, if you could comment on this question, it would be all right. If not, leave it go.

I would like to get your comment on Mr. Henry's description as to how the secondary boycott works as described on page 8 of his written statement. I would prefer, unless you can answer that very briefly, for me to defer to Senator Humphrey.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, Senator, it is a very important question and, as I say, I will come back as often as necessary to give you the full information about this leading case in the enforcement of the Taft-Hartley law in every respect, whether we finish tonight or whether we do not.

Mr. Henry's approach to the matter that you have just mentioned is that we are trying to force through the refusal to handle struck work, trying to force organization of another plant. That is not true.

We are trying to protect the standards in the plant we have already organized and not allow the partial use of a union and the partial use of a nonunion product to break down the standards and cause the employer who has a whole union product to complain to the union that his wages must come down to meet this competing situation.

Senator PEPPER. I see.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Now Mr. Henry would destroy his own business if he had that opportunity, and these employers in the commercial field would destroy their own business if they had that opportunity.

Senator MORSE. Will the Senator from Minnesota simply permit a courtesy question of the chairman?

Mr. Chairman, I request that this record be kept open so that on Monday immediately following Mr. Randolph's discussion of the Taft statement, which he certainly had a right to discuss and express his views on in answer to the question put to him by the Senator from Minnesota, the record be kept open so that Mr. Taft, if he wishes, can insert his reply at that point in the record as a matter of courtesy to him, because I am sure he will issue a general denial of the interpretation because of his different interpretation of the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be done.

Senator HUMPHREY. I would like to ask Mr. Randolph a question.

Do you think the closed shop has worked to the advantage of labor peace in your relationships with your employers?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think it is the most important factor in maintaining labor peace in our industry.

Senator HUMPHREY. Well, would you be interested in hearing what some other people have had to say about this? I have here in my hands a copy of the New York Times—apparently I have been reading this paper lately—dated February 4, 1949. This is right up to date.

Possibly also the general counsel had better be looking into one of these matters because there is something here I will call his attention to. This is date-lined "Washington, February 3."

"The long and happy marriage of the Hickey-Freeman Co. and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America marked by collective bargaining and the closed shop"—you know this is after Taft-Hartley, gentlemen. I mean they still have the closed shop, according to this newspaper story—"was cited as worthy of emulation for industrial peace in a case study issued today by the National Planning Association.

"The National Planning Association representing management-labor editors and publishers stated that it was not a pattern that could be expected to fit every collective-bargaining situation. The committee said, however, that it found in this fourth case study significant parallels to some of the findings of the previous studies. The series is entitled 'Causes of Industrial Peace Under Collective Bargaining,' and it is financed by a $63,000 grant from John A. Whitney, of New York."

Now what does this report show? "The report shows," said the committee, "that some of the most troublesome issues clouding labor relations in some other companies and other industries are virtually nonexistent at Hickey-Freeman. Its collective bargaining is not confused by the issues of 'union recognition, union jurisdiction, ideological differences in class warfare and international union politics.'"

I would like to emphasize this, that here is an impartial organization that has quite a reputation in America for its objectivity, for its professional standards, the National Planning Association, which met here, by the way, in Washington, D. C., and I believe was addressed by the President of the United States. It says:

"The collective bargaining in this company is not confused by the issues of union recognition."

The Taft-Hartley Act has quite a little to say about union recognition, does it not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes, sir.

Senator HUMPHREY. All right. "By union jurisdiction." Does Taft-Hartley try to say anything about union jurisdiction?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Oh, it destroys union jurisdiction at the will of the employer.

Senator HUMPHREY. All right. It also says here:

'The Hickey-Freeman Co. and its union are not bothered by ideological differences and class warfare."

Possibly the Communist affidavit might be considered in this manner.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not know.

Senator HUMPHREY. Finally: "International union politics," which apparently the court and the trial examiners have been interested in the ITU case. Is that not right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, I do not know, but we have lots of politics in our organization.

Senator HUMPHREY. And policy. Now the next item is, "Then it spoke of two aspects of the bargaining situation worthy of special note," and it went down to talk about industry-wide bargaining and the second situation, the closed shop.

"Hickey-Freeman, in common with most other men's clothing manufacturers, operates today under a closed shop. The initial contracts specifically provided for an open shop, but the parties' experience led them later to agree on a closed shop."

Now it goes on to point out: "The closed shop does not per se prevent constructive labor-management relations. In at least some cases the closed shop may foster the closed-shop management relationships. The successful operation of the closed shop requires responsible union leadership, democracy in unions, the retention of the power by the rank and file is necessary to prevent irresponsible leadership."

Now we can go right on down the line. This article goes on for two columns, but it is quite an endorsement to the closed shop which the Taft-Hartley law saw fit to eliminate and not only eliminate but make illegal, and which has caused you a good deal of difficulty, has it not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Oh, certainly.

Senator HUMPHREY. The illegality of it?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The banning of the closed shop and the other features of the Taft-Hartley law, especially the other features have been responsible for an attitude on the part of the employers that brought on this strike, and it was not until February of 1948 that the first large group of commercial employers were willing to make a contract legal within the Taft-Hartley law giving us whatever protection it did have.

They held out all of that time, hoping to break down the union through the threats and intimidation we were getting out of the National Labor Relations Board general counsel's office, and his trial examiners.

Senator HUMPHREY. You are familiar with this pamphlet. It is entitled "The Typographical Union, Model for All," reprinted in the Reader's Digest.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes; I am familiar with that.

Senator HUMPHREY. June 1943?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes.

Senator HUMPHREY. I would like to ask you a question. Is that story a fairly good evaluation of your union?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I think it is fair. One of the collaborators with Mr. Hard, I believe, visited our convention in 1942.

Senator HUMPHREY. It is very laudatory.

Mr. RANDOLPH. He visited my office in Indianapolis. I supplied him with a lot of information, documentary and otherwise, which he in turn took to Mr. Hard and they must have collaborated on the article because it apparently was the outgrowth of the information he secured attending for the whole week our convention in Colorado Springs in 1942.

Senator HUMPHREY. Well, now, you operate under closed-shop conditions, do you not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We have up until the Taft-Hartley law.

Senator HUMPHREY. You have operated. The Amalgamated Clothing Workers apparently, of the Hickey-Freeman industry, operate under a closed shop, and I notice that two of the unions that get the big write-ups in America for being democratic, for having responsible union leadership, for having developed a fine sense of their responsibility to the management and to the Nation, all the good things of life, happen to be two unions that operate under closed-shop conditions, and yet the Taft-Hartley Act sees fit to ban them.

Now I gather from all that I have heard about you, Mr. Randolph, that you are a very responsible union official. I do not think anyone has in any way challenged your right to stand up and say that you do represent one of the sizable segments of organized labor and a very respectable segment of organized labor. Is that right?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I hope so.

Senator HUMPHREY. All right.

Mr. RANDOLPH. With all due modesty.

Senator HUMPHREY. Well, now, do not be so modest when you answer my questions, because you see, when the other side of the table puts things in the record with witnesses that are somewhat to their way of looking at things, I mean they just come right out of it.

Senator SMITH. I would like to agree with your statement about Mr. Randolph. From all I have ever heard, he is one of the outstanding leaders, and I pay him tribute for it. I appreciate his testimony here.

Senator HUMPHREY. Very good. How many years of experience have you had in union organization?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have been a member for some 37 years.

Senator HUMPHREY. How long have you been in a position of leadership in organized labor?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, since about 1923, I guess.

Senator HUMPHREY. You have been pretty well respected by the members of the employers' group, as I gather from the background that I have on you. Is that not correct?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have not had any complaint.

Senator HUMPHREY. All right. I want to ask you a question. Do you think you know quite a little bit about unions and their purposes?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes I do.

Senator HUMPHREY. Has the Taft-Hartley Act helped in union growth and the democratization of unions in this country?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I cannot see where it has.

Senator HUMPHREY. Well, would you think that you would know as much about unions, let us say, as, oh, somebody that just recently go into the field?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, I ought to know a little more than that.

Senator HUMPHREY. You have been living with it, have you not?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes.

Senator HUMPHREY. Let us ask you then, do you think that the Taft-Hartley Act has improved employer-employee relationships?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am sure that it has not.

Senator HUMPHREY. It surely has not in the case of the ITU, has it?

Mr. RANDOLPH. No; it has not.

Senator HUMPHREY. Did you ever have so much trouble under the Wagner Act as you have under the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. RANDOLPH. We have never had so much trouble in our whole life.

Senator NEELY. You mean in the whole 133 years of your existence?

Mr. RANDOLPH. There is nothing like this on record.

Senator NEELY. It was organized in 1815; is that correct?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Nothing like this on record, and our records go back to the beginning, I mean the beginning of the union.

Senator HUMPHREY. Do you think that the Taft-Hartley Act brings the Government into labor-management relations quite directly?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Oh, it does, absolutely.

Senator HUMPHREY. Would you be interested in what former Congressman Hartley had to say about this in his book "Our New National Labor Policy?" This book will be old next year. You will have another new labor policy.

Mr. RANDOLPH. You can read it for the record. I do not care about it.

Senator HUMPHREY. I will read it for the record. I think you will agree with this, Mr. Randolph. I quote from page 142:

"One of the most telling criticisms of the Taft-Hartley Act in the halls of Congress was the extent to which it put the Government in the industrial relations business. I have admitted earlier that this criticism is in a large measure true."

I think just prior to that it says: "On June 23, 1947, it was on that date that the Government took a seat at the bargaining table."

In other words, we put in an extra chair. Now we have contended, some of us, that one of the weaknesses of the Taft-Hartley Act was the fact that it did put the Government, involved the Government in labor-management relationships, Government interference, Government restriction, and may I use the words of my opposition, Government regimentation, bureaucracy. Can we think of any others? Those are the words that are always used. It is almost socialism.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Well, I would disagree with Mr. Hartley to this extent. He says it puts another chair at the bargaining table. I would say it shoved us away from the bargaining table.

Senator HUMPHREY. Now may I just conclude with this to show what may be the purposes of this act. I did not realize just what the purposes were of this act until I got down to the very last page of the distinguished former Congressman's book. On pages 192 and 193 it says this:

You would be interested in this because I thought the Taft-Hartley Act was primarily directed toward labor-management relationships, and I find out that the Taft-Hartley Act had a greater purpose and that one of the authors of this act found that it was to be some sort of a big broom that would just sweep clean the social horizon of America. Do not take my word for it. Listen to this:

"Therefore, in addition to the development of a national labor policy which will stand on its own feet without governmental guidance, the people of this country must also strive through their elected representatives in Congress to reduce, to restrict, and to eliminate from the Federal establishment those services which can be discarded practicably. To prevent this from sounding like a composite of the usual political speech"—this is Congressman Hartley talking now—"I shall be specific as to the sort of governmental activity which is costing us much more than we can justify."

I want you to listen to the social philosophy that is here.

"The Fair Labor Standards Act"—got to get rid of that, he says—"is typical of the New Deal legislation enacted to combat the depression. Such legislation failed to affect the depression one way or another and has definitely outlived its usefulness as it was supposed to have had."

That is the 40-hour week, you know, time and a half for overtime, child labor, that has outlived its usefulness.

"The Federal Communications Commission has expanded its activities far beyond its simple original function of dividing up the available wave lengths amongst various radio stations. The Federal Power Comission represents and perpetuates unwarranted encroachment upon individual rights."

This philosophy is not only content with starting a law or putting on the books a statute which in the ultimate could destroy free trade unions, but they would likewise apparently destroy the TVA and all that comes with it.

"The innumerable Federal agencies charged with conflicting responsibilities in the field of housing"—these have got to be eliminated, too—"they have contributed more to the shortages of housing than any single factor except the wartime drain on materials. Not one has come to grips with the heart of the housing problem. All of the top executive departments are overstaffed and attempting to do more than Congress ever authorized.

"This is a great Nation, but the greatest of nations cannot last forever carrying a load of nonproductive Government officials and employees."

That, of course, includes officials under the Taft-Hartley Act and the rest.

"We must develop a method to shrink our Federal establishments."

That is exactly what we intend to do, is it not, gentlemen, here, I mean in part—"and quickly,"—and that we intend to do, by the way.

"It is my sincere hope that the Taft-Hartley Act"—now listen to this—"will point the way for the Republican Party to approach its over-all problem of reducing the size and the cost of Government. Once we accept the concept of the Taft-Hartley Act as a model to begin an interim period leading to the complete elimination of Government labor-relations agencies, we can apply that same concept to the other areas of Government activity. I am well aware of the political difficulties of eliminating the New Deal social legislation. It cannot be repealed at a single stroke. All of this legislation of this type requires interim treatment."

Senator MORSE. The Senator from Minnesota is aware, is he not, that Mr. Hartley was not a member of the Republican platform committee at Philadelphia?

Senator HUMPHREY. I am aware of the fact that Congressman Hartley did not run for reelection, but I am more aware of the fact that he was the coauthor of this bill. Let us just complete this and we will be all through.

Senator NEELY. Could I interrupt there?

Senator HUMPHREY. Indeed you can.

Senator NEELY. Mr. Chairman, although Mr. Hartley is evidently not a candidate for the nomination for President the next time, it is proper, as he is a former Congressman, to talk about him this way in his absence? [Laughter.]

If anybody objects to it, I vote to sustain the objection.

Senator HUMPHREY. I will continue on after those words of wisdom. I continue the quote:

"But as soon as all segments of the populace become aware of the tremendous cost of particular benefits of governmental labor-relations agencies as compared to reduced tax bills, we provide interim legislation which does not benefit any particular group, then and only then can we make appreciable headway in reducing the size of Government."

Now listen to the prophet. This is one of the great prophetic dreams of our times. Should we say Jeremiah?

"Before the 1948 elections are finished the Taft-Hartley Act"——

Senator NEELY. Jeremiah's prophecies came true.

Senator HUMPHREY. "Will be hailed as the greatest single contribution the Republican Party has made to the Nation. To my mind the Taft-Hartley Act represents the greatest single contribution made by any political party for the past 2 decades. It corrects in a single piece of legislation the outstanding mistakes of the New Deal. At the same time it points a way toward the method to be utilized in correcting the other errors of Government initiated in the 1930's. Our final goal is, and it must be, that the Taft-Hartley Act is but a step toward that goal, but it is a certainty that it is be first definite step this Nation has taken since the merry-go-round began in 1933."

Now, I would gather from that that what the purpose of this legislation is by one of the authors, is to take this country back to the days prior to 1933. That is what he says. Read it as you want to.

"The Taft-Hartley Act is but a step toward that goal, but it is certainly the first definite step this Nation has taken since the merry-go-round began in 1933," and he points out, "It points a way toward a method to be utilized in correcting other errors of Government initiated during the 1930's."

Well, here is only one analogy to be drawn, and it seems to me quite clear, to get back into law of the jungle and to get back to the time when the strong shall exploit the weak; as I said this afternoon, this business of balance that I have heard repeatedly of equalizing the privileges of labor and management.

If there was ever one single piece of legislation in all of the history of this Congress that did anything to destroy the equilibrium of this country and to put the balance of power in the hands of the mighty and the powerful and at times, may I even say the greedy, it was this one piece of legislation.

I think the evidence is conclusive. I think it is perfectly clear. Now that does not mean that we are the kind of people that will go back some place where there is no improvement. We offered to the people out of this committee the Thomas bill, the Thomas bill which recognizes the problem of jurisdictional disputes, which recognizes the problem of national emergencies, which recognizes the problem of some secondary boycotts, but which permits a free latitude of expression on the part of labor and management.

Now, I will ask the final question, Mr. Randolph: Do you approve or disapprove of the main provisions of the Thomas bill, S. 249?

Mr. RANDOLPH. My written statement indicated that we were, in spite of some objections we might otherwise made, for it as it is submitted by the chairman of this committee, completely, for speedy action by the Congress to get rid of the Taft-Hartley law, and for its trial to see if there is any justification in the thought that it may have some things that will not work out.

We are willing to take whatever risks there may be in it if we can get it adopted and get it adopted at once so as to be rid of that persecution that comes through the Taft-Hartley law

Senator HUMPHREY. That is all I have to say.

Senator NEELY. May I ask one more question?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Neely.

Senator NEELY. Mr. Randolph, in view of all that has been said and read and heard from the counsel table here, and in view of your experience under the Taft-Hartley law, under the operation of which your union has had to spend more than $11,000,000 in 16 or 17 months to defend itself, would it be an exaggeration to say in Shakespearian language what was said in the first scene of Macbeth: "It has been a visitation to your union of double, double toil and trouble, fire burn, and caldron bubble." Would that be an exaggeration or would that be accurate?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I believe that would be a very great understatement, Senator.

Senator NEELY. This is the way I characterized it in my campaign, and I still believe that is probably a better characterization than that, that is, that so far as union labor is concerned, it has proved to be the abomination of desolation spoken of by the prophet Daniel. Would you agree with that?

Mr. RANDOLPH. As the printer says, you can put my slug over that.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Randolph, for coming. We stand in recess.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that I be permitted to read the record and correct any obvious mistakes that I have made?

The CHAIRMAN. That is always allowed, Mr. Randolph.

Mr. RANDOLPH. And may I also submit for the record a list of other statements in the American Newspaper Publishers bulletin concerning how the publishers themselves accept the attitude of Mr. Taft and Mr. Shroyer regarding our union?

The CHAIRMAN. That is all right, if you will expedite it as fast as you can so we can complete the record. We will appreciate that.

(Whereupon, at 10:10 p. m., the hearing was recessed, to reconvene at 9:30 a. m., Monday, February 14, 1949.)

TAFT-HARTLEY AND THE ITU

THE PUBLIC INTEREST DEMANDS REPEAL OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY LAW AND REENACTMENT OF THE WAGNER ACT AS THE FIRST DUTY OF THE EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS

(Issued January 28, 1949, by the International Typographical Union)

Ever since the Taft-Hartley Act finally became law on August 22, 1947, the International Typographical Union and its 90,000 members have been continuously bedeviled by a course of litigation without parallel or precedent in the history of labor relations in the United States. Why was this old (organized in 1852), democratically operated, honest, and experienced union singled out for attack? What were the issues. What are the lessons to be drawn from this experience? The apparently imminent repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act may make such questions seem academic—yet the issues involved are vital and it would be a mistake to dismiss these cases as merely last year's litigation.

THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

On June 22, 1947, Congress passed, over the President's veto, the Taft-Hartley Act. The impact of that statute on the principal ambitions of the International Typographical Union and all other labor unions was catastrophic. It clearly outlawed the closed shop and put into question the right of union men to refuse to work with competing nonunion men. It jeopardized the practice in the printing industry of hiring in order of seniority (called "priority" in the trade.) The asserted power of the employer to hire whomever he wished opened up the prospect that employers would freely displace union members with nonunion men, thereby threatening the job of every union member and the existence of the ITU itself. In section 8 (b) (4) (D) the act appeared to say that a union might not strike to protect its jurisdiction; if the employer chose to assign work to nonunion men in a particular "trade, craft, or class," the ITU would then be helpless to protect its existence and the jobs of its members. It made illegal any strike or "concerted refusal * * * to handle or work on any goods * * * where an object thereof is * * * forcing or requiring any employer * * * to cease using * * * or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor or manufacturer * * *." That meant that union men could be compelled, by force of law and the courts, to act as strikebreakers against their fellow unionists, and could be compelled to cut their own throats by working on products manufactured under substandard conditions. By requiring the ITU to "bargain collectively" (as later interpreted) it threw in doubt the operation of all union rules (called "laws" of the ITU).

The penalties were Draconian. For certain strikes the ITU might face (1) a mandatory injunction at the behest of the general counsel of the NLRB; (2) suits for violation of contract; (3) damage suits by any person injured, no matter how remotely; (4) loss of employe status for those participating in the strike, and (5) unfair-labor-practice proceedings before the NLRB. Any violation of any kind entitled employers to one or more of these remedies.

In considering the problems raised by Taft-Hartley, President Randolph and the other members of the executive council of the ITU retained certain convictions. One was that the right of workers to form and join trade unions was, as Chief Justice Hughes had said in NLRB v. Jones and Laughlin Steel Co. (301 U. S. 1 (1937)) a "fundamental right" which did not depend on the benevolence or charity of the Government but arose out of the right of free men to band together for lawful purposes. They therefore rejected, out of hand, the concept of the Taft-Hartley Act that trade-unionism was a Government grant, which could be conferred or withheld at the pleasure of Congress. A second was, as the August 1947 convention of the ITU subsequently expressed it, that "there should not be, and will not be, any attempt on the part of the international or subordinate unions to violate any valid provisions of this law, or of any law, Federal or State." And a third was that a meek submission to this monstrous assault on settled liberties and traditional practices could mean only death for the union. Obedience to the law did not require that every worst interpretation of its provisions by the employers in the industry or the general counsel of the NLRB had to be accepted, or that methods might not legitimately be sought to avoid its worst consequences.

This was also the mood of the delegates to the ITU convention, held at Cleveland in August, 1947. The ITU has traditionally had two political parties among its members, and unanimous action of the delegates to its conventions is rare. But, unanimously, that convention adopted a collective bargaining policy which was the united answer of the ITU to Taft-Hartley.

THE COLLECTIVE-BARGAINING POLICY

From early in the nineteenth century, until about 1886, the collective-bargaining agreement was an almost unknown phenomenon in the United States. The employer, in "recognizing" a union, accepted the union rules covering wages, hours, and working conditions, without a written memorial of those terms—which were to be found in the union's rules and laws. Even in 1947, almost a quarter of the ITU's 850 local unions had no written agreements; the same remains true of many other craft unions. After careful study of the Taft-Hartley Act and full debate, the ITU convention concluded that the written collective-bargaining agreements was, under that act, loaded with excessive and legalistic baggage. If a union, holding a contract, took steps to protect its existence against employer efforts to destroy it, it could be sued for breach of contract with consequent heavy financial liability. The freedom of action of union members was, under such conditions, nullified, while the employer was left free to operate as he might against the union's interests. Having in mind a half century of its history, and the experience of a fourth of its locals, the convention resolved to manage without collective agreements to the extent possible. While not a complete protection against Taft-Hartley, this policy at least removed one major impediment to the exercise of the right of self-defense.

And so, ironically, the union which had been in the van of the movement for the collective-bargaining agreement found that under Taft-Hartley it was preferable to return to older methods of doing business under "scales of prices," now called conditions of employment. The ITU did not contemplate the abandonment of collective bargaining, as was widely misrepresented; discussions and understandings with employers were expressly anticipated. But both employers and local unions were to be free to reopen matters at any time; the policy thereby approached collective bargaining realistically, as a continuing process, rather than as a sporadic affair to be engaged in at stated intervals of 1 to 2 years.

But, in the intervening years since 1886, some observers had made a fetish of the collective agreement. Instead of looking to the realities of labor-management relations—the peaceful accommodation of industrial problems through discussion and compromise—they looked to one outward form: the written agreement. For such observers the question was never: Are relations between the parties good? but: Is the agreement between the parties properly written, sealed, and signed by duly authorized agents? and the like. These prejudices were rudely shaken by a union policy that looked to the realities of collective bargaining rather than to its forms.

And more sinister forces were at work. Since the early 1900's, the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, through its special standing committee on labor relations, had been fighting the laws of the ITU, and thereby sought to break down the principle of democratic trade-union action. It had been their uninterrupted ambition that the "laws" of the union should be treated, not as a compact among the members as to the conditions under which they would sell their labor, but as a mere starting point, to be diluted through chaffering, haggling, and arbitration. Taft-Hartley was the golden opportunity to gain a vital point—to make certain that decisions would not be made by the members of the union, but by the employers, or third parties, or a combination of both. If the union laws could be sufficiently compromised at enough points, a gradual but inevitable reduction in union standards would be assured, to the clear benefit of the employers in the industry. To these ambitions the National Association of Manufacturers and the Chamber of Commerce gave a sympathetic attention for it was clear that if the ITU policy were successful and spread to other unions it threatened the hard-won gains which large corporations thought they had achieved through the Taft-Hartley Act.

Against this policy of the ITU the proponents of Taft-Hartley swung into prompt action. The delegates to the ITU convention had scarcely left their seats before Thomas Schroyer general counsel for Senator Taft's Labor Committee, speaking to the Printing Industry of America convention, denounced the policy as "illegal"—long before any NLRB hearings had been held or decisions reached. Elisha Hanson, counsel for the ANPA, distributed opinions to all newspaper publishers, advising them that they should refuse to discuss wages, hours, or working conditions with the ITU until the ITU first agreed to a "legal" contract—meaning thereby his definition of "legal."

DENHAM MOVES IN

The first NLRB case arose in Baltimore. There the commercial printing employers filed charges, alleging that the ITU and Baltimore local No. 12 were "refusing to bargain collectively," despite the fact that numerous meetings had been held and that the employers, following the ANPA line, had themselves refused to discuss wages, hours, and other conditions of work. A complaint was issued on September 26, 1947, setting a hearing for October 6.

October 6 was also, interestingly enough, the opening date of the American Federation of Labor Convention at San Francisco, which the principal officers of the ITU were, of course, required to attend. That convention was to run until October 20, and in view of the importance of the case, the ITU asked a postponement until after October 20 in order that the officers of the union might attend the hearing. General Counsel Denham (the prosecuting officer, who, under Taft-Hartley, decides such matters) granted the postponement to October 13; an obviously deliberate and malicious effort to force the officers of the ITU to choose between the A. F. of L. convention and the Baltimore hearing.

In the meantime, in view of the widespread employer attacks on the collective-bargaining policy of the ITU, and the complaints of illegality by Denham, the executive council of the ITU determined to propose a form of contract to employers. The form which was used (later known as form P6A) was unashamedly and deliberately devised to protect the ITU and its locals against efforts of employers to destroy it, and to take advantage of the few recourses left by Taft-

Hartley. For that very reason, it met with immediate and stubborn opposition by employers. Their attorneys advised it was "illegal" (though every clause in it, with a single exception, was subsequently held lawful by some trial examiner of the NLRB). The new willingness of the ITU to enter into collective agreements did not deter the NLRB general counsel. The Baltimore hearing went forward as scheduled.

In late October, after 10 days of hearing, that case concluded. In November, the general counsel moved to reopen the hearing to add a complaint that the ITU had caused the employers to "discriminate" against nonunion men, though there was no individual brought forward, then or at any time during the course of this entire litigation, who could testify that he had been discriminated against as the result of any action by the ITU. The motion was granted, a 1 day hearing was held in early December, and the record was closed. Yet it was April 20, 1948, before the trial examiner issued an intermediate report, a period of about 6 months from the real close of the hearing in late October. There the case has rested; to this time the NLRB has not even heard oral argument on the exceptions to the report which were filed by the ITU, much less reached a decision. This is the speed with which administrative procedures move under the Taft-Hartley Act.

In the meantime, events moved forward in other quarters. A strike had been in progress between the Nassau County, N. Y., local of the ITU and the Daily Review Corp., a newspaper publisher. With the direct participation of the ANPA, charges were filed and a complaint issued in early November 1947 by General Counsel Denham against the ITU and its local. The hearing began in December 1947; the complaint covered substantially the identical matters which had already been heard in the Baltimore case and relied on substantially identical testimony. Charges had been filed by a member of the union against the employer, charging that he had refused to bargain. In his report, issued on June 7, 1948, the trial examiner found that the employer had refused to bargain collectively. Nevertheless, Denham dismissed the charges which had been filed against the company, and refused to proceed with them. In this case, too, there has been no argument before the Board, and no decision by it, though half a year has elapsed since the case was transferred to the Board for decision.

On November 10, 1947, Denham had issued yet another complaint against the Los Angeles local and the ITU; a subsequent agreement between the employers and the local union resulted in dropping of the case. But it was clear that Denham did not intend to leave decision of these matters to the processes of the act. The issuance of three complaints, containing substantially identical allegations and relying on the same evidence, could spring only from a desire to so to harass the ITU by litigation that it could cry quits before any decisions could be obtained. The attorneys for the ITU therefore approached Denham; they pointed to the expense to the union of litigating the cases already in process, the waste of Government funds involved in continually relitigating the same matters on the same evidence, and asked a halt in the issuance of complaints until the cases already heard were decided by the Board.

The answer was prompt. On November 21, 1947, Denham issued yet another complaint—this time on charges filed directly by the ANPA. The complaints previously issued had been limited to a single local union and the ITU; this complaint covered all newspapers wherever located throughout the United States. Its scope was unlimited and was sufficiently broad to cover all negotiations of the ITU with any newspaper anywhere in the United States after August 22, 1947. Again, the allegations were identical with those already tried, and it was evident that Denham was relying on the same evidence which had been used in previous cases.

On December 7, 1947, that hearing opened. Fourteen attorneys were present representing the newspaper interests and the general counsel. At the outset of the hearing one outstandingly important legal issue presented itself. The ITU is not a bargaining agent; local unions conduct collective-bargaining negotiations. The complaint in the ANPA case did not charge that the ITU had refused to bargain collectively, but claimed that the ITU had "restrained and coerced" its locals into refusing to bargain. If this claim constituted a violation of the act, then hearings would be required in each local situation to determine whether the ITU had in fact "restrained or coerced" its locals; if not, the hearings could be speedy and inexpensive, since hearings on local negotiations in many cities of the United States could be avoided. The ITU, therefore, moved to dismiss that allegation on the ground that it did not charge a violation of the statute. The trial examiner agreed with the ITU and struck the allegation, though denying the motion of counsel for the ITU to strike other allegations.

The general counsel thereupon announced that he would appeal the trial examiner's ruling to the NLRB, and attorneys for the ITU announced that they would cross-appeal. Telegrams to that effect were sent. Five days later, without hearing argument or allowing briefs to be submitted, the NLRB summarily reversed the trial examiner's ruling, denied the ITU's motion to appeal, granted the general counsel's motion to appeal, and reinstated the disputed allegation in the complaint. It thereby, without hearing, doomed the ITU to hearings which were not concluded until May 1948, and, ironically, when the question later arose, in another case, the NLRB adopted the position of the trial examiner and the ITU (Matter of National Maritime Union, 22 LRRM 1289). In reversing the trial examiner, the NLRB served notice on all unions that they could be forced to hearing on any allegation put forward by Denham, no matter how ill-founded as a matter of law, and that not even a right to be heard on the matter would be granted, even though the trial examiner agreed with the union's position.

Under this shotgun complaint, the general counsel began, on January 8, 1948, to hold hearings in Chicago, where the members of the ITU local had been on strike against the Chicago publishers since November 24, 1947. After there had been 10 days of hearings, at the usual great expense to the ITU, Denham through his Chicago regional office issued yet another complaint—this time against the ITU and its Chicago local. This complaint contained allegations practically identical to those of previous complaints, but covered matters on which the testimony had already been taken in Chicago. At the same time he announced that these cases would not be consolidated for hearing—that is, he proposed to repeat the identical evidence on identical allegations which had already been heard. Only the threat of counsel for the ITU to withdraw from the case entirely, as a clear denial of due process, produced a change in this ruling and allowed consolidation of the cases.

Not until January 26, 1948 (over 2 months from the time the complaint was issued), did the general counsel supply the ITU with a list of the cities where hearings were planned to be held pursuant to the ITU demand for a bill of particulars. Then began a traveling circus: Hearings at Detroit, Buffalo, Albany, and Washington, covering places dispersed throughout the United States. In May 1948, the hearings concluded; in August 1948, the trial examiner issued his intermediate report. That case has not yet been heard or decided by the Board.

THE INJUNCTION

One would suppose that the issuance of five complaints involving the same issues and evidence would satisfy the most litigious maw. Not so. On January 16, 1948, the general counsel applied for an injunction under section 10 (j) of the act in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Indiana, based again, of course, upon the same allegations and the same evidence. But here the general counsel was under no burden of proving a case; under the act it is enough if his agent has "reasonable cause to believe" that the law is being violated. Since the final decision in the case was to be made by the NLRB, and not by the court, the ITU attacked the constitutionality of section 10 (j) on the ground that it did not confer judicial power on a constitutional court; it further argued that section 10 (j) clearly contemplated that such actions were to be brought by the Board and not by Denham and that the Board had not given such power to Denham. At the argument before the court, for the first time and with the obvious consent of the Board, a document called a confidential memorandum was produced, dated August 1947, whereby the Board conferred this power on the general counsel. No explanation was ever given why it was thought that this was confidential or why it had not been brought to the attention of litigants before the Board. The court overruled the contentions of the ITU and the matter proceeded to hearing on the merits.

The obvious purpose of the proceeding was to break the strike of Chicago local No. 16, yet the intervention of that local in the case was denied. It was the arrogant contention of the general counsel that the ITU might not even offer proof refuting his unproved allegations. After hearing, on March 27, 1948, the court issued a sweeping injunction, in almost exactly the form asked by the general counsel, and made findings of fact almost exactly those asked by the general counsel (see 21 L. R. R. M. 2375, 2553). The ITU was enjoined from refusing to bargain collectively, from asking for "conditions of employment," from using Form P6A, from asking that agreements be canceled on 60 days' notice, from seeking to cause employers to discriminate against nonunion men, from attempting to maintain closed-shop conditions, or from supporting strikes for any of those purposes. The only matters not enjoined were those which the general counsel himself had dropped from the case for want of proof.

In view of the injunction, conferences were arranged with attorneys for the general counsel and the court concerning the method of compliance with the decree. A program was agreed upon, by which the ITU agreed to drop the demands found by the court to be illegal and not to support strikes for such demands. The ITU announced the form of agreement which it would seek, and an understanding was reached in the presence of the court that any allegations of contempt of the decree would be informally discussed between counsel before any contempt action was brought. The Chicago local withdrew the demands found to be illegal and presented the type of agreement which had been approved. The publishers, rejected the offer, as they had every other offer made by the union, thereby effectively giving the lie to the publishers' claim that the strike was for an "illegal" contract. The strike continued.

Since the court denied a stay of the injunction pending appeal, the ITU was faced with the problem whether to appeal an order which they strongly felt to be erroneous. The injunction was "temporary," valid only until the NLRB decided the case. It seemed probable that the NLRB would decide the case before the circuit court of appeals could act on the appeal, in which event the injunction would dissolve, the appeal would be moot, and the costs of the appeal would be for nothing. Relying on reasonable expedition by the NLRB, therefore, the appeal was dropped. The sequel shows that this reliance was entirely misplaced; even so, it is evident that under section 10 (j) one man can enjoin trade-union if he can assert a "reasonable belief" that the law has been violated, and that for all practical purposes there is no appeal from this injunction once it issues.

THE PIA CASES

Six proceeding, some of them simultaneous, were hardly enough by way of harassment of the ITU. The employers in the newspaper industry had their hearings and their injunction action, but the commercial employers, except at Baltimore, had not yet sufficiently experienced Mr. Denham's solicitude. On January 21, 1948, yet another complaint issued, again containing identical allegations and relying on the same evidence. This time complaints of the commercial employers in New York, Philadelphia, Newark, Chicago, Detroit, and Pittsburgh, were consolidated for hearing, and a junket paralleling that in the ANPA case was proposed, this time on behalf of the Printing Industry of America. In the middle of February the ITU and its local offered to be bound in the PIA case by any one, or any combination that the general counsel might select, of the cases which had been litigated. This he refused. Thereupon, on February 24, 1948, the ITU counsel addressed a letter to the Board and the trial examiner calling attention to the facts and withdrawing from the PIA case. It is notable that at no time did the members of the NLRB take any slightest step (though through their control over the trial examiners they had the clear power to do so) to abate or diminish this compaign of vexatious litigation. The hearings were held, but the ITU and its locals were not there.

Nevertheless, on May 26, the trial examiner issued his intermediate report. One sentence of that report deserves quotation (report, p. 60): "The insistence by ITU * * * that the employers surrender * * * their right to bargain with respect to * * * ITU laws, their right to hire and fire whoever (sic) they please, their right to assign work to any employee they deem competent, and the right to accept business from whomever they please * * * cannot be considered * * * bona fide collective bargaining." In short, his conclusion was that under Taft-Hartley a union may not bargain concerning union security, jurisdiction, or struck or substandard work (three essential points of trade-unionism), but must bargain with respect to the rules formulated by the democratic action of its members. He concluded, therefore, that not only are strikes for these objectives forbidden, but that collective bargaining about them is also illegal under Taft-Hartley (except where the employers desire it, as in the case of union laws). Can it possibly be doubted, in view of such a ruling, that the objective of Taft-Hartley and of at least one trial examiner (Howard Meyers) of the NLRB is the extinction of the trade-union movement?

SUMMARY OF THE REPORTS

An analysis of the complaints issued, and intermediate reports written, shows that there were 22 important issues involved in these cases. Five intermediate reports have been issued, and on 17 issues of these 22 the trial examiners, who heard substantially the same evidence, have disagreed. Most of these issues are basic in understanding the Taft-Hartley Act, and are of enduring importance to the labor movement; the area of disagreement indicates more clearly than a reading of the act itself its basic confusions, uncertainties, and contradictions. The issues on which the examiners disagreed involved such matters as whether the demand for a contract clause may cause employers to discriminate, whether a union can coerce its locals or its members by enforcing the rules of the union, whether a demand that foremen be union members is valid, whether a rule requiring resetting of type is lawful, whether a union may protect its jurisdiction through collective bargaining, whether a demand for a struck work clause in an agreement is valid, whether a union may demand that a certain degree of competence shall be shown before an applicant is hired, whether a union may supervise apprentice training and the like. The practical effect of these confusions and uncertainties has been to bring collective bargaining in this industry (and in others) to a halt. Instead of discussing terms and conditions of work, the parties have been forced to engage in interminable legalistic discussions.

The most recent ridiculous illustration has been the refusal of a large Louisville, Ky., employer to negotiate further until he could have a Washington, D. C., attorney, as well as a local attorney, represent him. Obviously a small union cannot hope to hire attorneys of equal prominence and feels unequal to the occasion.

Ten months have now elapsed since the first of these cases was transferred to the Board. There has been no oral argument of them, and no decision in any case. Indeed, in the PIA case the Board refused to decide whether to reopen the case at the request of the ITU to show that agreements had been reached with employers at Chicago, Newark, and Philadelphia, as a defense to a charge of a refusal to bargain collectively. Instead, on November 8, 1948, it "reserved ruling" and now appears to be uncertain whether the reaching of an agreement is some evidence that there has been bargaining in good faith. Instead of expedition in deciding these vital issues, there has been stalling and an obvious and deliberate delay in coming to grips with the cases. Under the rules of the Board itself, the ANPA case, in which an injunction is outstanding, is entitled to a "priority"—and still there has been no argument of the matter.

THE CONTEMPT CASE

The Chicago publishers had supposed that the original injunction action would be sufficient to break the strike of local No. 16; when that effort failed, they nevertheless continued their efforts to use Denham and his powers to serve their purposes. How they finally achieved that objective is best described in the article of Mr. Henry Kaiser, attorney for the ITU, which appeared in the October issue of the Typographical Journal and the American Federationist. Once the "heat" had been put on by Senator Taft, Denham moved in with contempt action. On August 15, 1948, a petition alleging contempt of the decree was filed, its purpose was not concealed; the prayer for relief asked that the ITU be required to "cancel, discontinue, and withhold the payment of strike benefits or other moneys to local No. 16 (Chicago) or its members in support of said strike."

The complaint was based on the ground that the ITU, by seeking "competency" clauses whereby applicants for jobs were required to demonstrate their competency before being eligible for hire, were "causing employers to discriminate" in violation of Taft-Hartley and the injunction; that by asking that union foremen be employed it was seeking to cause discrimination; and that certain "joint apprentice committee" clauses violated the act because they did not provide for the appointment of a neutral tie-breaker in the event of a disagreement between the parties. The first of these matters had not been in issue in the injunction cases; the second had been expressly withdrawn in the injunction case by the general counsel; and no previous question concerning a "tie-breaker" had been raised.

Admittedly, the general counsel knew that these clauses were being proposed by the ITU in early April 1947; he had expressly agreed to raise any such matters informally with the ITU before a contempt action was instituted. Yet for 6 months he sat idly by while these clauses were agreed to by the parties in collective contracts of great importance, and not until a few days before the complaint was filed was any question raised with the ITU. No investigation of the facts in possession of the ITU was ever made before this compaint was filed. Ten days before the contempt action was instituted, the trial examiner in the ANPA case had issued his intermediate report, and found the identical conduct covered by the contempt action to be lawful. Having lost before the trial examiner, Denham therefore had another go at the same issues through a contempt action.

On October 14, 1948, Judge Swygert issued his findings in the contempt case. He found that certain "competency" clauses were unlawful, but that others used by the ITU were lawful; he approved the union foreman clauses; and he ordered that a tie-breaker clause should be included in the apprentice clauses. He expressly found the Chicago strike to be not unlawful, and refused to cut off strike benefits. The strike continues.

SUMMARY

This record demonstrates that the Taft-Hartley Act has been administered in a partisan and proemployer spirit. It shows that the NLRB has stood supinely by without lifting a finger to check the deliberate campaign of intimidation waged by its general counsel, and that its procedures are so stalled and confused that they becloud issues rather than deciding them. Twice a Federal district judge has decided cases, during a period when the NLRB has decided none.

It would be erroneous to conclude that a mere change of personnel or procedures would remedy these problems, for the issues go much deeper. Basic to an understanding of them is the economic fact, as Justice Stone pointed out in Apex Hosiery Co. v. Leader (310 U. S. 469 (1940)), that "an elimination of price competition based on differences in labor standards is the objective of any national labor organization." The purpose of any trade union is to raise wages and working standards by agreement among workers that they will cooperate to that end rather than compete with each other to see which will work for the lowest wages. And to make that compact effective, certain goals must be accomplished.

First, workers must agree among themselves upon the conditions under which they will sell their labor. This compact is accomplished in the ITU by the "laws" of the union. In local unions each member has a direct vote on the adoption of a law; the laws of the international are adopted either by freely chosen representatives of the local unions, or by the referendum vote of all members. Apart from specific laws alleged to violate the Taft-Hartley Act, the entire system of union rules or laws has been thrown into doubt by the Taft-Hartley Act requirement that unions "bargain collectively." The employers and General Counsel Denham have consistently maintained that Taft-Hartley requires each of these rules to be renegotiated in each bargaining meeting with employers. Clearly, the compact between union members ceases to exist if it must be bargained away on the demand of any employer.

Second, trade-unions must eliminate the competition from nonunion men working in the same craft, whose unwillingness to accept the rules binding the majority is a constant threat to the union standards. If the employer may, without protest, hire nonunion men, he has the effective power to replace union workers with nonunion men and thus to deprive them of their jobs and their union. There are strong incentives to do just that, since normally nonunion men are willing to work for lower wages and standards than union members. The closed-shop agreement is the employer's declaration that he does not intend to undermine the union or its standards by hiring nonunion men. Since membership in the ITU is entirely voluntary—and is open to all printers who have demonstrated their competence at their craft—the closed-shop agreement does not compel anyone to join the union; there always have been, and are now, many printers who are not ITU members.

Third, every trade-union is faced with the competition of nonunion, or underpaid workers, in the same enterprise. For example, varityping is a new process in the printing trades. It is cumbersome, wasteful, and uneconomic, as is demonstrated by the fact that it has been used solely as a strikebreaking device. But when operated by workers earning wages well below the union scale it may approach economic competition with sounder methods, solely as the result of wage-cutting. To control such competing processes is the problem of union "jurisdiction"; hence, the ITU laws have long provided that "all composing room work or any machinery or process appertaining to printing and the preparations therefore belongs to and is under the jurisdiction of the ITU (General Laws, art. III, sec. 12).

Fourth, it must be recalled that few unions succeed in organizing all of a trade. The ITU, and the fair employers under agreements with it, have always faced the competition of nonunion employers whose lower wage costs give them a competitive advantage. While this form of wage-cutting competition can perhaps never be eliminated, it can be controlled in a measure by a union rule, such as that of the ITU, stating that "subordinate unions at all times have the right to define as struck work composition executed wholly or in part by nonmembers, and composition or other work coming from or destined for printing concerns declared by the union to be unfair, after which union members may refuse to handle the work classified as struck work (General Laws, art. III, sec. 5).

This union law has two important consequences. First, it assures that union men will not act as strikebreakers against their fellow union members by doing the work normally performed by strikers, and, second, it means that union men will not facilitate the free entry into the market of sweatshop goods by processing materials coming from wage-cutting shops.

We have shown how the Taft-Hartley Act and the interpretations of it by the general counsel of the NLRB have threatened each of these basic trade-union objectives. The closed-shop agreement is abolished, and it is argued that the act means that union men may be compelled to work with competing nonunion men. Doubt is cast on a union's right to strike to protect its jurisdiction or against the employer's assignment of work to a particular trade, craft, or class. The right of union men to refuse to work on struck or substandard goods is clearly made illegal; while, at the same time, the right of employers to assist each other in an economic dispute is left completely untouched. Any one of these Taft-Hartley prohibitions is sufficient to destroy a union; their cumulative impact is utterly disastrous.

Until Taft-Hartley was passed there had been a large measure of peace in the printing industry; the last major strike had been in 1922. Since the act was passed the ITU has expended over $11,000,000 of hard-earned dues in strike benefits and other forms of activity to protect its existence and that of its local unions. Much of its time and attention has had to be focused, not on improving conditions in the trade, but on a defensive battle in aid of trade-unionism itself.

The experience of the ITU demonstrates that the modern, streamlined Taft-Hartley injunction is even more vicious than its predecessors issued before passage of the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932. These injunctions are granted employers substantially without cost, since the expense of obtaining them is borne by the NLRB. Indeed, the ITU was ordered to pay back to the NLRB nearly $5,000 to cover the cost of the action against it, including the salaries of Government agents (paid from public funds) who "investigated" the case without once approaching the ITU. The injunction against the ITU was couched in the usual vague and sweeping language; as a consequence, collective bargaining in the industry has not been with employers, but with Government agents speaking for employers, and has not been concerned with wages and hours, but with the meaning of a judicial document. Meantime, the employers have been left scot-free of any restraints; while it is a contempt of court for the ITU to propose the use of "Conditions of employment" without a written contract, employers have been free to, and have, used them with impunity.

The consequence has been a notorious interference by the NLRB and the courts in the internal affairs of the union. The enforcement of union laws, democratically adopted by the union membership, is branded as "restraint of coercion" by the international union against its locals; but any failure to secure the most rigid adherence to the terms of the injunction by local unions is automatically a contempt of court. Some thirty-odd laws of the ITU have been attacked as illegal under Taft-Hartley; in such confusion, no union member can know his rights or duties. Yet the price of not knowing is a possible contempt action.

Nor is this the whole story. On countless occasions the prohibitions of Taft-Hartley have prevented local unions from taking necessary steps to win economic battles. These incidents, since they have not resulted in litigation, have received scant attention. For example, when the printers of the Chicago newspapers struck in November 1947, the newspaper publishers sent their advertisements for setting to commercial printing firms in Chicago whose employees were members of the same local union that was conducting the newspaper strike. Had the union refused to handle such struck goods, all the penalties of the Taft-Hartley Act could immediately have been invoked. The union was, therefore, forced to endure a situation in which some members of a local union worked as strikebreakers against others. Similar instances could be multiplied throughout the country.

The tortuous and contradictory language of the act has all but stymied collective bargaining. Normally, local unions of the ITU have been parties to a total of 1,200 contracts; at present the figure is only slightly more than 100 because almost every proposal made by the ITU since the act was passed has been speciously branded by some employers and their attorneys as "illegal." A complex legal ingenuity has been used to find illegality in proposals which have been a commonplace in collective agreements for half a century. These legalistic disputes have caused delay, bred strife, and caused strikes; they have deprived local unions of improvements in conditions which but for Taft-Hartley they would clearly have obtained.

CONCLUSIONS

From this experience the ITU has drawn certain conclusions:

1. Most emphatically, Taft-Hartley should be repealed and the Wagner Act reenacted until appropriate substitute legislation can be devised. The personnel administering Federal labor policy should be required to have at least an elementary understandig of the labor movement and of the high price of bureaucratic delays.

2. The role of the Federal Government in labor relations should be reduced to a bare minimum, and any rules adopted should be applicable to all industry affecting interstate commerce. No provisions should be retained which impinge on the freedom of either employers or unions in the collective-bargaining process itself.

3. The same free right of competition which is recognized for employers should be recognized for unions. Specifically, the right of unions to seek new members where and when they will, their right to seek allies by peaceable means in an economic dispute, their right to adopt laws governing the conditions under which their members will seek employment, and their right to enter into such agreements as may be desirable to the contracting parties should in no respect be infringed—any more than the corresponding rights of employers should be.

4. Legislation should be brief, thought-through, and clear. Workers cannot expect to govern their conduct, or know their rights, under legislation which is complex and confused.

5. There cannot be free collective bargaining where any restraints on the right to strike exist. The labor injunction, in every form, must go. Such rights or remedies as are available to trade-unions and workers should not be restricted by any limiting conditions on their enjoyment.

The Wagner Act recognized labor unions to be absolutely essential to our economy. It recognized employers were interfering to prevent unions from forming or functioning. It recognized the need for protecting by law the right of employees to organize and function as labor unions.

It declared the policy of the United States to encourage collective bargaining and to protect the right to do so for the purpose of negotiating terms and conditions of employment.

It did not propose to stop strikes because the right to strike is necessary to preserve freedom and to avoid totalitarianism of any kind whether fascism, nazism, or communism. The right to strike is a part and legal necessity of the right to organize and bargain collectively.

There is no constitutional authority in our Government to force employees, individually or collectively to render service to any employer. Our Constitution does provide clearly that there shall be no involuntary servitude except as a punishment for crime. To protect only the individual (as Taft-Hartley does) in the right to quit work under any circumstances is to deny the necessity for organization of workers.

The ITU has paid a heavy price to survive, and to uphold the fundamentals of trade-unionism. That investment will not be lost if sufficient legislators, judges, labor administrators, trade-unionists and members of the public generally absorb the conclusions to be drawn from the harrowing, and, we trust, never-to-be-repeated, experience which has been herein summarized. While the briefs and transcripts of hearings gather dust in Government archives, the damages inflicted will not be forgotten.

WHY WAS THE INTERNATIONAL TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION HELD IN CONTEMPT OF COURT?

A Case for Repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act

A factual report showing the abuses under Taft-Hartley Act as it was applied to the International Typographical Union

(Issued by the International Typographical Union February 3, 1949)

On October 14, 1948, Judge Swygert, sitting in the United States Court for the Southern District of Indiana, found the International Typographical Union and its officers to be in contempt of court for violating an injunction issued under the Taft-Hartley Act. Normally, contempt of court is a serious charge, reserved for conduct which is felt to be seriously detrimental to the public welfare. What crime had the ITU and its officers committed? Just this—and nothing more. They had proposed certain clauses for inclusion in contracts in the course of collective bargaining with employers, which clauses some employers had rejected and others had accepted. No violence, no fraud, no misrepresentation was claimed.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act, a group of honest, law-abiding trade unionists can be, and were, haled before the court and subjected to the possibility of heavy fines or even imprisonment for merely making certain proposals in the course of collective bargaining. The proceeding was instituted, not by employers, but by the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board—who thereby again exercised the dangerous powers given him under the Taft-Hartley Act even to determine what proposals a union might make in the course of collective bargaining.

BACKGROUND

The origins of this contempt case lie far back in American trade union history. Very early in the 1800's, the budding local printing unions—called typographical societies—learned that, in order to improve the living standards of their members it was necessary to eliminate, so far as possible, the competition of the sweatshop employer, who survived in the trade, despite his inefficiency, by paying wages below those paid by fair employers to union members. The simplest way of not aiding such an employer in his wage-cutting tactics was an agreement among union members not to work for him—called "ratting" in the printing trades—and to work only for fair employers. As a consequence of this policy, the printing industry has been traditionally divided between nonunion shops, "closed" to union members, and "union" shops wherein the employer agreed to the standards, fixed by the democratic action of the members of the union, as the conditions under which they would sell their labor.

When, about 1886, the collective agreement made its appearance, the fair employers inserted in their contracts a clause agreeing to hire only members of the union. In the course of time, by a curious inversion, the term "closed shop" which once meant that union men would not work there, came to be applied to the agreement that only union men would be taken on. Such undertakings were valuable from the employer's point of view. Since most skilled men in the industry have been, and are, union members, it meant that the employer had a readily available pool of skilled men from which to man his enterprise. Union members have traditionally, and for clear reasons, had an antipathy to working with competing nonunion men who were ready to undermine the standards of the craft; such an agreement assured the employer of harmony in his composing room. By assisting in the elimination of sweatshop competition, it assured the employer that he might operate his business with a greater security than was otherwise possible.

From the point of view of the union and its members, the benefits of the closed-shop agreement are equally self-evident. It provides a pool of jobs at fair wages and conditions for union members. It means job security, for the pressure of semiskilled competitors, willing to work at lower wages, is eliminated. It means a strong and stable union, able to bargain on an equal basis with employers. The agreement of the employers not to hire outside the ranks of the union gives an assurance that he does not intend to undermine the union in the shop or to undercut its standards. It facilitates the mobility of printers, for union conditions are the same in New York as in San Francisco and the union member going into a new situation knows exactly what is expected of him. And, under these agreements, the practice of hiring in order of seniority, known as priority in the trade, has been in effect for a great many years for the protection of the employees and the benefit of the industry.

The strength and stability of the locals of the International Typographical Union have been matched by strong and stable employer associations with which collective bargaining has been locally conducted. Under these arrangements, there were few strikes—the last major one was in 1922. Notable strides have been made in employer-union cooperation; for example, in New York City ITU Local No. 6 and the employer associations jointly financed for many years a school for the training of apprentices in the trade. The ITU, through its bureau of education, has undertaken to supervise the training of most apprentices at the trade in localities where facilities such as those in New York could not be provided. Printing is a skilled craft—and for more than a century the ITU has dedicated itself to assuring the highest possible standards of competence at the trade.

No one was ever excluded from the industry. Those who completed the course of lessons of the ITU and passed an examination to demonstrate their competency, were automatically eligible to union membership and to work at the trade; likewise, any competent printer could be admitted to local union membership upon proving himself qualified. Those in the industry who did not desire to join a union, or could not demonstrate the requisite skill, were free to work in the nonunion shops. The ITU includes in its membership persons of every race, creed, and color, and has never been, in any sense, a "closed union."

THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

Into this complex web of delicate relationships, laboriously constructed over the years by persons in close touch with the industry, the Taft-Hartley Act dropped like a meat-ax. It clearly made illegal the agreement by which the employer undertook to hire only union men. It thereby endangered the jobs of all union members, for it was insisted that the act gave the employer the unlimited right to hire whom he would and thereby to replace his union workers with nonunion lower-paid help. Under the act, the entire system of "priorities" was jeopardized. Unless jobs were available for its members, the ITU could have no interest in the training of apprentices, or in assuring the competence of its members at the trade. And, by the same token, if nonunion men and union men were to be equally entitled to jobs irrespective of their training, no applicant or apprentice would have an interest in meeting the competency tests required of union members. This one prohibition of the Taft-Hartley Act—to say nothing of another score of equally unwise provisions—threatened the free displacement of union members from their jobs, the hiring in their stead of those most willing to work for wages and standards below those gained by the ITU, the destruction of the apprentice training system, the dilution of craft standards, and the introduction of a chaotic and haphazard wage structure with a consequent throatcutting competition based solely on wage reductions.

It is unthinkable that any group of trade unionists, conscious of its responsibilities, should have taken no steps to meet these challenges. True, the Taft-Hartley Act legalized the so-called union shop agreement by which a newly hired employe might be compelled, 30 days after hiring, to join a union. But this could not be an answer for the ITU. First, the ITU has steadfastly opposed the concept of compulsory unionism; traditionally, printers have joined the ITU because they freely believed in the principles of trade unionism and because the ITU voluntarily desired to have them as members. The so-called union shop meant that the employer would determine who were to be ITU members. Second, the asserted freedom of the employer to hire as he liked opened the way for introducing into composing rooms notorious anti-unionists, or incompetents, or persons willing to undercut union standards. The ITU emphatically rejected this philosophy of the Taft-Hartley law.

The attitude of the industry concerning the closed shop was summed up by Mr. John O'Keefe, secretary of the Chicago Newspaper Publishers' Association, testifying on December 22, 1947, before a subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives inquiring into the causes of the Chicago newspaper strike, as follows:

"Congressman KERSTEN. Up until now and for a great many years past you had a closed-shop agreement, didn't you?

"Mr. O'KEEFE. Yes, we did.

"Mr. KERSTEN. How did that feature work out in your previous contracts, so far as your closed-shop provision of the contract was concerned?

"Mr. O'KEEFE. We never even discussed it. It had been there for years and it has remained there.

"Mr. KERSTEN. Did you have any real difficulty with it, so far as your union (the ITU) is concerned?

"Mr. O'KEEFE. We did not * * * as a matter of fact most of the Chicago publishers, or all of the Chicago publishers, I would say, would prefer to continue a closed shop if it were legal.

"Mr. KERSTEN. The reason for that is that this particular union has been a long-term institution that has a certain amount of tradition behind it, a considerable amount, and it is a responsible union, and under those conditions a closed shop has worked out so far as the Chicago publishers are concerned, is that right?

"Mr. O'KEEFE. Yes, it has."

Since these arrangements had been acceptable over many decades, the 1947 convention of the ITU adopted a collective bargaining policy, designed to perpetuate them without violating the law. While the closed-shop agreement was illegal, there appeared to be nothing in the law which outlawed closed-shop conditions. Despite a concerted barrage of misrepresentation to the contrary, the ITU has not asked for a closed-shop agreement since Taft-Hartley became law. It did, however, conceive that its members retained Constitutional rights to refuse to work with competing nonunion men. The convention, therefore, determined to waive the collective-bargaining agreement so far as possible and to rely on the economic strength of the union to prevent employer efforts to destroy it by the unlimited hiring of nonunion men.

Thereupon howls of anguish arose from employer ranks; some employers who, a few months before, had been unwilling to enter into written agreements with the ITU, now professed to find in this policy dangers which, in fact, were nonexistent. Most fair employers were willing to continue relations on a basis of a continuing discussion and settlement of differences without a formal collective agreement, and thereby indicated they had no intention of taking advantage of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act which allowed damage suits for breach of contract where a union was forced to take action to defend itself. But attacks upon this policy by the general counsel of the Senate Labor Committee, and the issuance of a complaint in September 1947, challenging its legality, at Baltimore, forced the ITU to reexamine its position.

The result was the offer by the ITU of a collective agreement known as Form P6A. As Trial Examiner Leff of the NLRB later found "It is clear from the record as a whole that P6A was not designed as a legally enforceable closed-shop contract, was not represented as such, and was not so understood." While employer attorneys exhausted their ingenuity in digging up grounds on which this agreement might be declared illegal, the heaviest attacks were made upon a clause allowing either party to cancel the agreement upon 60 days' notice (though such a clause had been standard in many collective agreements) and a clause stating, in substance, that since the ITU could not compel its members to work with nonunion men, their refusal to do so should not be considered a breach of the agreement. Various NLRB trial examiners subsequently found the 60-day cancellation clause unlawful on the ground that it "restrained and coerced" employers or caused them to "discriminate" against nonunion men; they disagreed concerning the legality of the second clause. In considering the claim that the ITU was seeking to cause "discrimination," it is significant that at no time since the act was passed was a single person produced who would even suggest that he had been discriminated against.

THE INJUNCTION

While these matters were proceeding in hearings throughout the country before various NLRB trial examiners, General Counsel Denham sought an injunction against the ITU. On March 27, 1948, Federal Judge Swygert issued an injunction which, in brief, enjoined the ITU and its officials in sweeping terms from refusing to "bargain collectively," from using Form P6A, clauses permitting cancellation of an agreement upon 60 days' notice, seeking to "cause employers to discriminate," or from supporting strikes for any of these purposes. There was no claim, no evidence, and no finding that the ITU or any member had engaged in any violence, fraud, misrepresentation, or other improper activity; the injunction was based solely upon proposals of a kind designed to protect its existence, made by the ITU and its locals in collective bargaining.

As a result of the injunction, an agreement was reached between the ITU and the NLRB general counsel concerning the method of complying with the decree. Part of this agreement consisted of instructions to be sent to local unions.

The restraints embodied in the injunction were bitter ones to swallow. Every trade-union will seek to protect the jobs of its members, and advance their job opportunities. To be told that the carrying out of this normal ambition represented a "discrimination" against nonunion men was like telling a Ford automobile salesman that he was "discriminating" against General Motors products and ordering him to plug the lines of both companies equally. Despite the manifest injustice of the law and the injunction from the point of view of the members of the ITU, it made every effort to comply with the injunction.

Almost contemporaneously with the issuance of the injunction, the New York commercial printing employers and Local 6 of the ITU had arrived at an agreement submitted by officers of the ITU. A clause in that agreement provided that a demonstration of competency at the trade was a prerequisite to employment. All present employees, and members of the ITU, were judged automatically competent (in view of the competency requirements for membership in the ITU) and all others were to be given an examination similar to that required for ITU membership. That clause was distributed to all ITU locals as meeting the requirements of the injunction. It came to the attention of the general counsel of the NLRB in early April 1948; thereafter it was accepted, with no objection from him, as the basis for contracts with employers in Detroit, Chicago, Philadelphia, Newark and other cities.

SENATOR TAFT INTERVENES

Since November 24, 1947, Local 16 of the ITU has been on strike against the Chicago newspaper publishers, who, following the advice given by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, had refused to discuss wages, hours, or other working conditions with the union unless and until Local 16 agreed to the publishers' definition of a "legal" contract. By complying with the injunction, the ITU had been able to continue its support of that strike, but the Chicago publishers by no means relinquished their efforts to induce General Counsel Denham of the NLRB to do some strikebreaking for them.

So it came about that a significant meeting was held in Senator Taft's office on July 28, 1948. Present were representatives of the Chicago publishers, Senator Taft, and NLRB attorneys—needless to say that the ITU was not represented. Senator Taft appears to have made it clear that he expected the NLRB attorneys to initiate contempt proceedings against the ITU. President Truman, on complaint of the ITU, caused an investigation of this meeting to be made and accurately characterized it as an effort of Senator Taft's to "put the heat on" the Executive branch of the Government.

But General Counsel Denham obediently followed instructions. On August 15, 1948, a trial examiner of the Board issued his intermediate report finding that the competency clauses circulated by the ITU in early April 1948, were not illegal. These clauses had been approved by employer attorneys, and had been embodied in important contracts in the industry. No complaint concerning them had been made to the ITU by the NLRB general counsel, who had knowledge of these clauses when they were circulated in April 1948, despite an understanding reached after the injunction was issued that no contempt action would be instituted without informal efforts to adjust the matter between the NLRB and the ITU. Despite the claim that they had been "investigated," no effort was made by the NLRB to obtain from the ITU any information concerning the manner in which such clauses had operated.

THE CONTEMPT CASE

On August 25, 1948, carrying out Senator Taft's wishes, a complaint was filed alleging that the ITU and its officers were in contempt of the injunction. The grounds were the following: (1) The demand for competency clauses which, it was claimed, favored ITU members. These clauses had not been in issue in the injunction proceeding and had been found by a trial examiner of the NLRB, 10 days before, to be lawful. It was not claimed that any specific person had been discriminated against, and the sole claim was that they were "illegal" on their face—a matter as susceptible of ascertainment in early April, 1948, as in late August. (2) The demand for a clause that foremen be union members. This issue had been expressly withdrawn from the injunction proceeding by General Counsel Denham; it had been expressly agreed after the injunction issued that demands for such clauses were lawful. (3) The failure to include a provision for a "tie-breaker" in a clause providing for a joint employer-union committee to supervise the training of apprentices. This had not been in issue in the injunction, or any other proceeding. All three of these clauses had been freely rejected by employers who were not willing to agree to them, though many were.

Thus it came about that, for the first time in American history, a group of responsible union officials were charged with contempt of court for proposing certain clauses in collective bargaining meetings. It was not disputed, and is readily apparent, that each of these proposals was designed to advance the legitimate interests of the union and its members; they represented no more than an effort to continue, so far as possible within the injunction, practices found to be mutually beneficial by both employers and the union. Important areas of the industry had agreed both with the legality and desirability of these proposals. Yet, once again, the ITU found itself bargaining, not with the employers in the industry, but with the NLRB general counsel and the courts.

But the real bite of the case was in the NLRB's prayer for relief; it was demanded that the ITU be required to "cancel, discontinue, and withhold the payment of strike benefits or other moneys to Local No. 16 (the Chicago local) or its members in support of said strike." In early April the general counsel had known of the proposals then being made by the ITU; no objection to them was voiced. On July 28, Senator Taft at the instigation of the Chicago newspaper publishers had urged action against the ITU—obviously in the hope of breaking the Chicago strike. On August 15 the ITU proposals were found to be lawful by a trial examiner of the NLRB. On August 25, 1948, the proceeding was instituted. From this sequence of events, it is apparent that the allegations of the contempt petition were afterthoughts, resurrected only to carry out the desires of the Chicago publishers and Senator Taft, and that the sole aim of the proceeding was to break the strike, and force the Chicago printers—free citizens—to work for such wages, during such hours, and under such conditions as the Chicago publishers would unilaterally impose.

On October 14, 1948, the decision in the contempt action was announced. The competency clauses drawn from the New York commercial employers' agreement were found to be "discriminatory." But certain variants on that agreement which had been developed, principally in an agreement with the New York newspaper publishers, were found to be "not unlawful." Clauses providing that foremen were to be union members were approved, but it was found that the ITU was required to include a provision for a "tie-breaker" in clauses setting up joint employer-union committees to supervise the selection and training of apprentices. The effort of the Chicago newspaper publishers, Senator Taft, and General Counsel Denham to cut off strike benefits at Chicago and thereby break that strike failed. But, because the ITU and its officers had been found in contempt, they were required to pay the costs incurred by the NLRB in "investigating" the case (without once approaching the ITU) and the costs of litigating it on behalf of the Chicago publishers.

Thus, the ITU was required out of its funds to finance an effort by Government attorneys, paid out of public funds, to break one of its strikes, including the salaries paid the attorneys for that effort.

The ITU felt that it had good grounds to appeal both of these lower court decisions. Yet any injunction issued under section 10 (j) is "temporary," and fails when the NLRB decides the case out of which the injunction arose. Since the court twice refused stays of its orders pending appeal, the ITU was forced to comply with those orders during the period while the appeal was pending. If, during the time the matter was pending on appeal, the NLRB decided the case, the whole case would become "moot," the injunction and the appeal would disappear, and the ITU would have incurred heavy costs without ever obtaining a decision. There is no practical appeal from injunctions and contempt orders under section 10 (j).

CONCLUSIONS

What rational bystander could suppose that in the year 1948 reputable trade-union leaders might be held in contempt of court, and punished, for failing to include a provision for a tie-breaker in a collective-bargaining proposal dealing with the training of apprentices? Where is the American citizen who can say to himself that the making of such a proposal warrants setting in motion the ponderous machinery of the NLRB and the Federal judiciary? Who will defend the proposition that the Federal Government should dictate to unions—or employers—the exact form of the clauses which they shall propose in their dealings with each other? What has become of the phrase "free collective bargaining" when proposals, whether satisfactory to employers or not, must be cleared with the general counsel of the NLRB and the Federal courts under the whiplash of contempt citations before they can be made? Yet this is the point to which the American trade-union movement, under the combined prodding of the Taft-Hartley Act, some employers, an antilabor Senator and a biased administration of the act, as we have demonstrated, has been driven.

To this pushing around the American labor movement, sparked by the experience of the ITU, gave its thunderous answer on November 2. The issues are grave, and admit of no temporizing or equivocation. The slate must be wiped clean. If the trade-union movement—and employers—are to remain free, they cannot admit that the Federal Government shall dictate to the parties how the competency of new employees shall be determined or how apprentices are to be trained. The existence of a few employers, like the Chicago publishers, who are unwilling to handle their economic problems without the support of an anti-labor Congress and a proemployer administration of a hostile law is no justification for throwing the shackles about those trade unions and those employers who are sufficiently strong and independent to handle their own problems in a responsible and democratic fashion. If freedom is to return to the American labor scene, all of Taft-Hartley must go.

THE TAFT-HARTLEY LAW IS A SLAVE LABOR LAW

THE PUBLIC INTEREST DEMANDS ITS REPEAL AND REENACTMENT OF THE WAGNER ACT

(Issued by the International Typographical Union, February 10, 1949)

Since the International Typographical Union has been an outstanding victim of the Taft-Hartley law what we say to you is the voice of experience.

The most influential group of employers in the country, the American Newspaper Publishers Association, set out to destroy a hundred years of progress attained through collective bargaining by locals of the ITU. They were joined by a recently organized group of commercial printing employers and both organized employer groups were aided and shepherded through the procedures of persecution provided for us by the Taft-Hartley law.

Our long and expensive fight to survive the effects of the Taft-Hartley law continues. To date it has cost the ITU about $11,000,000 and our members are paying 5 percent of their earnings every week to finance those members who are on strike and for other defensive purposes.

In view of these facts of our experience, we hope to show you that the Taft-Hartley law is a slave labor law and that is about as good for labor as the compulsory labor syndicates of Mussolini when fascism ruled Italy.

The Taft-Hartley law is a definite departure from the legal theory of constitutionally guaranteed freedom of the working people of this country.

In proving that fact we shall rely on the words of the act itself. It is only necessary to read them to you in comparison with the provisions of the Wagner Act to prove the intent and scope of the slave labor law.

It is therefore necessary first to read the four paragraphs of the first section of the Wagner Act to show the rights recognized and protected therein.

Then we shall show the departure therefrom as contained in the Taft-Hartley slave labor law.

"NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT

"WAGNER-CONNERY LABOR ACT

"Act of July 5, 1935, c. 372, 49 Stat. 449, U. S. Code, title 29, §§ 151–166

(P. 14,061:)

"AN ACT To diminish the causes of labor disputes burdening or obstructing interstate and foreign commerce, to create a National Labor Relations Board, and for other purposes

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

"(P. 14,061.1:) Findings and Policy.—Section 1. The denial by employers of the rights of employees to organize and the refusal by employers to accept the procedure of collective bargaining lead to strikes and other forms of industrial strife or unrest, which have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by (a) impairing the efficiency, safety, or operation of the instrumentalities of commerce; (b) occurring in the current of commerce; (c) materially affecting, restraining, or controlling the flow of raw materials or manufactured or processed goods from or into the channels of commerce, or the prices of such materials or goods in commerce; or (d) causing diminution of employment and wages in such volume as substantially to impair or disrupt the market for goods flowing from or into the channels of commerce.

"The inequality of bargaining power between employees who do not possess full freedom of association or actual liberty of contract, and employers who are organized in the corporate or other forms of ownership association substantially burdens and affects the flow of commerce, and tends to aggravate recurrent business depressions, by depressing wage rates and the purchasing power of wage earners in industry and by preventing the stabilization of competitive wage rates and working conditions within and between industries.

"Experience has proved that protection by law of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively safeguards commerce from injury, impairment, or interruption, and promotes the flow of commerce by removing certain recognized sources of industrial strife and unrest, by encouraging practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial disputes arising out of differences as to wages, hours, or other working conditions, and by restoring equality of bargaining power between employers and employees.

"It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to eliminate the cause of certain substantial obstructions to the free flow of commerce and to mitigate and eliminate these obstructions when they have occurred by encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and by protecting the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid or protection."

The Wagner Act stated—

1. Denial by employers of employees' right to organize and employers' refusal to accept collective bargaining with unions caused much strife and general hardship.

There is no question but that employers generally denied the employees their right to organize and to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing. The industrial history of this country is replete with instances of interference by employers with the right of employees to organize. The tactics of the employers ranged from the use of private police, stool pigeons, spy systems, blacklists and the use of thugs and gunmen to control by corporations of the law enforcement officers. The LaFollette Investigating Committee of the United States Senate brought out many instances of that kind. The Wagner Act recognized these facts by a clear and definite statement to that effect.

2. Inequality of bargaining power between unorganized workers and organized or corporate employers burdens commerce and tends to aggravate recurrent business depressions by depressing wage rates and purchasing power of wage earners and by preventing stabilization of wages and working conditions.

This last statement is a clear recognition of the necessity of labor unions for the purpose of preventing wage cuts and to stabilize wages and working conditions. It states the fact of inequality and the disastrous results of that inequality of bargaining power.

3. Protection by law of employees' right to organize safeguards commerce and promotes the flow of commerce by removing employer interference in that right; by encouraging friendly collective bargaining and by restoring equality of bargaining power between employers and employees.

He is a clear recognition of the employees' existing right to organize. It is not a new right nor privilege given labor. The right to organize is an inalienable and existing right of freemen under our constitutional guarantees. Here is a clear pronouncement of the good results of protection of that right and the manner in which such good results can be obtained.

4. It is the declared policy to eliminate and migitate obstructions to free flow of commerce by encouraging the practice and procedure of collective bargaining and by protecting the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid or protection.

In this clear and definite policy we find the determination to eliminate existing evils brought into being by employers through their violation of existing rights of employees and we also find the exact method by which the evil is to be eliminated. A very important point must not be overlooked as to that method. It encourages employees to exercise their existing right to organize and by that voluntary effort sit around a table as equals with employers to bargain for terms and conditions of employment.

Summarizing: Very briefly the Wagner Act recognized labor unions to be absolutely essential to our economy. It recognized employers were interfering to prevent unions from forming or functioning. It recognized the need for protecting by law the right of employees to organize and function as labor unions.

It declared the policy of the United States to encourage collective bargaining and to protect the right to do so for the purpose of negotiating terms and conditions of employment.

It did not propose to stop strikes because the right to strike is necessary to preserve freedom and to avoid totalitarianism of any kind whether fascism, nazism, or communism. The right to strike is a part and legal necessity of the right to organize and bargain collectively.

There is no constitutional authority in our Government to force employees individually or collectively, to render service to any employer. Our Constitution does provide clearly that there shall be no involuntary servitude except as a punishment for crime. The Government does have the fundamental right to take over any property when necessary to the public interest but it must pay a fair price for such property. If that procedure is followed the Government then becomes the owner and employer and is responsible for the terms and conditions of employment. So-called free enterprise then loses its opportunity to make a profit and the employees' right to strike is questionable. Recourse to elected officials then becomes the method for betterment of terms and conditions of employment.

Here is the addition to the four paragraphs just read from the Wagner Act: The Taft-Hartley Act states:

"Experience has further demonstrated that certain practices by some labor organizations, their officers, and members have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by preventing the free flow of goods in such commerce through strikes and other forms of industrial unrest or through concerted activities which impair the interest of the public in the free flow of such commerce. The elimination of such practices is a necessary conditon to the assurance of the rights herein guaranteed."

While the Wagner Act (4 paragraphs of "Findings and Policies") did not bar strikes and while those four paragraphs are still a part of the law the additional paragraph declares strikes must be eliminated as "a necessary condition to the rights herein guaranteed." Therefore, a policy contrary to and the opposite of the Wagner Act policy was inserted in the heart of it as though it were a dagger in the heart of labor.

Here in this additional paragraph is a controlling statement of policy that nullifies the recognized right to strike contained in both the policy and by section 13 of the Wagner Act.

Here is a plain statement that strikes must be eliminated if labor is to have such rights as the Taft-Hartley law sees fit to give labor.

This no-strike policy and regulated and limited right policy is further stated in the amended section 13. The Wagner Act section 13 was a plain statement as follows: "Nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike." The amended Taft-Hartley law section provides: "nothing in this act, except as specifically provided for herein shall be construed so as either to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike, or to affect the limitations or qualifications on that right."

Thus, the Taft-Hartley law takes over completely the power to limit the right to strike by such limitations as may be provided therein. This means that once such a denial of the right to strike is established more and more limitations can be legislated.

A further additional and new "Statement of Policy" is placed immediately after its title and again after its "Short Title."

"LABOR MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT, 1947

"AN ACT To amend the National Labor Relations Act, to provide additional facilities for the mediation of labor disputes affecting commerce, to equalize legal responsibilities of labor organizations and employers, and for other purposes

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

"SHORT TITLE AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

(Short title)

"SECTION 1. (a) This Act may be cited as the 'Labor Management Relations Act, 1947.'

(Statement of policy)

"(b) Industrial strife which interferes with the normal flow of commerce and with the full production of articles and commodities for commerce, can be avoided or substantially minimized if employers, employees, and labor organizations each recognize under law one another's legitimate rights in their relations with each other, and above all recognize under law that neither party has any right in its relations with any other to engage in acts or practices which jeopardize the public health, safety, or interest.

"It is the purpose and policy of this Act, in order to promote the full flow of commerce, to prescribe the legitimate rights of both employees and employers in their relations affecting commerce, to provide orderly and peaceful procedures for preventing the interference by either with the legitimate rights of the other, to protect the rights of individual employees in their relations with labor organizations whose activities affect commerce, to define and proscribe practices on the part of labor and management which affect commerce and are inimical to the general welfare, and to protect the rights of the public in connection with labor disputes affecting commerce."

The first paragraph of 1 (b) is a plain declaration that neither labor nor management have any rights except "legitimate" rights. The statement that industrial strife can be avoided if everyone recognizes each other's "legitimate" rights is indeed far-fetched.

Second paragraph of section 1 (b) states the purpose and policy to be:

1. To prescribe the legitimate rights of employees and employers.

This is a reaffirmation of the first paragraph, only more definite and exact. So long as Taft-Hartley law policies persist labor will lose one right after another and employers will be wholeheartedly for the law until the pendulum swings the other way by election of those who are not slavishly obedient to the demands of the corporate interests.

So far the "legitimate" rights of labor sound like a new list of "thou shalt nots." Our "legitimate" rights seem to be a few of those we had, most of which have been taken away by the Taft-Hartley law.

2. To provide orderly and peaceful procedures for preventing interference with the legitimate rights of the other.

These peaceful and orderly procedures mean that NLRB attorneys listen very attentively to complaints of employers against unions and at the first opportunity drag a union before a trial examiner where it must spend its treasury on lawyers and unending controversy and delays until after 3 or 4 years the right involved might be determined by the Supreme Court.

These peaceful procedures mean that a union or an individual must wait until the NLRB has no employer squawks to handle before it will give even a disdainful glance at a union or individual complaint. Employers get priority under section 10 (1).

These peaceful procedures mean that the NLRB attorneys can interpret the law to suit themselves and then get an injunction against a union and its officials on the mere probability that the law has been violated. These peaceful procedures mean that the NLRB general counsel can club unions into doing his will while the slow legal process drags its way through trials and courts. The Taft-Hartley law injunction racket is worse than the injunction evil once abolished by the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

3. To protect the rights of individual employees in their relations with labor organizations.

Why all the concern about individuals who prove by the fact that they refuse to join with their fellows in bettering or protecting their terms and conditions of employment that there is something wrong with them?

Why all the concern about stooges for the boss, free riders on the efforts of union people, strikebreakers, union busters, borers from within and other antisocial creatures?

Why deprive one group of people the right to contract with a corporation for fair wages and working conditions only for those who belong to the union making the effort?

Why legislate for the so-called union shop and bar the closed shop when the difference means the moral trash just described must be forced into a union after 30 days of employment?

Why permit the employer to thus select those who are to become members of the union rather than the union be allowed to determine who may join?

4. To define and proscribe practices on the part of labor and management which affect commerce and are inimical to the general welfare, and to protect the rights of the public in connection with labor disputes affecting commerce.

Proscribe means to outlaw. Anything the NLRB or the courts want to rule is inimical to the general welfare or anything thought to protect the rights of the public as regards labor disputes is in accord with the purpose and policy of the Taft-Hartley law.

The Taft-Hartley law does proscribe or outlaw many rights labor unions had under the Wagner Act. No rights were taken away from employers.

This part of the law plainly opens the way for unlimited control over unions and business at the whim or caprice of NLRB attorneys, the NLRB or courts through interpretations they may make as to the rights of the public or the general welfare.

WORKING UNDER INJUNCTION IS SLAVERY

When a court orders workingmen to continue at work for any firm or corporation which makes a profit from their labor, actual slavery exists. To adopt a law giving a court such authority is to forge the chain of slavery.

HOW ABOUT CHAINS FOR THE EMPLOYER?

Apply the same illegal pressure to the opposite side and hold your ears while the employers scream. How about the court issuing a mandatory injunction compelling the employer to pay the wages demanded by the union in order that production be maintained and the public interest protected?

PROPERTY RIGHTS VERSUS HUMAN RIGHTS

It is more important to protect the rights of freemen to strike or not to strike than it is to protect the property rights of the employer. If any rights are to be sacrificed, it is better that freedom be preserved and property rights be sacrificed.

It is well established that the Government must pay for the invasion of property rights. How about paying for the invasion of human rights?

THE EXCUSE FOR ADOPTING THE TAFT-HARTLEY LAW

1. To give employers an even break with unions. Since when has an employer not had more than an even break? When, if ever, did any labor union have an even break with its employer? The employer owns the plant and controls the jobs. He can shut the plant down indefinitely while the employees starve or find other jobs. Unless the members of the union belong to an organization that will assess itself heavily enough to pay adequate strike benefits, there is no possibility of the union ever equaling the employer in either bargaining power or staying power. Where the employers believe that they can break the union in a reasonable length of time regardless of public inconvenience, they do not call on the Government and the Government does nothing about it. An incident such as this occurred when telephone workers on a national basis lost their strike because the telephone company did not care how much inconvenience the public suffered. The union did not have sufficient finances to pay strike benefits to their members. It is sheer nonsense to claim that labor became too powerful and that employers had to have the Taft-Hartley law to even things up. The Taft-Hartley law is a club with which corporations had hoped to kill off labor unions.

2. To eliminate alleged abuses by labor unions. If there were any abuses of law by any labor unions, such particular abuses should have been handled in a legal way and what changes needed could have been made to take care of the particular abuse. It was not necessary to change the whole theory of legal labor relations and to institute a basis for fascistic control over our people.

ACTUAL REASONS FOR ADOPTING THE TAFT-HARTLEY LAW

1. To budgeon unions into accepting governmental permission to bargain collectively. While the Wagner Act was adopted for the purpose of preventing the employers from depriving workingmen of their right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, the Taft-Hartley law was adopted for the purpose of depriving members of organized labor of many of their rights and for the purpose of setting up a specified, limited number of rights which could not be enforced unless the unions accepted the status of slave-labor organizations begging for their rights under the law and complying with stultifying requirements. The fundamental basis for these requirements to file affidavits and financial statements was really to create the legal fiction that since the Government granted rights to labor, labor was bound to accept the price exacted by the Government for those rights.

As a matter of fact, members of organized labor always had those rights and the Wagner Act simply acted as an agency to enforce rights labor always had. It is unsound and of no benefit to organized labor to beg for permission to exercise rights belonging to a free people.

2. To impoverish unions by forcing them to hire lawyers for guidance in every move. Since unions have to hire lawyers to conduct their cases for them and to guide them in the technical phases of the Taft-Hartley law, an unwarranted and unreasonable expense is saddled on them. Not only that but lawyers never see industrial relations in the light of actual experience in them. This is a further strain on the efforts of working people to organize and bargain collectively. If at every turn they are subjected to punishment under the law, the members of the union are apt to be discouraged in unionization rather than encouraged as contemplated by the Wagner Act.

3. To enmesh labor unions in so much technical legal procedure they cannot use their economic strength. There are so many "thou shalt nots" in the Taft-Hartley law and so many pitfalls that it is difficult for a union to use its economic strength in a way that will avoid its becoming charged with violating the law. Not only are unions embarrassed by the provisions of the law as they are read and interpreted by the unions' attorneys, but they are also embarrassed by the further interpretations made by the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board who is set up as a czar interpreter as to how the law should be enforced. If unions do not go the way indicated by the General Counsel's Office, they are subject to having charges preferred against them and complaints issued which will drag them into trials and courts. Even if a union strikes for wages only, the General Counsel's Office tries its best to interpret some hidden motive in the strike to make it illegal and to try to prevent strikers from getting strike benefits from their international union.

4. To deprive unions of their legal status as strikers when they do strike for economic reasons. Even if a union is striking for better wages and hours only and cannot be charged with violating any of the fancier provisions of the Taft-Hartley law, the union is still subjected to a heavy penalty for having struck. The minute men are on the street for economic purposes they lose their status as strikers. Thereupon the employer can replace them with strikebreakers or scabs and the strikebreakers and scabs can apply for and be certified as employees entitled to bargain legally in the plant. Thus, strikebreakers and scabs are glorified by the Taft-Hartley law and given a preferred status in the matter of collective bargaining. Truly, the avowed purpose of the Taft-Hartley law to prevent strikes is being carried out in every detail possible.

5. To help employers to force nonunion men or strikebreakers into unions to help wreck them from within. Also to thus force Communists into unions but bar unions any benefit of law if said Communists get control. Under the Taft-Hartley law a union is subjected to being diluted and washed out of a plant by the employer hiring nonunion men and firing union men for one cause or another. In order to camouflage that obvious evil the framers of the Taft-Hartley law put in provisions for the infamous so-called union shop. Under the provisions of that section a sufficient number of employees in the plant might ask for and receive an election (by the grace of the National Labor Relations Board) to determine whether or not the employees would like to have this so-called union shop under which, if granted by the Government and the employer, an employee would be compelled to join the union after being employed for a period of 30 days. However, there is a hurdle to jump on that one too. The employer does not have to agree to said union shop if he doesn't want to agree to it even after a majority of employees in the bargaining unit have signified their desire to have it. But if it is finally granted and put into a contract, it simply means that the employer will select those who are to become members of the union instead of the union doing the selecting. That section also provides that if he is an unfit character and the union expels him, the employer does not have to take him off the job unless the expelled man refuses to pay dues. According to the Taft-Hartley law an employee may be of the worst character and any strikebreaker, scab, or union buster or any other antisocial individual can still maintain his employment so long as he is willing to pay the small sum of dues usually required by an upstanding labor union. Thus, virtue is scorned and selfishness, greed, and crime are glorified.

6. To help employers break down skilled crafts or trades by allowing them to give a union's job opportunities to other "trades, crafts, or classes." Section 8 (b) (4) of the Taft-Hartley law makes it illegal for a union to strike for its own jurisdiction no matter how long its members have lived on jobs involving a particular kind of work. The law gives an employer the right to give the work to anybody he pleases regardless of what it may do to the union. He can give work to other trades, crafts, or classes of workers, union or nonunion, and that is supposed to be quite all right and quite American in the warped sort of way provided for in the Taft-Hartley law. The law wipes out jurisdictional strikes by giving all of the authority to the employer to determine where and by whom the work shall be done. Since the employer can hire either union or nonunion people and since the law protects him from economic strife in the event of the use of his unwarranted but unlimited power to destroy unions, it is easy to see what this law will do to many labor unions now working because there are plenty of jobs. Times will change and more and more damage will be done to trade or craft unions.

7. To help employers to break down union scales by hiring nonunion people at less money on the excuse they are not fully trained. A union may have been successfully serving an industry for many years through journeymen and an apprentice-training system. Such matters are now discarded and destroyed unless the union can secure agreement by the employer to hire only journeymen and apprentices. Otherwise, the employer who may hire either union or nonunion help would be free to hire anyone whether half-trained or in any other way partially trained employees. He would then pay them what they were worth and even though the union had an agreement on a set scale for journeymen the union would find itself unable to enforce it for people who were obviously not journeymen. Unless a union can secure an agreement on the number of apprentices to be trained, it is likewise subject to dilution and destruction.

8. To help employers break down unions by preventing unions from taking action on struck work or nonunion work. It is against the law for any union, through any concerted activity whatever, to instruct its members to refuse to handle struck work or nonunion work. Of course, an individual may decide not to handle such work and will probably be fired for his unionism. That portion of the law allegedly protecting such an individual amounts to an invitation to be fired. Unless he can have the protection of the union in such a discharge he has no protection and it is against the law for the union to take concerted action on such a matter.

Under the Taft-Hartley law an employer may buy a portion of a product from a nonunion plant hiring people at substandard wages and conditions, and compel members of a union to complete a product upon which none of its members were permitted to work in the nonunion plant. There are still many plants functioning on a substandard nonunion basis and were doing so even under the Wagner Act. Compelling a union member to work on a product against which some other member of his union may be on strike in another plant is compelling him to be a strikebreaker. Of course, that is quite all right with the framers of the Taft-Hartley law whose main object was to break unions anyway.

9. To help employers break down unions by limiting the right of unions to take action as to picket lines. In an effort to appear big-hearted, the framers of the Taft-Hartley law provided "that nothing contained in this subsection (b) shall be construed to make unlawful a refusal by any person to enter upon the premises of any employer (other than his own employer) if the employees of such employer are engaged in a strike ratified or approved by a representative of such employees whom such employer is required to recognize under this act." The words in parentheses "(other than his own employer) ' provide a little sardonic humor. A plant may provide work to members of half a dozen different unions and one union may be on strike and picketing the plant owned by one employer. The other unions may not honor that picket line because they are all working for the same employer. It is seldom that a member of a union would be asked, or required, to cross a picket line of some other employer. Of course, it would apply to unions of the workers engaged in a delivery service from plant to plant but it is difficult to see how it would apply to very many other union members. It is a safe enough rule to follow that if the Taft-Hartley law appears to give labor anything, examine it very thoroughly not only once but several times.

10. To help employers against strong unions by forcing unions to bargain for a contract if they previously had contracts even though to contract under the Taft-Hartley law deprives the union of many benefits enjoyed under previous contracts. It is another example of inconsistency and perhaps a devilish humor that the Taft-Hartley law requires weak unions to beg for the protection of the law and comply with the requirements of filing reports and affidavits while another section of the law compels other unions to bargain collectively whether or not they meet the requirements as to reports and affidavits. In spite of the fact that in order to be covered by the law a union is required to file non-Communist affidavits and reports of its financial condition, section 8 (b) (6) (d) provides that where there is in effect a collective bargaining contract covering employees in an industry affecting commerce the duty to bargain collectively shall also mean that no party to such contract shall terminate or modify such contract unless the party desiring such termination or modification serves notice of the change, offers to meet and confer, notifies Federal mediation and State conciliation services and continues in full force and effect without resorting to strike or lockout all the terms and conditions of existing contract for a period of 60 days after such notice is given or until the expiration date of such contract, whichever occurs later. A further ridiculous situation is created by the fact that the International Typographical Union is compelled to bargain with the employers because of the Taft-Hartley law and while the employers can bring all the charges they want, accusing us of unfair labor practices, the union cannot charge the employers with unfair labor practices in the same bargaining sessions. The fact of the matter is that the Taft-Hartley law is framed and enforced so as to give the employer every possible help that he can be given and to deprive unions of as much as it is possible to deprive them of, including their self-respect.

11. To help employers localize their trouble with international unions so joint action is difficult and under constant surveillance. Where one employer has plants in various localities and where the history of collective bargaining indicated that that employer was a member of a local or city-wide bargaining unit, each local group of employers will stick together and make it as difficult as possible for unions to take practical advantage of their right under the law to strike the same employer in several cities. It appears that a union has a right to strike the same employer in several places but you cannot depend on what the law says, you have to depend on how the general counsel interprets it.

12. To help employers break unions by use of injunctions based on a "probability" of violating the law. Then punishing unions by citations for contempt of court on that probability of having violated the law. In the old injunction days the courts at least accused union people of violating the law before they issued injunctions. Now it's only a probability that you have violated the law and the injunction now secured under 10 (j) of the act is worse than the old injunction evil barred by the Norris-LaGuardia law. It makes little difference what the law reads. It's what the National Labor Relations Board attorneys read into the law that they insist you follow and if you do not follow it they will get some judge to issue an injunction against you ordering you to do what the National Labor Relations Board general counsel thinks you ought to do. During the past year when the International Typographical Union decided it did not want contracts under the burdens of the Taft-Hartley law the employers who did want contracts under which they could disrupt the union appealed to the National Labor Relations Board general counsel for help. According to Government attorneys locals of the international union do have to bargain for a contract and from all indications not only a contract but the kind of a contract that the employers want preserving to them all of their weapons to destroy the union while holding it around the neck by a contract.

13. To put labor unions under the domination of a bureaucracy of lawyers and clerks which is the beginning of Fascist control of unions and business. The ambitious scope of the Taft-Hartley law is to provide the so-called legitimate rights of both employers and employees and while the going is good on behalf of employers at this time it may get rougher later on. The Taft-Hartley law puts labor unions under the control of the National Labor Relations Board general counsel and his corps of lawyers and clerks. It was so intended and so it is. Big business was in the saddle and organized labor was in the dog house. The propagandists of big business screamed about the administration of the Wagner Act because big business was told to bargain collectively with unions and to get rid of their unfair and illegal efforts to prevent unions from organizing and functioning. They now have a new tactic. They are using the laws of the land to prevent labor unions from organizing and functioning effectively.

14. To help employers destroy unions before the long tortuous path of legal appeals can be trod to the Supreme Court for final decision on the legality of the Taft-Hartley law. A union that does not have sufficient skill to back it up in an industrial contest can be destroyed by employers while the red tape is being unwound and while cases are being made for the Board and for the courts thereafter. Of course, the framers of the Taft-Hartley law knew what they were doing when they drafted that law.

STATEMENT BY ELLA BEST, R. N., EXECUTIVE SECRETARY OF THE AMERICAN NURSES' ASSOCIATION, RELATIVE TO H. R. 2032, THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949

The American Nurses' Association, which is the national professional organization of registered nurses in this country, with a membership of over 164,000 graduate registered professional nurses, and constituent State associations in all of the 48 States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and Hawaii, urgently requests that any amendment to the National Labor Relations Act or any new Labor Relations Act (1) retain the provisions of sections 9 (b) (1)[1] and 2 (12) (a) (iv) [2] of the present act, as amended, which guarantee to professional employees, including nurses, the right to select their own representatives for purposes of collective bargaining, and (2) eliminate the unjustified and unjustifiable exemption of nonprofit hospitals contains in section 2 (2)[3] of the present act, as amended.

Since September 27, 1946, when its house of delegates unanimously adopted a platform endorsing the greater development of nurses' professional associations as spokesmen for nurses in all questions affecting their employment and economic security, the American Nurses' Association and its constituent State nurses' associations have been engaged in a strenuous campaign for the improvement of the salaries and working conditions of professional nurses. The present-day exploitation of the professional nurse is a matter of common knowledge. In the past few years the salaries or wages of practically all groups of employed persons have increased very greatly, in order to keep pace with the rise in the cost of living. Even various categories of so-called white-collar workers have enjoyed very substantial increases in compensation. During this time, however, the salaries of registered professional nurses, particularly those employed in hospitals and similar institutions, have failed to keep pace with those of other employed groups in the national economy and with the increased cost of living At best, a few groups of employed nurses have received very small increases in compensation; many have received no increase at all. At the same time, the educational and other requirements for registered professional nurses have been constantly increasing. As a result, the registered professional nurse is at the lowest point, relative to comparable groups in our economy, in many years; and a serious shortage of nurses threatens the Nation.

It would be disastrous to our efforts to combat this situation by improving the employment conditions of professional nurses and increasing the incentives to enter the profession, if the present provisions of sections 9 (b) (1) and 2 (12) (a) (iv) were repealed. Professional nurses' associations do not endeavor to represent any groups of employees except members of their own profession. Such associations exist primarily for professional purposes, and have adopted their programs of collective bargaining, important as such programs are, merely as one phase of their professional activities. As a consequence, such associations will be seriously hampered in their efforts to conduct collective bargaining on behalf of their members and of other registered professional nurses who desire it, in accordance with their professional standards, if professional nurses are prevented from organizing themselves in appropriate units for such activities. It will be readily apparent that, if professional nurses are grouped with other employees in large units, professional nurses' associations will be unable to represent them. Conversely, the organization of professional nurses in separate units for collective bargaining is in accordance with the teaching of experi-

[1] Sec. 9 (b) The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to assure to employees the fullest freedom in exercising the rights guaranteed by this act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or subdivision thereof: Provided, That the Board shall not (1) decide that any unit is appropriate for such purposes if such unit includes both professional employees and employees who are not professional employees unless a majority of such professional employees vote for inclusion in such unit; * * *

[2] Sec. 2 (12) The term "professional employee" means—(a) any employee engaged in work (i) predominantly intellectual and varied in character as opposed to routine mental, manual, mechanical, or physical work; (ii) involving the consistent exercise of discretion and judgment in its performance; (iii) of such a character that the output produced or the result accomplished cannot be standardized in relation to a given period of time; (iv) requiring knowledge of an advanced type in a field of science or learning customarily acquired by a prolonged course of specialized intellectual instruction and study in an institution of higher learning or a hospital, as distinguished from a general academic education or from an apprenticeship or from training in the performance of routine mental, manual, or physical processes. (Italics ours.)

[3] Sec. 2 (2) The term "employer" includes any person acting as an agent of an employer, directly or indirectly, but shall not include any corporation or association operating a hospital, if no part of the net earnings inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual.

ence that control of all matters relating to nursing properly belongs in professional hands rather than in those of laymen. The great advances in the science and art of nursing have paralleled the increasing recognition on the part of educators, government and public alike, that the maintenance of the highest standards of nursing service requires the greatest possible degree of self-government in the nursing profession. Improvements in nursing education, the system of State boards of nurse examiners, and the commissioning of nurses as officers with permanent rank in the Army and Navy Nurse Corps all testify to the recognition by the general public that nurses can render their best service when they are permitted to have full voice in the determination of their qualifications and the administration of their duties.

The American Nurses Association feels that the right of professional nurses to select their own bargaining representatives should be preserved in its present statutory form. In Matter of Bethlehem-Alameda Shipyard Inc. (59 N. L. R. B. 1525 (1945)), decided before the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, the National Labor Relations Board grouped registered professional nurses with nonregistered personnel in the same unit. In other cases the Board treated other professions in like manner. In the Matter of Standard Oil Company (Indiana) (case No. 13–RD–13), decided December 1, 1948, the Board, in its opinion, clearly showed that, but for the statutory provisions, it would still regard all nurses, whether professional or otherwise, as a single category. When it is recognized that a registered professional nurse is a member of a highly trained, clearly defined professional group, and that, in most States, any person, without any training whatsoever, may be employed as a so-called practical nurse, and when it is further recognized that professional nurses' organizations cannot accept into membership or represent nonprofessional personnel, it then becomes quite apparent that the grouping of professional nurses with large numbers of nonprofessional employees will thwart the desire of professional nurses to engage in collective bargaining through their professional organizations. Nurses feel strongly that this guaranty of their free choice of bargaining representative is a matter of too great importance to be left to administrative discretion, and urge that the guaranty be embodied in statute.

While the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 gave to professional nurses with one hand, it took away with the other. Section 2 (2) of the present National Labor Relations Act, as amended in 1947, for some inexplicable reason exempts nonprolit hospitals from the operation of the act. This provision, during the past 2 years, has seriously impeded the efforts of nurses' professional organizations to improve the economic conditions of their members. Nurses have found that many employers use the exemption as a pretext for refusing to recognize and deal with the State nurses' association as the representative of the professional nurses in their employ.

The exemption of nonprofit hospitals is highly unfair for at least two reasons: (1) Professional nurses have voluntarily given up such weapons as the strike, to which other groups of employees are ordinarily able to resort when all other methods have failed. As a result, nurses are particularly dependent upon the machinery which has been established by law to compel employers to recognize and deal with the duly accredited representatives of their employees. (2) The exemption of nonprofit hospitals is peculiarly discriminatory against nurses and other employees of such hospitals. No satisfactory reason has ever been suggested why nonprofit hospitals should be treated differently from all other nonprofit organizations or from other employers. Employees of any business organization, or any nonprofit organization other than a nonprofit hospital, are entitled to bargain collectively with their employer; but employees of nonprofit hospitals are, for some inexplicable reason, denied such right.

We are gratified to know that the administration's bill known as S. 249, sometimes referred to as the Thomas bill, as reported to the Senate, would eliminate this unjust exemption of nonprofit hospitals. We trust that any bill reported by your committee will do likewise. The 164,000 members of the American Nurses' Association are eager to take part, in the approved democratic fashion, in the determination of their compensation and working conditions. They cannot understand why they alone should be compelled to accept whatever terms their employer may see fit to grant them, without even the right to sit down at the table and discuss them with him. They wish to conduct their program in a professional manner, without resort to weapons which, like the strike, may endanger the patient. If their employers had voluntarily granted their request for collective bargaining, their concern with legislation would not have been necessary. However, the experience of the past 2 years has abundantly demonstrated that many employers of professional nurses will not grant them their basic economic rights unless such rights are clearly prescribed by statute.

Several State nurses' associations have filed with us documentation of persistent refusals of hospital management even to meet with the nurses' designated representatives for the purpose of discussing employment conditions.

In addition, peremptory dismissals by hospitals of nurses for participation in the activities of their professional association have occurred in increasing instances in localities where the association has inaugurated a program to improve the economic status of nurses. Reports of intimidation, coercion, and other interferences on the part of employers with nurses' rights to bargain collectively through their chosen representatives are being received from many areas.

Such unfair labor practices are inimical to the public interest as well as to nurses' interests, since they seriously impede the efforts of the American Nurses' Association to stabilize nursing service in this country through its program of collective bargaining affecting the employment of its 164,000 registered nurse members.

For these reasons the nursing profession requests that the present discriminatory legislation be terminated and that any new legislation extend to them, as it undoubtedly will to other groups of employees, the right to bargain collectively with their employers.

STATEMENT BY GWILYM A. PRICE, PRESIDENT, WESTINGHOUSE ELECTRIC CORP., RELATIVE TO H. R. 2032

The purpose of this statement is to offer the experiences of the Westinghouse Electric Corp. with present and past labor laws in the interests of assuring legislation which will adequately protect labor, management, and the public.

I am not attempting to cover all of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. My statement is confined to five major provisions with which we have had actual experience, and which, on the basis of such experience, I firmly believe should be preserved in any labor legislation adopted by the Congress. This statement was prepared with the assistance of our vice president in charge of labor relations, our legal counsel handling our cases before the National Labor Relations Board, and other associates who have had active experience with the subjects discussed.

Briefly, as a result of our experience, we urge:

(1) That employers continue to be permitted to refrain from bargaining collectively with members of management, namely, foremen and other supervisors.

(2) That professional employees continue to have the right to be excluded from the same bargaining unit with nonprofessional employees if they so desire.

(3) That the prohibition against the closed shop, which deprives citizens of their right to work, be maintained; and that safeguards against loss of work under other lesser forms of union-security agreements be continued.

(4) That freedom of speech for employers continue to be specifically guaranteed in labor laws.

(5) That both employers and union leaders be required to sign non-Communist affidavits.

Each of these points is developed more fully in the following pages of this statement.

There are several provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act with which we have had little or no experience, and I do not attempt to comment on them in this statement. However, this does not indicate indifference to such provisions or a belief that they can be safely discarded in future labor legislation. On the contrary, I believe that the reasons which led to the adoption of most of the Taft-Hartley Act's provisions remain sound and that elimination or change of any of such provisions should be done only after exceedingly careful consideration and with certainty that neither labor, management, nor the public is being deprived of essential safeguards.

I would also like to say that I do not subscribe to the theory that labor-management relations can best thrive, or that the public can be adequately protected, with no Federal labor laws to serve as rules of the game or with a return to the original Wagner Act whose unfairness and lack of safeguards for both employer and public welfare were fully demonstrated in the years prior to its amendment.

COLLECTIVE-BARGAINING RIGHTS FOR SUPERVISORS

The present law does not require employers to bargain collectively with management personnel—that is, those who exercise independent judgment on matters of hiring, transferring, promoting, discharging, rewarding, and disciplining employees. I think these are wise provisions which should be retained.

Approximately 5,900 out of a total of 95,500 employees of Westinghouse are in this category; 4,530 of them are foremen and general foremen, or office supervisors of corresponding rank, of the type held by the National Labor Relations Board to be within the scope of compulsory collective bargaining in a series of decisions [1] during the 2 years before the Taft-Hartley law was passed (although the Board had previously taken a contrary position.[2] In Westinghouse, these men are intensively trained as members of management, in all phases of the work which they are called upon to do as the managers of sections, departments, or recognized subdivisions thereof. Such training programs were commenced in our company at the beginning of the century and have continually expanded and improved, particularly during the past 25 years. We have spent many thousands of dollars in teaching our supervisors how to handle the innumerable problems, including personnel problems, which confront management personnel.

The very nature of our business requires these men to be managers, in every sense of the word. In peacetime, we undoubtedly turn out as diversified a group of products as any company in the country. Many of our products, particularly the larger ones, such as motors, generators, turbines, etc., are "tailor-made" for particular applications. Supervision of this kind of work requires a considerable degree of versatility and judgment, as well as technical skill and knowledge in broad fields. If proof of this fact were needed, we would cite our record in manning and operating successfully two new naval ordnance plants and a new merchant marine plant during the war largely from the existing ranks of our supervisory and executive personnel, as well as the numerous cases where our supervisory organization was able to take on war work completely foreign to our peacetime activities and meet unusually short production schedules.

Our supervisors function as members of management. They determine the number of employees needed in their departments, and no employee is hired for them, or transferred into their departments, until after the supervisor has interviewed and accepted them. They have authority to decide all other questions involving the status of employees under them, such as promotions, demotions, lay-offs, rerates, etc., within the framework of established labor contracts and company policies, which, contrary to the arguments of supervisory union supporters, do leave the supervisors a wide area for the exercise of discretion and judgment. They actively take part, as management, in the grievance procedure, not only at the first step where they generally are the sole company representative and where the vast majority of grievances are settled, but also in the later steps if their decisions are appealed by the union representatives. They have ultimate responsibility for the adequacy and maintenance of the machines and equipment used in their departments, and for the safety of those who work under their supervision. They are called upon for ideas and recommendations on many important operating phases of the company's business, including employee policies and collective bargaining. In every way possible, they operate their department or section as their own business and they fully realize that the company's success or failure depends upon the sum total of the results which they accomplish.

As members of management, our supervisors receive salaries which compensate them for the responsibility which is theirs. During both the major strikes which we have suffered since the end of the war supervisors were paid their salaries, whether or not work was available for them to do. Along with each of the three rounds of wage increases since the war, they have received substantially larger salary increases than have been granted in collective bargaining. We are constantly on the alert to maintain their compensation on a level substantially above that of nonsupervisory employees, and to pay them as much or more than the average paid to supervisors with corresponding responsibilities by other companies in the areas where we do business. This is nothing new at Westinghouse—it has been our policy since long before the Taft-Hartley law. In addition to these salary policies, our company inaugurated an incentive plan early in 1948 to reward management people, including the supervisors I am talking about in this statement, for conscientious effort, faithfulness, and skill. The first distribution under this plan, just before Christmas last year, included approximately $2,230,000 paid to supervisors.

[1] Beginning with Packard Motor Car Co. (61 N. L. R. B. 4), decided March 26, 1945.

[2] Between Maryland Dry Dock Co. (49 N. L. R. B. 733), decided May 11, 1943, and the Packard decision, the Board denied compulsory bargaining rights to supervisors in all but a few industries where such bargaining had long been an accepted practice. The Maryland Dry Dock decision was, however, itself a reversal of earlier decisions, in Union Collieries Coal Co. (41 N. L. R. B. 961), and Godchaux Sugars, Inc. (44 N. L. R. B. 874). In each of these landmark decisions, the Board split 2 to 1 on the issue of collective bargaining by supervisors. When the United States Supreme Court reviewed the Board's interpretation of the Wagner Act as covering supervisors, the Board was upheld by the narrowest of margins—a vote of 5 to 4. Packard Motor Car Co. v. N. L. R. B. (330 U. S. 485).

I want to emphasize that I am not talking about the class of workers who are variously referred to in industry as "working foremen," "gang leaders," or "straw bosses," who direct the work of other employees without, however, having any responsibility for the formulation or execution of general company policies. We call such people group leaders, and have always recognized them as being legitimately included in collective-bargaining units with the rank-and-file employees. While they receive extra compensation for their group-leading activities, they are universally included within our collective-bargaining units. A great deal of the confusion on the question of unionization of foremen and supervisors has resulted from the different names applied, by different companies, and in different industries, to various levels of supervision—we are talking here only about the men who are actually a vital part of our management team. This line of demarcation between our group leaders and our supervisory organization has been definitely established throughout our company and is accepted by the unions which represent our employees.

Actual experience with unionization of supervisors has been almost entirely confined to one of our plants—our plant at East Springfield, Mass., where we make a wide variety of consumer items in the electric appliance field.[3] Late in 1944, some of our supervisors at East Springfield organized a chapter of the Foremen's Association of America, and sought recognition from the company for collective bargaining purposes. When such recognition was denied, they petitioned the National Labor Relations Board for certification,[4] and a hearing was held in which there was developed, in considerable detail, the nature and responsibilities of their jobs as outlined above.[5] The bargaining unit for which the Foremen's Association of America sought certification included all supervisors up to the level of plant superintendent. Had the union prevailed, all but the works manager, the assistant works manager, and 13 department managers and divisional superintendents would have been included in collective bargaining. Think of that—at a plant employing approximately 5,000 employees, only 15 men could have been relied upon, in matters of collective bargaining, as being entirely free of union bias and union obligations.

At the time of the first Labor Board hearings, which were held in the summer of 1945, we had had very little experience which could be cited as specific proof of the intolerable situations which we firmly believed would result if all but 15 of the members of the management team at the East Springfield plant were unionized. However, we did find, through a series of questions to the supervisors who testified, that conflict would inevitably arise between their management obligations to the company and their obligations as union members.

For example, we asked several of the foremen what they would do if they made an adverse decision on a grievance submitted by the rank-and-file union which led to a strike by that union, and if a majority of their own foremen's union should then vote to go on strike in sympathy with the rank-and-file. In an effort to show additional problems created if second-line supervisors became a part of the same bargaining unit as first-line supervisors, we also asked a general foreman what he would do if, while a member of the foremen's union, he promoted a nonmember of the union from a lower paid to a higher paid foreman's position, because he felt the nonmember was better qualified than any member of the union for such promotion, and then was faced with a majority vote in his own union for a strike in protest against his own decision. In every instance,

[3] Other petitions for certification as bargaining representative for supervisors were filed with the Board, but later were withdrawn prior to the adoption of the Taft-Hartley law, at our East Pittsburgh (N. L. R. B. case No. 6-R-1247) and Lima, Ohio (N. L. R. B. case No. 8-R-1840), plants, and at two of the naval ordnance plants we operated for the U. S. Navy during the war (Louisville—N. L. R. B. case No. 9-R-1813, and Center Line, Michigan.—N. L. R. B. case No. 7-R-2118). A similar petition covering supervisors at our Bloomfield, N. J. plant was pending when the Taft-Hartley law was enacted, and was dismissed by the Board (case No. 2-R-7405).

[5] A printed brief of 143 pages was submitted to the National Labor Relations Board following such hearing, which summarized the 1,650 pages of testimony and 65 exhibits. This case presents a complete case study of the responsibilities and status of supervisors at a typical large industrial plant. In the interest of brevity we have not included this brief as a part of this statement, but we will be glad to make copies available to the committee upon request.

the answers to these and similar questions were either that the supervisor didn't know what he would do, or that he would support the action of his union even though his union was taking a position contrary to his own personal judgment as to what was the proper thing to do.[6] It is shocking that not a single one of the supervisors was willing to testify that he would stand by his own best judgment as against a contrary position taken by a majority of the members of his union.

Later on, after the first Board hearing, while the East Springfield foremen's union was still actively seeking certification and recognition, we had a chance to see how the divided loyalties of the supervisors would be evidenced in a specific situation. In September, 1945, the union representing salaried clerical employees went on strike for more money. The union representing the shop production employees did not join in or support the strike, and counseled its members to continue at work. For about the first 10 days of the strike, the office supervisors continued to do the essential paper work, such as preparation of pay-roll checks and the handling of records of incoming and outgoing shipments of materials and finished production, without which it would have been impossible to keep the 4,600 production employees at work. Suddenly, however, these supervisors announced to the divisional superintendents that they had received instructions from "their legal department" in Detroit, where the headquarters of the Foremen's Association of America was located, that they should not continue to perform the work which they had been doing, because it was considered by their union to constitute strikebreaking. From that time on, several of the union-minded supervisors refused to do any further clerical work. Fortunately, the strike ended after 3 weeks, but had the strike continued for any considerable additional period, the plant would have had to shut down and the production workers would have been thrown out of work because the supervisors chose to follow the course dictated by their union officers in Detroit.[7]

In following this course, the foremen's union members acted entirely in accord with a publicly announced statement of policy which the Foremen's Association of America issued early in January 1946 (issued on January 8, 1946, and reported in the Bureau of National Affairs, Daily Labor Reporter, for July 16, 1946, pp. A–12 to A–14). Among other things, this statement provided that Foremen's Association of America members might enter a struck plant only by agreement between the employer and the striking union, and that members of the Foremen's Association of America "shall not perform any work similar to that normally performed by the nonsupervisory employees on strike."

The statement further instructed its members not to use "undue effort" to enter a struck plant, even for the purpose of performing their regular work. Supervisors in a plant when a strike started were authorized by the statement to protect property and equipment from damage only temporarily in the absence of an agreement between "all parties"—meaning, of course, the employer, the striking union, and the Foremen's Association of America.

Under the Foreman's Association of America statement, no member was authorized to work under any circumstances unless the employer also agreed to pay other supervisors who were not permitted to enter the struck plant.

Fortunately, the Taft-Hartley law was passed before the various Board proceedings arising out of the East Springfield foremen's situation had been concluded, so the company never reached the point where it was specifically required to recognize and bargain with the foremen's union.[8] Since passage of the law, the East Springfield chapter of the union has disbanded. We feel, however, that a real catastrophe was narrowly averted. We are convinced that we could no more run the East Springfield plant, or any other plant, efficiently with union representation of supervisors than an Army could be run effectively without captains and lieutenants.

[8] Board certifications of ch. 215 of the Foremen's Association of America as bargaining agent for production foremen and general foremen, and for corresponding office supervisors, were issued on May 17, 1946 (N. L. R. B. case No. 1–R–2488, 66 N. L. R. B. 1297), and June 13, 1947 (N. L. R. B. case Nos. 1–R–3089–3092, 73 N. L. R. B. 818), respectively. The company refused to bargain, and an unfair labor practice proceeding was instituted (case No. 1–C–2849). While this case was pending before the Board on the trial examiner's intermediate report (dated December 6, 1946) recommending that the company be ordered to bargain, and the company's exceptions thereto, the Taft-Hartley law was adopted; and on September 29, 1947, the Board dismissed the case (75 N. L. R. B. 1). We understand this was the first decision by the new 5-man Board established by the Taft-Hartley law.

We also caught a glimpse of another aspect of the foremen's union movement, when the East Springfield foremen's union branched out and attempted to secure Board certification as bargaining agent for a group of nonsupervisory employees. The action of the supervisors in attempting to interfere with the rights of the nonsupervisory group obviously subjected the company to the possibility of an unfair labor practice charge. Because of the provisions in the Taft-Hartley law, the company was able to stop this movement before it could ripen into a situation where nonsupervisory employees were being bargained for by members of Westinghouse management. We told the supervisors involved that they would either have to withdraw the petitions for certification which they had filed with the Board or give up their jobs with Westinghouse. The petitions were withdrawn.[10] We think any reasonable person will agree that organization by supervisors of nonsupervisory employees simply could not work.

In view of this experience, we believe that the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law which give employers the right to refrain from bargaining collectively with supervsors should be preserved.

PROFESSIONAL EMPLOYEES

We urge retention of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act which prevent the inclusion of professional employees in the same bargaining unit with nonprofessional employees, unless the professional employees so desire.

A relatively high proportion of our employees are, by training and work assignments, of professional status. The nature of our business requires extensive use of professional engineers in the design of our products and production methods, the application, sale, and installation of our apparatus, and the continuation of our extensive research and development programs.

In the early days of the Wagner Act, neither the National Labor Relations Board nor, I am sorry to say, our company, gave adequate consideration to the fact that the problems and interests of professional employees are quite different from those of other salaried employees. As a result, we now have four bargaining units in our district sales offices which were established between 1940 and 1943 as a result of consent elections agreed to by the union, the company, and the Board, and in which highly trained professional engineers are included in the same bargaining unit with clerical workers. Similarly, at a number of our plants, we have bargaining units which include engineers in bargaining units completely dominated, from the standpoint of numbers, by clerical employees. At one of our plants, at Bloomfield, N. J., the engineers and laboratory technicians in a separate research department, conducting fundamental research on uranium and other rare metals, and on other important projects, were included in a broad unit of salaried employees represented by the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America, CIO (hereafter called UE-CIO). This was the result of a consent election in a Board case in which the wishes of these employees were not considered by anyone.[11]

It is true that the Board, by a change in its decisional doctrines began to recognize the differing interests of professional and clerical employees before the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act. Thus, in the first case involving one of our district offices in which the company objected to the lumping together of professional and nonprofessional employees, the Board in 1945 divided them into separate bargaining units.[12] However, the plight of those professional people already in clerical bargaining units, who desire separate representation, was not improved until after enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act. Two actual case histories illustrate this point:

(1) The research department engineers and technicians at our Bloomfield plant started action during the UE-CIO strike in 1946 to attempt to remove themselves from the salaried unit represented by UE-CIO. They first appealed to the company to do something about the situation, but we had to advise them that, under the Wagner Act, it was absolutely impossible for us to do anything for them. Since there was no procedure for "decertification" of the UE as their bargaining agent under the Wagner Act, the only available procedure open to them was the organization of another union and the filing of a certification petition. They organized such a union and filed a petition in April 1946, but it was dismissed in June by the regional director of the Board, apparently on the ground that a unit consisting of such employees would not be appropriate.[13] The union's appeal to the Board was denied in September 1946. Again in the spring of 1947 at a time when, under the Board's rules, it was proper for other labor organizations to file petitions for certification covering employees represented by UE-CIO, the same independent union of research department employees filed a second petition for certification.[14] Again, the Board delayed action on the petition, and there is every reason to believe it would have dismissed the petition a second time, had it not been for the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act. However, after the act became effective the Board processed the petition, held a hearing and ordered an election,[15] at which the research engineers and technicians voted 28 to 1 in favor of representation by their independent organization.[16]

(2) Our district sales office in Pittsburgh was one of those at which the company agreed, in the early days of the Wagner Act, to an over-all unit including both professional and nonprofessional employees.[17] The sales engineers at that office were, of course, not consulted with respect to their inclusion in the unit, and however they may have voted at the consent election that was held in 1941, they were far outnumbered by the votes of the clerical and other nonprofessional employees. In April 1947 they organized an independent union which filed a petition for certification.[18] This union met with one delay after another in its efforts to secure a hearing and an election. It was only after the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, and after the petition had been pending before the Board for more than a year, that these professional people received a hearing and an election. They voted by a substantial majority in favor of their independent union.[19] Shortly after they were removed from the clerical bargaining unit and their union was certified by the Board, it had a meeting at which it was voted to disband.

A somewhat similar situation exists at another of our district offices, where the sales engineers have for a long time protested against their representation by the union which also represents the clerical office personnel.[20] At one point, before the Taft-Hartley Act, these sales engineers hired an attorney who threatened legal action against the company if it continued to recognize the certified union as bargaining representative for them. The local union officers recognized the problem and simply refrained from bargaining on behalf of the salesmen, but they are still technically a part of the bargaining unit. The present provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act will, when the union agreement is reopened again, afford these employees an opportunity, through decertification proceedings, to remove themselves from the bargaining unit if they so desire, and to achieve legally in an orderly manner the results which they have thus far been able to obtain only by threatened legal action and internal pressures against the union.

Since the Taft-Hartley Act a number of Board proceedings have been conducted involving both professional and nonprofessional employees. In some cases both groups have voted for union representation. In others the professional employees have not signed sufficient union cards to permit the presentation of certification petitions covering them and have, consequently, remained outside the collective-bargaining units established for office and clerical employees.

We feel strongly that engineers and other professional employees should have the right, which is accorded them by the Taft-Hartley Act, to have a voice in deciding whether or not they wish to be represented in collective bargaining by the union which represents other salaried employees or by any other union, and this voice is preserved for them by the present provisions of the act. [16] A similar course of events marked the attempt of the engineers outside of the Bloomfield research department to also remove themselves from the bargaining unit represented by the UE-CIO. They, too, organized an independent union during the UE strike and filed a petition for certification on or about April 17, 1946 (N. L. R. out such provisions, this right could be taken away from them either by another change in the Board's decisional doctrines or by agreements between employers and unions for consent elections in units including both professional and nonprofessional employees.

UNION SECURITY

I should like to comment particularly on two phases of the union-security provisions of the Taft-Hartley law: (1) the abolition of the closed shop, and (2) the restrictions, under other lesser forms of union-security agreements, against arbitrary denial by unions of membership privileges sought by those who are willing to contribute financially to the union's support.

We oppose the closed shop in principle, and support the right of every man to seek employment in any job for which he is qualified. We have never agreed to a closed shop in any of our major plants or offices, except in a very few special situations where we purchased going businesses which already had signed closed-shop agreements and where we saw no practical alternative to their continuation. We feel strongly, however, that the closed shop is so contrary to the principles of freedom and equality of opportunity on which our economic system is based that unions should be prohibited from seeking it and management should be prohibited from granting it.

We also have a practical reason for opposing the closed shop. Our operations are so diversified, and call for such a wide variety of skills, that we have never been convinced that any union particularly under the kind of "industrial type" organization that has taken place in our industry, would be able to furnish the people we need from within the ranks of its own members.

We have had some experience along this line at a plan at Sunnyvale, Calif., which we purchased in the spring of 1947. At that plant we inherited modified closed-shop agreements providing for so-called preferential hiring, which have remained valid and enforceable because they were entered into prior to the Taft-Hartley law, but which will expire March 31, 1949. Two different unions are involved. Our experience under those agreements has been that the unions have been unable to furnish workers in anything like the qualities we have needed. Fortunately, the unions have been quite cooperative, with the practical result that we have recruited our employees from among nonmembers and then sent them to the unions for clearance and membership. However, without such cooperation—which could as easily be withdrawn as it has been granted—our ability to produce would be directly affected by the union's ability to obtain members and their willingness to furnish them to us. As a matter of fact, we have already experienced at the Sunnyvale plant a situation where competent and qualified workers who were employed at our Emeryville, Calif. plant have applied for jobs at Sunnyvale but have been denied clearance by the unions, presumably because the individuals have been supporters of a rival union which represents our employees at Emeryville.

During and since the war, as a direct result of policies originally established by the War Labor Board, we have agreed to so-called maintenance-of-membership provisions under which employees who join the union must continue their membership as a condition of employment, subject to their right, exercisable during a limited period once each year, to withdraw from such membership. We do not now have such an agreement in effect with the UE-CIO because that union has not seen fit to qualify for the privilege of having such an agreement under the Taft-Hartley law, and we have never been asked for such an agreement by the Federation of Westinghouse Independent Salaried Unions, which represents about 12,000 salaried employees. We do have such agreements with the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL (hereafter called IBEW-AFL). However, we have seen maintenance of membership used, under the old Wagner Act, as an instrument of coercion and intimidation by unions, and we ourselves have been placed in the unfortunate position of being found guilty of unfair labor practices as a result of carrying out our contractual obligation to discharge employees whose union membership has been terminated. These experiences lead us to the conclusion that the protection against such arbitrary and unfair use of such provisions, which is afforded by the Taft-Hartley law, should be continued.

During the war, at one of our smaller plants which was engaged in war work of vital importance, we were asked to discharge four employees in a bargaining unit represented by the IBEW-AFL [21] and covered by a maintenance-of-membership agreement. These four individuals were salaried employees who had become dissatisfied with the representation given to salaried employees by the union, and who had consequently attempted to organize an independent union to take over the bargaining rights for this group. Their group filed a certification petition with the Board [22] but lost the election, and then the four men were singled out as the leaders of the abortive attempt to secede from the IBEW-AFL. They were expelled from membership by the IBEW-AFL, and we were called upon to carry out our contractual obligation to discharge them. We at first refused to do so, primarily because we felt sure that, under the circumstances, the National Labor Relations Board under previous decisions would find us guilty of an unfair labor practice. Also, one of the men involved was the sole electrical engineer working on a radar project and another secret project for the United States Navy, and was considered by the plant manager to be irreplaceable. However, the union took the matter to the Regional War Labor Board, and the company was ordered to fire the four men,[23] on the theory that the union was "the sole determinant of the status of its members." We very reluctantly carried out this order (except as to one of the four who made his peace with the union), but in doing so we realized that not only were we depriving three men of their jobs because they exercised their rights as free Americans to avail themselves of the procedure set up under the Wagner Act, but we were also placing an impediment in the way of vitally needed production.

More recently, we received a request from the UE-CIO to discharge two men at our Cleveland lighting plant who had been expelled from UE membership. We knew that shortly before such request, during the 1946 UE-CIO strike, the IBEW-AFL had attempted to organize the workers and to supplant the UE-CIO as their bargaining agent. We had no knowledge of the part played in these activities by the two individuals in question. We made a number of attempts to get the UE-CIO to tell us the basis for their action in expelling these men from membership, but for a long time we only got in reply some general statements which added up to a polite, but firm, statement that it was none of our business. Nevertheless, we resisted the UE's request for almost a full year, during which time the IBEW-AFL obtained a Board election and lost it by an overwhelming majority.[24] Finally, we received a letter from the general counsel of the UE-CIO, assuring us that the expulsion of the two men from membership was not in any way based upon any action by them during the period of the UE-CIO strike, which coincided with the IBEW's first organization activity. Shortly after this letter came a strong representation from the UE-CIO that these men either had to be fired or our national negotiations with the UE-CIO, which were then in progress, would likely "bog down." Faced with this situation, the company reluctantly discharged the men, whereupon unfair-labor-practice charges were filed.[25] Because the discharges took place a few months before the Taft-Hartley law became effective, we were unable to convince the Board that the charges should be dismissed. In spite of the fact that the Board found that we acted entirely in accord with an existing binding agreement with the UE-CIO, the Board ordered us to reinstate these employees with back pay and rejected our contention that it was the UE-CIO, and not our company, which should be held responsible for the action that we took. Board Member James J. Reynolds, Jr., wrote a short separately concurring opinion which, we think, admirably sums up not only the injustice of the decision against us but also the wisdom of the Taft-Hartley Act provisions which prevent a repetition of this kind of a situation. Mr. Reynolds said:

"Considering myself bound by the doctrine established in the Rutland Court [26] and subsequent cases, I reluctantly join my colleagues in this decision. However, my personal views in the matter, as expressed in dissenting opinions in two earlier cases,[27] remain unchanged. It is the flagrant example which this case affords of the unconscionable dilemma of an employer in a Rutland Court situation that prompts me to a reiteration of such views. Here, the respondent for more than a year resisted the demands of the UE that Minch and Cunningham be discharged, prophetically envisioning a violation of the act if it acquiesced. When faced with the subtle threats that negotiations with the UE for a new collective-bargaining contract would 'bog down,' thereby imperiling by strike its own production and the jobs of some 65,000 employees, only then did the respondent acquiesce with measured reluctance in the UE demands. It was this type of situation, here so pointedly demonstrated, that impelled the Congress to enact section 10 (c) of the act, as amended. I only regret that the occurrence before August 22, 1947, of the events herein preclude the present application of this section."

One further instance of misuse of union-security provisions by unions should be cited. Our national agreement with the UE-CIO immediately prior to our 1946 strike contained a maintenance-of-membership provision, coupled with a provision for annual "escape" periods for the union members. However, as a penalty for withdrawing from union membership, the contract provided that the withdrawing employees should lose their seniority rights. We felt this was unfair and unjust, and fought vigorously to have this latter restriction removed from the contract. When our negotiations were completed for the new 1946 national agreement, we were able to remove this penalty provision. There had been several instances during the strike, which were brought to my attention in letters I received from employees, where the union had threatened employees with loss of their jobs under the maintenance-of-membership provisions if they failed to do everything the union thought they should do during the strike. Therefore, while we agreed to a maintenance-of-membership provision in the new agreement, we also anticpated that such provision might be used by the union as a basis for reprisal against employees who had incurred its displeasure during the strike. To forestall this use of the maintenance-of-membership provision, we incorporated into the strike-settlement agreement, which the union signed, a commitment that neither the company nor the union would discriminate or retaliate against any employee because of "any occurrence pertaining to the strike," and the further commitment that the maintenance-of-membership provision of the labor agreement would not be used for the purpose of circumventing this provision against discrimination and retaliation.

Not long after the end of the strike, we became aware of the fact that several UE-CIO members at our Mansfield, Ohio, plant had refused to pay a so-called strike assessment levied by the local on all its members. Several of these members were declared by the union to be in bad standing and we received requests to discharge them. The union made no attempt to conceal the fact that it was proceeding against this group for the purpose of frightening a much larger group of other people into paying their assessment. We refused to discharge these people, on the ground that this was a clear case of discrimination and retaliation for an occurrence pertaining to the strike, in violation of the union's agreement made in settlement of the strike. The union has never accepted the company's position, but the men were never discharged.

In still another case, a member of the UE-CIO local at one of our plants protested vigorously against a proposed assessment of the members to finance a trip by one of the union officers to Pittsburgh and New York to participate in discussions among local and international union representatives of the kind of proposals the union should make to the company for a new national agreement. Because he had the temerity to oppose the wishes of the local union leadership on this matter, he was expelled from the local and we were forced to discharge him, under the maintenance-of-membership agreement then in effect. He filed charges of unfair labor practice against the company, which were later withdrawn.[28] Since this occurred before the Taft-Hartley law, he was without any recourse against the union before the Board, although the union was the direct cause of his losing his job.

We have seen enough of the way in which union security provisions can be and are abused to be convinced that the Taft-Hartley law's safeguards against such abuses are desirable and should be retained.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH FOR EMPLOYERS

I feel very strongly that the rights to free speech by employers should be safeguarded, as long as there is no coercion, intimidation or bribery involved, and should continue to be provided for in any labor law.

What does free speech for the employer mean to me?

It means, for one thing, the right to report to our employees the facts about our company's operations and business—as we have done in letters, in talks, in our company newspaper, on bulletin boards and in special reports.

---

[28] NLRB case No. 20–C–1685, not officially reported.

It means the right to talk with our employees, through such mediums as I have mentioned, about the problems of our company—such as competition, supplies of materials, inventories, taxes, our margin of profit, and disposition of profits. All this we have done.

It means the right to urge our employees to take an active interest in their unions, to attend union meetings and to select their officers with care and thought. This, too, we have done, because we have been concerned about newspaper accounts of consistently small attendance at union meetings, particularly when matters of vital importance to the company and its employees are being considered. To facilitate participation by our employees in union affairs, we have permitted union representation elections and elections for union officers to be held in some cases within our plants.

We do not believe freedom of speech gives us the right to coerce or intimidate our employees in the selection of a union. And we have never done so.

I realize that many people feel that the rights which I have commented on already are guaranteed to us under the first amendment to the Constitution and that it is not necessary to spell them out in a labor law. But I believe the experiences which employers suffered during the earlier years of the Wagner Act were ample indication that such a provision is necessary.

I would also like to comment briefly upon objections that have been raised to provisions of the Taft-Hartley law which prevent the Labor Board from using instances of free speech as evidence in unfair labor practice cases. We readily admit that in some cases, this limitation may hinder the Board in its attempts to prove the existence of an improper motive in discrimination cases. However, it must be recognized that the use of noncoercive statements as evidence against an employer was the favorite device by which the Board, under the Wagner Act, effectively denied the right of free speech to employers, while at the same time paying lip service to it. The freedom which the Board enjoyed under the Wagner Act to predicate its findings upon such evidence—no matter how far removed in point of time and no matter how little connection it had with the alleged discriminatory action—had the practical effect of a complete denial of the right itself. It seems to me, therefore, that, on balance, the few cases in which the limitation may lead to a failure of proof in individual cases are considerably outweighed by the broad protection given to both members and unions against the indirect, but nevertheless effective, denial of free speech which this provision affords.

NON-COMMUNIST AFFIDAVITS

Another provision of the Taft-Hartley law which we believe should be continued is the requirement of non-Communist affidavits.

This is a subject in which Westinghouse has a rather vital and legitimate interest due to the fact that it has been publicized as an issue within the UE-CIO which represents approximately two-thirds of our employees. Also, Westinghouse was involved in testimony last year before a subcommittee of the House Labor Committee which investigated communism in the labor movement. The UE-CIO was among the unions investigated by the subcommittee. A former president of the UE-CIO testified before the subcommittee that employers, including Westinghouse, prefer to deal with Communists rather than with non-Communist labor leaders because Communists are less aggressive and easier to get along with.

Let us assure the committee that Westinghouse does not prefer to do business with Communists—either in labor, in government or in any other field.

We believe that any person whose first loyalty is to a foreign government and who advocates the overthrow of our Government by undemocratic methods should be excluded from any position where his activities can influence the economic or political life of this Nation. Labor leaders clearly can exercise such influence—and therefore we cannot see that there can be any serious challenge to the non-Communist provision of the Taft-Hartley law.

But, as I said, we also believe that Communists and supporters of Communist doctrines should be excluded from any position where they can influence the economic and political life of this Nation. As far as I am concerned that means management, government and professions, as well as labor.

Some labor leaders have testified that the non-Communist provision discriminates against labor, that it has embarrassed them and has reflected upon their patriotism and that of the whole labor movement, in that such affidavits are required only of union leaders; not of management members.

I will willingly sign any such affidavit, and I see no objection whatsoever to including management in this requirement.

Because of widespread publicity which has been given to charges of Communist domination of the United Electrical Workers, we have been asked many times why we continue to deal with this union. We can only say that the law requires us to bargain collectively in good faith with any labor organization which has been chosen as bargaining agent by our employees through the democratic processes under the National Labor Relations Act. Also, we cannot see how we could refuse to deal with any officer or steward of any union who was duly elected by the union as its spokesman or representative. Wherever Westinghouse bargains with the UE-CIO as exclusive bargaining representative, that union has been so designated by the Board.

As we see it, if the leaders of any union with which we do business should be removed from their positions, there are two ways in which that should be done: either by the Government, after it proves in court their unfitness for such positions, or by the members of the union from whom these leaders receive their positions of authority.

If the Government has evidence to support charges that the leaders of any union are guilty of violating any existing laws and are unfit to continue in their positions of responsibility, this evidence should be produced and used by the Government to prosecute such leaders. If present laws are inadequate, new legislation should be enacted; but its enforcement should be in the hands of the Government. If, on the other hand, members of the union decide they want new leaders, their right to freely exercise their privilege of voting them out of office should remain inviolate and, if necessary, be protected by the Government. We think that Westinghouse has no right to initiate either governmental or membership action of this type.

To some extent, we agree with Secretary of Labor Tobin's statement before the Senate Labor Committee that communism is an over-all problem that should be handled by adequate legislation * * * but we do not think that the anti-Communist provision should be omitted from labor legislation pending the time when wider legislation might be adopted. Because of the importance of labor-management relations to the economic welfare of this country, and because of the vast power which Communist seizure of labor unions gives to forces hostile to our form of government, I firmly believe that non-Communist affidavits from both labor and management should be required.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

BEFORE THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Cases Nos. 8–RC–158, 8–RC–159, 8–RC–160, 8–RC–161, 8–RC–162, 8–RC–163 (consolidated)

IN THE MATTER OF THE WILSON TRANSIT CO., INTERSTATE STEAMSHIP CO., THE INTERLAKE STEAMSHIP CO., M. A. HANNA CO., BETHLEHEM TRANSPORTATION CORP., AND PITTSBURGH STEAMSHIP CO., EMPLOYERS,[1] AND NATIONAL ORGANIZATION MASTERS, MATES, AND PILOTS OF AMERICA (A. F. OF L.), PETITIONER

DECISION AND ORDER

Upon petitions duly filed, an order consolidating the above cases was filed on July 8, 1948. A hearing on the consolidated cases was held at Cleveland, Ohio, on various dates between July 29 and August 9, 1948, before Philip Fusco, hearing officer. At the hearing the Employers filed numerous motions to dismiss the petitions upon various grounds. The Employers' motion to dismiss upon the ground that the unit sought is inappropriate is granted for reasons hereinafter stated.[2] The hearing officer's rulings made at the hearing are free from prejudicial error and are hereby affirmed.

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3 (b) of the National Labor Relations Act, the National Labor Relations Board has delegated its powers in connection with this case to a three-man panel consisting of the undersigned Board Members.

Upon the entire record in the case, the Board finds:

---

[1] The names appear as amended at the hearing.

[2] In view of our ruling on this motion we find it unnecessary to pass on the other motions to dismiss.

1. The Employers are engaged in commerce within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act.[3]

2. The National Organization Masters, Mates, and Pilots of America, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, is a labor organization and claims to represent employees of the Employers.

3. The Petitioner seeks in each case a unit composed of licensed pilots who sign on as mates, on all ships owned and operated, and on all ships operated but not owned, by each of the Companies.[4] The Petitioner contends that the employees sought are nonsupervisory professional employees. The Employers contend that such unit is inappropriate since they do not employ any pilots as such; that the employees for whom the Petitioner would bargain collectively are mates who are qualified to serve as pilots, and that these individuals are supervisors within the meaning of the Act. The Employers have no history of collective bargaining with respect to the employees sought herein.

The statutes and regulations of the United States Coast Guard applicable to the control of navigation on the Great Lakes require that each vessel of the type herein involved carry as part of the ship's crew a master and pilot, two first-class pilots, and one second-class pilot, all of whom are licensed deck officers. Pilots as such are, however, not employed by the Employers, but are signed on as mates and are required to carry pilot licenses in order to secure employment.

At the beginning of the shipping season in early spring, the mates, who report from 3 to 10 days before the master, are required to make the vessels ready for official inspection and navigation. As part of such duties they may be called upon to hire certain unlicensed crew members in order to complete the ship's complement of personnel, without which the vessel would not receive its certificate of inspection from the U. S. Coast Guard. The first mate takes charge of the work and assigns certain tasks to the other mates. Each mate is responsible for the work of the crew members assigned to him and for the satisfactory completion of the work. When the ship is ready to leave port, the master comes aboard and takes charge. The mates are then required to stand watch,[5] and the master delegates to the mates the duties of maintaining and providing for the upkeep of the vessel. In the absence or incapacity of the master the first mate assumes complete control over the vessel. Should the first mate also be absent or be incapacitated, the second mate takes charge, and in corresponding circumstances, the third mate will take command of the ship.

In discharging his duties as pilot, a mate has complete charge of, and is responsible for the safety of the ship until relieved by the master or mate next on watch.[6] He has under his immediate control the wheelsman and watchman, and is also responsible for the work being performed by the deck crew then on duty.[7] Whether he be considered mate or pilot, while navigating the ship he has the duty and authority to direct and advise the Wheelsman.[8] He may, in the exercise of his judgment, relieve an incompetent wheelsman or watchman and transfer

[3] All the companies stipulated, in effect, that they are domestic corporations engaged in the business of transporting bulk cargo on the Great Lakes principally between the ports of the various States on the Great Lakes and that during the past year each carried in its vessels cargos of substantial tonnage valued in excess of $1,000,000 or larger stipulated sums. All but the M. A. Hanna Co. admit that they are engaged in commerce within the meaning of the act. We have in previous cases found the M. A. Hanna Co. engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the act. See Matter of M. A. Hanna Company (75 NLRB 185; 65 NLRB 605).

[4] The vessels in question are steam vessels ranging in carrying capacity from 7,000 tons to 18,000 tons and are separately valued up to $3,000,000. The number of vessels involved is as follows: The Wilson Transit Co., 11; Interstate Steamship Co., 4; The Inter-Lake Steamship Co., 36; M. A. Hanna Co., 13; Bethlehem Transportation Corp., 12; Pittsburgh Steamship Co., 62. The parties stipulated that each vessel carries in addition to a master, who is also a licensed pilot, 3 licensed pilots who sign the ship's articles, or contract of employment, as first, second, or third mate. It is conceded that the master is a supervisor within the meaning of the act.

[5] The mates are called upon to stand individual watches of 4 hours' duration in rotating shifts. They have under them at such times a wheelsman, watchman, and deckwatch, and during the daylight shift, three deck hands and a boatswain, where boatswain are employed.

[6] It has been variously estimated by the Petitioner's witnesses that a mate, depending upon his experience, will spend from 75 to 95 percent of his hours on duty in the pilot house. However, he is not infrequently relieved by the master, on which occasion he will go down on deck to look after the work of the deck crew.

[7] Captain Ernest N. Pollock, district officer in charge of marine inspection, U. S. Coast Guard, called as a witness by the Petitioner, testified that even when on watch in the pilot house, the pilot is acting as mate since he has the entire deck crew under his supervision.

[8] The mere fact the pilot is under a statutory duty with respect to the direction of the wheelsman does not alter or detract from his status as supervisor and representative of the Employer concerned. Cf. Matter of Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., 66 N. L. R. B. 386, 395.

any other qualified deck member to these positions. In addition, the record shows that as mate or pilot he has the authority to recommend the discharge or promotion of unlicensed deck personnel.[9]
